THE GEORGIA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.

ROBERT TOOMBS, a Senator from Georgia, has already been chronicled in Harper's Weekly as one of the Representative Men of the Republic. Born in Wilkes County, where he now resides, on the 2d of July, 1810, he received, as he grew up, the best educational advances that the State afforded; then went to Union College, at Schenectady, New York, where he graduated; and before he had attained the legal age was admitted to practice at the bar by special statute of the Georgia Legislature. In 1837 he was elected to the Georgia House of Representatives, in which he sat (with the exception of the session of 1843) until elected to Congress in 1845. Originally a Democrat, he had turned from General Jackson after the "Force Bill," which was launched against the South Carolina nullifiers, and had joined the State Rights party of Georgia, led by Governor Troup, and known by his name. But while he admired the abstract theories of Calhoun, the young Georgian advocated that material progress, and that system of education, which has had such a wonderful effect. Taking his seat in the House of Representatives at Washington in 1845, Mr. Toombs was classed among the State Rights Whigs, but has never acknowledged fealty to either caucus or party discipline. In 1850 he joined Howell Cobb and other Democrats in the formation of the Constitutional Union Party, and the next year led off in dissolving the Whig phalanx. In 1852 he was elected to the United States Senate, where he has of late acted with the Democrats, yet ever opposed extravagance, consolidation, and humbug, and never hesitated to do what he thought right, regardless of public opinion.

ALFRED IVERSON, the other United States Senator from Georgia, was born in Burke County in that State, on the 3d of December, 1798; and after having graduated at Princeton College in 1820, commenced the practice of the law in Columbus. Taking a deep interest in political matters, he was elected for three successive terms to the State House of Representatives and then to the State Senate. On the reorganization of the Superior Court he was elected Judge for a term of three years, and then re-elected for a term of four years. In 1845 he was an elector at large on the ticket which gave the vote of the State to James K. Polk, having as a colleague Governor M'Donald (recently deceased), and as a district elector on the ticket Herschel V. Johnson, who recently run on the Presidential ticket with Judge Douglas. In 1847 he was elected, as a Democrat, a member of the Thirtieth Congress, in which Abraham Lincoln was likewise a Representative. In 1854 he was elected to the United States Senate, where he took his seat in March, 1855, and where his term will expire in March next. He has been a valuable member of the Committee on Claims, and also of the Committee on Military Affairs; but has he ever hesitated in the frank expression of his opinion, especially in the prolonged discussion on the naval retiring board, the action of which he afterward denounced in debate as "one of the most outrageous and disgraceful proceedings ever put on the records of the country." Although now a decided secessionist, he has not heretofore hesitated to express himself (in urging the increase of the army), as an advocate of the employment of force by the General Government to secure the execution of the Federal laws.

PETER E. LOVE, Representative from the First District, was born near Danbury in Georgia, on the 7th of July, 1818, and was left an orphan at an early age. Educated under the guardianship of his brother-in-law, General Eli Warner, he entered Franklin College in 1834, where he remained until 1837, when he left to commence the study of medicine. The next year he attended the lectures at Philadelphia, but not favoring the medical profession, he returned to Georgia, where he so diligently prepared himself for the bar that he was admitted to practice in 1839. In 1840 he took an active part in the Presidential election, aiding in giving the electoral vote of Georgia to General Harrison, and in 1843 he was elected Solicitor-General of the Southern Judicial Circuit, in which capacity he won high honors. In 1844 he again did yeoman's service in the Whig ranks in favor of Henry Clay, but afterward joined in the Constitutional Union movement, and in 1853 was appointed Judge of the Southern Judicial Circuit by Governor Cobb, a position which he continued to hold by repeated elections." In 1859 he was elected to the House of Representatives, and while a zealous advocate of the rights of the South, he has carefully looked after the interests of the city of Savannah, in his own district, securing the mail-service with Havana, and otherwise aiding the progress of that flourishing sea-port.

MARTIN J. CRAWFORD, of Columbus, is the efficient representative from the Second Congressional District, and the readers of Harper's Weekly will remember the previously published sketch of his life. Descended from the Crawfords so honorably identified with the history of Georgia, he was born in Jasper County, on the 17th of March, 1820; completed his education at the Mercer University" was admitted to the bar, and served as a member of the Georgia Legislature from 1845 to 1847; and in 1853 was elected Judge of the Superior Court for the Chattahoochee Circuit. In 1856 he was elected a member of the House in the Thirty-fourth Congress, and has since been a leading spirit among those who are opposed to extravagant expenditure as necessarily leading to a consolidation of the Federal Government. On the questions which have brought about the present crisis he has ever taken a decided stand.

THOMAS HARDEMAN, JUN., the representative from the Third or Macon District, was born in Bibb County, Georgia, on the 12th of January, 1825, and after having graduated at Emory College in 1845, engaged in mercantile pursuits, with great success. He was elected to the Georgia House of Representatives in 1850, and again in 1857, and was a State Senator in the intermediate term of 1855. In the Presidential contest of 1856 Fillmore carried the Macon District by 65 votes, and Mr. Hardeman was elected by 135 majority, after a close contest. Although he has made no public declaration of his views on the great question of the day, he is not in any wise behind his colleagues in the expression of his devotion to State Rights.

LUCIUS J. GARTRELL, the Representative from the Fourth District, was born on the 6th of June in Wilkes County, Georgia, on the 7th of January, 1821. After completing his education at Macon College, Virginia, and Franklin College, Athens, Georgia, he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and in 1843 was elected Solicitor-General of the Northern Judicial Circuit. In 1847 he resigned this position, having been elected to the State Legislature, but was re-elected in 1849, so efficiently had he before discharged his duties. In 1856 he was one of the Presidential electors who gave the vote of the State to James Buchanan; in 1857 he was elected a Representative in the Thirty-Fifth Congress; and in 1859 he was re-elected to the present Congress. An experienced and able debater, he has spoken on most of the prominent questions before the House since he has been a member, especially on the contested election cases. On the question of Southern Rights he has taken a decided stand, and has declared, that he "would nerve in a speech that—to use his own words—"the issues are fully made up, and the trial between right and wrong, justice and injustice, lawlessness and the Constitution, should be finished. He will soon be had [at the Presidential election], and I pray God that the result at the ballot-box may not be such as to force upon us again the dire necessity of appealing to the cartridge-box."

JOHN W. H. UNDERWOOD, the Representative from the Fifth District, was born in Jefferson County, Georgia, November 20, 1816. Receiving a thorough education, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1839. He soon took a high stand in his profession, and in 1843 was elected by the General Assembly Judge of the Western Circuit, a position which he resigned in 1847. In 1850 he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention, and espoused the cause of Southern Rights, siding with the late Governor M'Donald against the Union candidate, Howell Cobb, in their famous memorial struggle. Presidents Pierce and Buchanan each tendered him a judicial appointment; but he declined. In 1857 he was elected Speaker of the lower branch of the Georgia Legislature, and was chosen Speaker. In 1859 he was elected to Congress by a very large majority, and was conspicuous in his endeavors to overthrow the entire Southern vote with that of the Northern Democrats in the election of Speaker, which was known to be indicative of the future policy of the House. He ever avowed his belief that the Constitution of the United States is a compact, and that each State, as a party to the compact, is the judge of its infraction —to judge of the mode of redress.

JAMES JACKSON, who represents the Sixth, or Athens District, was born in Elbert County, in 1819, and is of that Jackson family so long and so honorably identified with the history of Georgia. After having completed his studies at Franklin College, where he graduated in 1839, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1840. In 1842 he entered political life, and was elected Secretary to the State Senate. In the year 1843 in 1845 he was elected a member of the State House of Representatives; in 1849 he was elected by the Legislature Judge of the Ocmulgee Circuit, and in 1853, and again in 1857, the people re-elected him to the same position. Nominated for Congress, he resigned his judgeship, and was elected, taking his seat in December, 1859.

JOSHUA HILL, who represents the Seventh District, was born in Abbeville District, South Carolina, but removed to Georgia when a child. He though not favored with a collegiate education he was a diligent student, and in due time was admitted to the bar. Here he soon took a high position, and was honored with several local trusts; until, in 1857, he was elected by the American party to Congress, and was re-elected by the Know-Nothings as no close that he only had 139 majority, Fillmore having received at the previous Presidential election 64 majority. He is decidedly attached to national American principles, and has the moral courage to join in the discussion of slavery on the floor of the House, regarding it as a strictly local question, on its merits and demerits, but not as a question of the right to talk or to legislate. But he has avowed himself a Southern Rights man. "I am prepared," said he, "to defend my rights, to shield and protect, and shall be ready when the time comes, if it ever should—which God in his mercy avert!—to assert them to the utmost extreme. We shall stand prepared to take my children by the hand, and with them go into a united South—with those who are indissolubly linked with me. These are no idle enunciations. I deal not in them. They are the enunciations of my convictions, and I will deceive no man. I say to the North, before you shall succeed to power, if you do obtain the possession of the Government, you must first march over the blasted Bunker Hill; by the memories of your Pilgrim Fathers, whom I have never traduced, and never will; by the memories of the battle-fields of Concord and Lexington and Saratoga, and on the battle-fields of the South, I implore you to give up and abandon this idea, which is suicidal to the Confederacy, of restricting the institution of slavery to its present limits. What would you say in the event our country shall expand? But if you have determined to do it, if the fanaticism of your hearts never to relent, you may, and perhaps will, have the power; but whenever you seek to use it, the unhappy day will have arrived when this nation, and civilized man throughout the world, will have cause to lament the dire calamity involved in your success."

JOHN J. JONES, the Representative from the Eighth District, is the only son of Hon. Seaborn H. Jones, of Burke County, where he was born on the 19th November, 1824. After having graduated with honor at Emory College, he studied law, and was admitted to practice in 1848. After the retirement of Alexander H. Stephens he was elected as his successor, and enjoys the general esteem of his colleagues from all sections.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1861.

THE ABANDONMENT OF FORT MOULTRIE.

THE country is thrown into a state of great excitement by the intelligence that, on Christmas night, the gallant Major ANDERSON, commanding the United States force at FORT MOULTRIE, abandoned that fort, and removed all his command to FORT SUMTER. The guns at FORT MOULTRIE have been spiked, and the gun-carriages burned. FORT SUMTER is a work of great strength, and, with the force now in it, commanded as it is, can be held securely against any army that South Carolina can bring against it. FORT MOULTRIE, on the other hand, was a very weak position, and could not have been defended against a vigorous attack. The movement reflects the greatest credit on the judgment of Major ANDERSON, who, it seems, acted exclusively on his own responsibility in the matter, and without consultation with the Government or with General SCOTT.

Such of our readers as may wish to understand the movement are referred to the last Number of Harper's Weekly, in which we published a Plan of the CHARLESTON HARBOR, showing the various FORTS AND A PROFILE VIEW OF THE SAME; to No. 203, in which we gave a splendid picture of FORT MOULTRIE; and to No. 205, in which, with other CHARLESTON PICTURES, we gave FORT SUMTER.

These PICTURES, studied in connection with the news of the day, will enable readers to form an accurate idea of the important events which are now occurring at Charleston.

THE FALL OF PEKIN.

IF the public mind in this country were not so wholly engrossed with our own political troubles, the news from China, that the allied French and English have taken Pekin—would have been the chief topic of conversation ever since. We doubt whether any event of equal importance to the world at large has taken place since the Battle of Waterloo or the establishment of American Independence.

To realize its moment, people must bear in mind that nearly one third the population of the world are subjects of the Emperor of China; that these millions are generally educated, industrious, refined, and enlightened; and that if they could be pried out of the groove in which they have been running for ever so many centuries, and fairly introduced into the family of nations, the effect on the general movement of civilization and commerce would be something like what would follow the establishment of balloon-ferry between this and another of the planets in our system.

It is popularly supposed that we have intercourse with China. We have a treaty which allows us to trade at five ports. But all sailors agree that one sees a great deal more of China at any good Chinese museum than at Hong Kong, Amoy, Foo-Chow-Foo, or Shanghai. At most, if not all these places, the anchorage for ships is many miles from the town; and if it were not, the prejudices of the Chinese and municipal laws do not permit foreigners to travel through their streets. Until the recent capture of Canton it was as much as a man's life was worth to walk through the Chinese city. Mr. Fortune, who has been up to the tea districts, and Father Huc, who traversed the kingdom from Thibet, both bear witness to the imminent peril of life which awaits explorers of the Flowery Land. It always been the fixed policy of the Chinese empire to restrict their intercourse with foreigners to within the narrowest possible limits—to sell teas and silk, but to buy as few goods as possible—and to take as little at all from abroad. That policy has been in harmony with the prejudices of the Chinese people; and hence, though Chinese tea and Chinese silk have been in use in this country for a century, we know nearly as little of the standing the Chinese, and they are no nearer understanding us, than we were when the Encyclopedists painted China as the model empire.

It is probable that all this must change all this. It is not likely that the Allies will conclude a peace without securing material guarantees for the concessions they will exact from China. It is probable that they will demand the possession of some strong places in the interior, in order to protect foreigners traveling or trading. They will, of course, obtain the right of establishing embassies at Pekin, with such military force as may be necessary to guard them. New commercial treaties will doubtless be concluded, and an indemnity claimed which, for a few years, will reverse the silver tide that has so long set Asia-ward.

Of the ultimate result we can not yet speak. The empire of China is understood to be in the last stage of dissolution, and the fairest provinces to be in the hands of rebels and a prey to anarchy. The Allies may find that the capture of Pekin has devolved upon them the duty of reconstructing the government of the empire. Whether the task could be accomplished, and, if so, by what expedients and on what principles, none can yet undertake to decide. It is not likely, however, that the capture of Pekin, and the predominance of European power in China, are likely to render the ultimate settlement less advantageous than it would otherwise have been to the cause of commerce and civilization.

THE LOUNGER.

THE INVERTED YEAR.

THE year is utterly inverted—turned completely upside down. It is changed—from December, and through double windows the sitter by the fire looks out upon brown and leafless trees. But the poet reminds us, as the imagination begins to sympathize with the desolation,

> "In a drear-nighted December,
> Too happy, happy tree,
> Thy branches ne'er remember
> Their green felicity:
> The north cannot undo them,
> With a sleety whistle through them,
> Nor frozen thawings glue them
> From budding at the prime."

The trees preach patience through the long, long months in which they stand so rugged and bare. Just now the year draws to its shortest days. The bitter cold, the sleet, the storms and snow the pools. There is an unnatural brightness and silence in the woods, as in a chamber where some one died yesterday. How still the nights are! One remembers tenderly the sultry, stifling, and close nights of the summer nights—was it real? Were there sultry moonlights? Were there gurgling brooks, and rustling trees, and the voices of katydids, and crickets, and owls, and tree-toads, and the hum of insects, and lowing of cattle, and sounds of music upon oars in the waters, and the song of midnight loiterers in boats? Where are they now?

Yet as the days dwindle the dead use to the fatal season of the year, and bring back Christmas back again. They lead us to New Year's, and the kindly words of mutual greeting. In the silence of the sparkling, shining nights I listen, although we hear no sound of katydid and cricket, we may perhaps hear another music, another softer, far-off carol. "I bring you glad tidings of great joy."

And we need to hear that just now, if we can only hear it rightly, and understand that death is not peace. Men ought to be better and conciliate and entreat kindly, provided that they do it only what they honestly prefer to a present peace. There are better things than the enforced peace of a day or a year, and the permanent peace of a great principle is one of them. The builder is a fool who plasters over the crack in his wall, instead of making the wall fast. The house may hold to-day, and the wall comes down to-morrow. You may have peace with a highwayman who puts a pistol to your head if you will give him your purse. But your momentary peace is purchased at the expense of that of society.

Yet in their warmest differences of belief men angry differ from each other in certain mutual self-respect. It does not follow that men are dishonest because they are not of your opinion; and if all men were of your opinion, the moral effects of the catastrophes of difference would be often avoided. A little common sense, a little humanity infused into the management of affairs, and the world would be the gainer. There must be radical and vital differences of belief—there must be as radical and vital differences of character—but patience, forbearance, short of surrender. Then, if conciliation be clearly and confessedly impossible, agreement to differ. If that be impossible, what remains?

TRAVELING.

STEPPING from the train at Marshall, in the State of Michigan, I made a question at the office, a traveler was amused to read a notice above a blackboard, "No questions answered at the office. The latest information will be found on the bar," words to that effect; of course, "here" was a blank board, and if a traveler wanted any kind of information he must go elsewhere. Well, on reaching the depths of his interior consciousness, for there were "no questions answered at the office."

Some time since a gentleman at the West wrote to the Lounger to complain of some strictures upon the manners of railway officers made by another correspondent. He said very justly that the ticket-collector was the best helpless victim for any one and fool who wished to vent endless silly questions. A man will ask him what time it is with a view to getting a reply for his watch or clock. He is, of course, trying; but it is certainly better to endure the idle talker than to snub the sincere inquirer. No one ought any man to erect an exception into a rule; but rough, short treatment is, at least, frequent treatment upon our railroads.

Here is a letter from another traveler who has had experiences:

> "I have been under a necessity to travel in the character of a feeble and crippled man, and I am going to tell you of some of the annoyances that you or I may be the better prepared to rebuke the all-pervading indifference to the wants of unfortunate which characterizes our present wholesale arrangements for travel.
> "My wife, worn-out with nursing me, had gone on before to Boston. I came by the 'Old Colony Road.' It was fair when I started, but raining when the train stopped. A high-bred fence on each side. Perhaps I was in a comfortable state: I know that I had been for an hour breathing with difficulty the nasty, stinking, sulphury, smoky, dusty, and feculent atmosphere of the car, and I can not answer for my senses under such circumstances. I did not know, and was not informed, that we had arrived near Boston. Men got up and left the car one after another as they do when any thing has happened. I kept my seat until the train was boxed at each side as was men do and then all rose simultaneously, and picking up their parcels, followed them. Then I thought it will be prudent for me to take look out at my rate: so I took up little son to stay with the shawls and beg until I came for him.

"I found we were outside a large shed, which was no doubt the Boston station, and as there was too much weight for we to carry, I let myself down from the top of the car and hobbled into the station. Being a little bad some difficulty in getting a carriage: before I had got one, the train with my boy had gone back—body to tell me where I was. I at length saw a man with a parcel of baggage-check in his hand, and succeeded in arresting him. I told him my trouble. 'Your boy in it? Why didn't he get out? I can't help it,' and he hurried away from me. I went to my driver and begged his assistance. 'I don't know any thing about it; I don't belong here.' 'But don't you know where to go to get some information about that train?' 'No, I don't.' 'Is there no one here who can help me?' 'I don't see anybody that can.' 'Don't you know; I don't belong here.' 'Is there any one who does belong here?' I again went of the Company to whom I am apply?' 'Don't know.' 'Haven't you an office here in Boston?' 'Yes; but there ain't none of 'em about here.' 'Will you kindly give me your name while I search for something?' 'Well, I don't went to leave my horses very long.' However, he went with me, and, after searching for some time, I opened a door and found myself in a large room, where were several men lounging. 'Is there any one here who has any authority, or position, or to whom I can apply for information?' 'Yes, Sir,' answered one: 'what do you want?' I told him what had occurred. 'Why didn't you look out better—not to him in the car?' I was at a little enraged at this, and replied with some obvious indignation: 'upon what principle am I to open the door and said he would fetch the boy. As I had told my son not to move till I came for him, I thought it necessary to go with the man: he walked rapidly, and, as my driver had gone back to his horses, I hobbled after him the best I could: first, over a couple of hundred feet of platform, and then in the dingy station: then after a long step down through mud and water, between rails on which, each way, were locomotives ringing and whistling, backing and going, for or three hundred feet more, to a car-house where I found a man lifting my boy on his shoulder to bring him to me.

"A QUIET MAN."

FEAR.

TURNING over Hildreth's "History of the United States" the other day, the Lounger found an extract from the old Aurora, which shows how high and hot party-spirit ran in the old days. They were not, apparently, Billingsgate, even in times of Washington and Jefferson and Hamilton. It is inevitable that we should think otherwise, of course. Nothing is natural than that we should so suppose our own troubles to be the most annoying that ever were. But in the height of our bitter debate we may console ourselves that we are the children of men who had a hard path to travel—who saw it, and were not afraid.

Then, under all circumstances, however sunny, it is so much better to look every thing squarely in the face than to try to forget that there is any thing to look at. If there is a frightful spectre in the path, the way is to go straight up to it and take hold of it. Many an awful ghost turns out to be a shy "non a clothes' line. The ostrich method of sticking the head in the sand for a little while, but not wise, not ultimately practicable. To drift and lurch along in a fearful uncertainty is as stupid as it is dangerous. If your children there is burglar in the house, either go down and dispute the spoons with him, or else turn over and go to sleep, and execrate the spoons. It is infinite folly to pretend that you don't know that there you are not only robbed but craven. You may wisely decide that you had rather let him put your silver into his bag than his lead into your body; but then say so, frankly, and declare in the distinctest words to the partner of your slumbers, "My dear, I'd much rather lose my silver than my life."

There is no fear so abject as the fear of being afraid. Cowardice is a man who is afraid to be afraid? Sailors, it seems, always laugh at us landsmen for puffing and swelling so tremendously about never fearing any thing. Their whole life is led upon the dizzy edge of peril. They look quietly at things that would make most of us blench and chatter. But they are not ashamed to say that they are afraid. They do the thing; oh! yes; but that is a very different thing. You remember the two soldiers at Waterloo. They were both standing quietly in the square upon which the fury of the battle was breaking. "Faith," says one to the other, "I believe you are afraid." "Pooh!" was the reply, "if you were half as much afraid as I am you would run away."

On the other hand, Montaigne says that the thing he is most afraid of in the world is fear. But to that there is the exquisite reply of Jean Paul in "Schmelzle's Journey to Flaetz," "I should fear again that I did not sufficiently fear fear, but continued too much." If you do not know that story, and wish to enjoy one of the bits of purest humor, find it and read it in Carlyle's translation.

For the rest, as the old essayists say, and when you have been conning them over, you find a fine flavor, as when you come out of the spice-shop you smell of cinnamon and cloves—for the rest, nothing is more dangerous than a temporary danger or conceiving your own cowardice. It by no means follows that you are afraid to do. Your duty because you are afraid to do it. Not at all. You will simply do it with a great deal of friction. That will be just the difference between you and a hero. But then did you suppose that man was a hero? If you take care to have it understood that, reward or hero, you are going to do what you think you ought to do, that is the essential point. Then everybody knows what to count upon. Then no clouds clear up. Then, if there may be peace, you see it. If there must be battle, you see that.

THE GALLANT SEVENTH.

MR. BLANCHARD JERROLD writes to the London Chronicle that Mr. Frank Bellew has just returned from New York to England, to suggest to the London Volunteers that it would be a polite and pretty thing to invite Brother Jonathan's pet regiment to cross the sea.

It would certainly be "a big thing" for the gentleman of the regiment to embark in an English vessel of war, and be the guests of the gentlemen volunteers of London town, who are understood to be somewhat different from the crack regiment of Dutch John Gilpin, that citizen of credit and renown, was eke Captain. It would be a charming business to arrive, say in the month of May, when the world is in town; when the flower-shows are in full blossom; when breakfasts, collations, matinées both musical and dancing, dinners, operas, theatres, and balls, are without end. Then the Clubs would open their doors. Mr. Jerrold writes from the Reform Club, that the palaces would be opened for the gallant Seventh, as I had opened some years since, for a banquet to the gallant Ibrahim Pacha.

The visit would be a feast, a triumph, an ovation. It would be an acknowledgment, doubtless, of the courteous welcome of the Prince of Wales. Perhaps the Queen might graciously review the citizen soldiers in the Park, or invite them to a garden-fete at Windsor Castle. That redoubted old buffer (not to say it irreverently), George Third, of happy memory, who always seems like a squire-parson in Sandford and Merton, or to whom we apply for information? "Yes, Sir," answered one: "what do you want?" I told what had occurred. "Why didn't you look out better—not to him in the car?" I was a little enraged at this, and replied with some obvious indignation: 'upon what principle am I to open the door and said he would fetch the boy. "A QUIET MAN."

NAPOLEON'S CROWN.

ONE of the surest tests of manhood is to devote yourself to a course of public policy which seems to you right, and encounter the hatred of the whole nation; to seize the power to pursue that policy, and persistently to pursue it, knowing that the results can only be evolved slowly, and that, during the evolution, you must submit to the bitter, unrelenting, even bloody opposition of the friends of the same end which you are striving and mean to serve. Cheerfully to bear the furious or broken-hearted regrets and misapprehension of friends, for years and years, is there not something heroic in that? something that requires the truest possible temper of manhood?

And is there not something of that heroism in Louis Napoleon? Is there not, at least, a partially absolute power in France, must we not honestly confess that he has seemed to consult the welfare of France as far as it is possible for man? If the Assembly in '51 had sent him to Vincennes, is it likely that France would be so internally prosperous and self-respecting as she is to-day? And if not, is the glory not fairly his?

Any friend of the Lounger who has chatted with him familiarly for two or three years upon current topics at home and abroad, will see that Louis Napoleon has not always been honored in this particular department of the World. The more liberal editorial opinion on the side of this power has ever pressed greater faith from the beginning. But the process of confession upon the part of the Lounger began some months since, and has gone back as the Italian war. Only he then insisted that there was no especial reason for believing that the Emperor had any other view but the safety of his own crown and dynasty. And not even that could he said that France seemed to have less freedom at home than she had found for other nations abroad.

Well, Louis Napoleon has not satisfied friends or doubters in the wrong again. He has sketched the plan of a constitutional participation of the people in the government. And he has left the foundation of a constitutional, not a revolutionary opposition; and in so doing, he has reproduced the essential safeguard of the British and American systems. Of course what he has done is but the beginning. But can any body study the history of his reign and not see that this object is? When he was in London in April, 1848, he was viewed as a special policeman to help protect the English system of government. And on the 24 of December, 1851, he swore himself in as special officer to establish the English system of a constitutional monarchy in France. That course he has been faithfully pursuing, under the assaults of both the friends of constitutional liberty throughout the world. Without explanation, without impatience, without complaint. And if a special officer's sympathy from the friends of popular rights, but with a shade of suspicion from crowned heads, he has been pushing steadily on. And his course has been like the boring of an Artesian well, until now he begins to strike the pure waters of popular liberty.

Is he inconsistent with his ambition, you say? Yes, but is it also inconsistent with the liberty, and dignity, and prosperity, and progress of France? If it be, then is the achievement of such objects a base ambition? Is the man who tries to France all that, a man whom France will remember with curses or with blessings?

MOB LAW.

THERE have been several symptoms of mobs recently, and the Mayor of Melville has wisely warned the citizens against giving way to such a summary and foolish remedy for any grievance whatsoever as a mob. You see it works both ways. If Tom thinks twice two are five, and Ned thinks they are four, it is very easy and convenient for Tom to bring his friends and lawl Ned down, and smash the windows, and break the seats, and howl, and throw bad eggs. It is just as easy as it is for Ned and his friends to come to-morrow and bawl you down, and smash things, and throw the eggs. A mob expresses nothing but the ungovernable rage of a few people. If, indeed, they can get such an impetus as they did seventy years ago in Paris, then you have the hideous tyranny of the reign of terror; and no conceivable Caligula or Nero is a tyrant so shameless and inhuman as a raging crowd of desperate men.

Mob rule merges in anarchy, of which the solution is a military despotism. And if not an exercise of the right of revolution, except that in this country every stroke at free speech is a blow at the essential existence of all government. The right of revolution is among the most sacred rights of communities, but the right of free speech is the most sacred attribute of society. The moment it passes into action the law properly interferes, because the right of action is subject to different conditions. But the right can not be discussed ought not to be endured. The time and the temper of discussion are matters of discretion for the speaker. He may choose a wrong time and a bad way, the results will recoil upon his cause, and alienate the public mind.

If you don't want to hear what a man has to say, you may stay at home. Your neighbor may wish to hear, and he has the same right to listen that you have not to listen. Who made you the judge of what is proper? Or suppose that you think he ought not to hear. You may reason with him as much as you will; but the moment you touch him you make his hearing you only invite him to prevent your hearing what you wish to, and you reduce society to chaos.

SEATING AT THE PARK.

WHETHER it was worth while to build a Park, used sometimes to be asked by the skeptical. But although the charm of a Park is naturally associated with grass and summer, let any doubter go to the Central Park now and be forever absolved. Whether it were desirable to open the most convenient and pleasing drive and promenade ground for children—and there were no fairer nish the loveliest rural scenery for loiterers on foot or in the saddle—whether it were a good thing to provide public places for healthy and rational recreation for a hard-worked city—these are the questions to which, at the present moment, the ringing music of ten thousand skates returns the rich reply.

There is one emotion which must always fill the mind of every honest New Yorker who thinks of the Central Park. Oh, that every institution, or but a few institutions, were managed as well as that!" The Legislative Committee of inquiry retired before it. And why not? It is not used for party purposes, but for the welfare of the public. It is the property of all, most wisely administered for the benefit of all.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY is the present Lord Mayor of London smaller than Tom Thumb?—Because he is only one Cubit (18 inches), whereas Tom Thumb is two cubits.

Unsocial old Snarl says that love is a combination of disease—an affection of the heart, and an inflammation of the brain.

A person having willfully put an end to his life by drowning in a canal, the coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Felo de se." Upon hearing it, a Frenchman exclaimed, "Ah, dat is very kind of dem, indeed."

A crooked gentleman, on his arrival at Bath, was asked by another what place he had traveled from?

"I came straight from Hunchester."

"Did you so?" said the other, "Then you have been literally warped by the way!"

A young lady who gave herself many airs, having contemplated a sojourn in France, a friend expressed a doubt whether she would succeed in talk English when she come back. "Oh," said she, "I shall not forget my power of language were," she'll never forget the vulgar tongue!"

During the residence of the Prince of Wales at Oxford it was not unusual for the undergraduates to give him a good deal of attention, with a view to future preferment. One of them, however, was distinguished by his independent spirit, when his turn came to preach the University sermon, chose the following for his text: "There is a boy here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?"

During the recent meeting of the Emperors at Warsaw a ballet entitled "Napoleon Bonaparte, or the Two Thieves," was being performed at the theatre; but on account of the presence of the two Emperors in the theatre at the performance, the police, to show them an attention as witty as it was delicate, caused the play-bills to be placed on the bills, for that night only, "Robert and Bertrand."

What supposed the second half of the title, namely, "The Two Thieves."

A STRANGE SALMON.—On a fishing and shooting expedition, some years since, some men were told in the evening. Shots are made, and fishing feats performed, often fabulous, occasionally of a kind seldom known at other times. On the occasion referred to, the connecting link seems extraordinary. A canny Scotchman in the corner was at length pulled out of his reverie by some one having as wonderful as the story last related, which required to be taken with a good deal of salt. "Weel, Sir," said he, "unless it was some years ago, when I was fishing in the Highlands, I never saw the like. The first thing I saw in the morning, when I looked out o' my bedroom window, was a salmon, with a fishing-rod and line, and a reel, and I'm not supposed the second half of the title, namely, "The Two Thieves."

AN APT REPLY.—The witty Scotch advocate, Harry Erskine, was on one occasion pleading before the House of Lords. He had occasion to speak of certain curtsies, and pronounced the word, as he always did, with the accent on the first syllable—ce-ritors. One of the English judges, who seems to have forgotten, could not stand this, and cried out, "We are in the habit of saying curator in this country." Erskine, following the analogy of the Latin language, in which, as you are aware, the penultimate is always long, replied, "Your lordship very much," was Erskine's reply. "We are weak enough in Scotland to think that in pronouncing the word curator we follow the analogy of the English language. But I need scarcely say that I bow with pleasure to the opinion of so learned a senator and so great an orator as your lordship."

NEVER SATISFIED.

WAITER. "Did you ever hear any thing else, Sir?"

TIMID OLD GENT (who has all that can be wished for). "Of course I do, waiter."

WAITER. "What is it, Sir?"

OLD GENT. "My appetite."

CONSULTATION OF PHYSICIANS.—A man much addicted to drinking became exceedingly ill with a fever. A consultation was held in his bedchamber by three physicians, how to "cure the fever and damn the thirst." "Gentlemen," said he, "I will take half the trouble off your hands. You cure the fever, and I'll abate the thirst myself."

When the late King of Denmark was visiting England he very frequently honored Sir Thomas Robinow with his company, though the knight spoke French in a very imperfect manner, and the King but very moderately knew the English tongue. One day, when Sir Thomas was in company with the late Lord Chesterfield, the honest knight of Cracow, who loved the King, and asked, "that he believed the monarch had a greater friendship for him than any man in England." "How report lies!" exclaimed Lord Chesterfield: "I heard his majesty but two days ago say, that he never met but a great deal of bad language passed between you."

A celebrated modern composer—a way in his way—recently dined at the Tuileries, and, while pacing the deck during a heavy squall, was extremely annoyed to perceive that his wife, who had arranged the lace and other finery of her dress (as he supposed) for the approaching toilette, was getting wet to the skin. "Do not!" but turning to an elderly female, who proved to be her attendant, exclaimed, "La! ma'am, you have got like any gamecock!" The mamma was wroth, and speedily dashed her daughter's vanity, by saying, "How is, why when you comes out a lady, can't you leave the fish at home?"

TOAST OF A SCOTCH PEER.—Lord K——, dining at Provost S——'s, and being the only peer present, one of the company gave for a toast, "The Duke of Buccleuch." As the peerage went round till it came to Lord K——, who said he would drink nothing above proof, and having tasted, was of more use than the whole. His lordship gave "The Earl of Leith."

IRISH SKILL.—Droll, though not very logical or conclusive, was the reply of the tipsy Irishman, who, on being accosted by one of the true religion of Mormon Square, was advised by a passenger to take himself home. "Ah, now, be my faith, I'm in the square. Isn't it going round and round, and when I see my own door come up, won't I pop into it in a jiffy."

A BROIL.—Lord Hertford, Mr. Croker, and Mr. James Smith were at an election contest. Croker was much annoyed carrying a boiled leg of mutton. The coffee disrupted the meat out of order, and the latter was looking at his wife with a countenance of anger and disappointment. "Why, Jem," said Croker, "what's Lord Hertford; "he does not see what an excellent broil he may have."

PARLIAMENTARY RETIREMENT.—In the reign of George the Second, one Crowle, a counsel of some eminence, made some observation which at an election contest was considered to reflect on the House itself. The House accordingly ordered him to attend, and he was sent for and received

NEW-YEAR'S EVE IN THE COUNTRY.

"HIS HAND UPON THE LATCH."

A YOUNG WIFE'S SONG.

My cottage home is fill'd with light
The long, long summer day;
But, ah! I never love the night,
And hail the sinking ray.
For eve restores me one whose smile

Doth more than morning's match—
And life afresh seems dawning while
His hand is on the latch!

When autumn fields are thick with sheaves,
And shadows earlier fall,
And grapes grow purple 'neath the eaves
Along our trellis'd wall—
I dreaming sit—the sleepy bird
Faint twittering in the thatch—
To wake to joy when soft is heard
His hand upon the latch!

In the short winter afternoon
I throw my work aside,
And through the lattice, while the moon
Shines mistily and wide,
On the dim upland paths I peer
In vain his form to catch—
I startle with delight, and hear
His hand upon the latch!

Yes; I am his in storm and shine;
For me he toils all day;
And his true heart I know is mine,
Both near me and away.
And when he leaves our garden gate
At morn, his steps I watch—
Then patiently till eve await
His hand upon the latch!

CHAPTER X.

At the appointed time I returned to Miss Havisham's, and my hesitating ring at the gate brought out Estella. She locked it after admitting me, as she had done before, and again preceded me into the dark passage where her candle stood. She took no notice of me until she had the candle in her hand, when she looked over her shoulder, superciliously saying, "You are to come this way to-day," and took me to quite another part of the house.

The passage was a long one, and seemed to pervade the whole square basement of the Manor House. We traversed but one side of the square, however, and at the end of it she stopped, and put her candle down and opened a door. Here the daylight reappeared, and I found myself in a small paved court-yard, the opposite side of which was formed by a detached dwelling-house, that looked as if it had once belonged to the manager or head clerk of the extinct brewery. There was a clock in the outer wall of this house. Like the clock in Miss Havisham's room, and like Miss Havisham's watch, it had stopped at twenty minutes to nine.

We went in at the door which stood open, and into a gloomy room with a low ceiling on the ground-floor at the back. There was some company in the room, and Estella said to me as she joined it, "You are to go and stand there, boy, till you are wanted."

"There" being the window, I crossed to it, and stood "there" in a very uncomfortable state of mind, looking out.

It opened to the ground, and looked into a most miserable corner of the neglected garden, upon a rank ruin of cabbage-stalks, and one box-tree that had been clipped round long ago, like a pudding, and had a new growth at the top of it out of shape and of a different color, as if that part of the pudding had stuck to the sauce-pan and got burned. This was my homely thought as I contemplated the box-tree. There had been some light over it overnight, and it lay nowhere else to my knowledge; but it had not entirely shed from the cold shadow of this bit of garden, and the wind caught it up in little eddies and threw it at the window, as if it pelted me for coming there.

I divined that my coming had stopped conversation in the room, and that its other occupants were looking at me: I could see nothing of the room except the shining of the fire in the window-glass, but I stiffened in all my joints with the consciousness that I was under close inspection.

There were three ladies in the room, and one gentleman. Before I had been standing at the window five minutes they somehow conveyed to me that they were all toadies and humbugs, but that each of them pretended not to know that the others were toadies and humbugs, because the admission that he or she did know it would have made him or her out to be a toady and humbug.

They all had a listless and dreary air of waiting somebody's pleasure, and the most talkative of the ladies had to speak quite a little to express a yawn. This lady, whose name was Camilla, very much reminded me of my sister, with the difference that she was older and (as I found when I caught sight of her) of a hunter cast of features. Indeed, when I knew her better, I began to think it was a Mercy she had any features at all, so very blank and high was the dead wall of her face.

"Poor dear soul!" said this lady, with an abruptness of manner quite my sister's. "No-body's enemy but his own!"

"It would be much more commendable to be somebody else's enemy," said the gentleman; "far more natural."

"Cousin John," observed another lady, "we are to love our neighbor."

"Sarah Pocket," returned Cousin John, "if a man is not his own neighbor, who is?"

Miss Pocket laughed, and Camilla laughed, and said (checking a yawn), "The idea!" But I thought they seemed to think it rather a good idea too.

The other lady, who had not spoken yet, said, gravely and emphatically, "Very true."

"Poor soul!" Camilla presently went on (I knew they had all been looking at me in the mean time), "he is so very strange! Would any one believe that when Tom's wife died he actually could not be induced to see the important pieces of children's having the deepest of trimmings to their mourning? Good Lord!" says he, 'Camilla, what can it signify so long as the poor bereaved little things are in black?' So like Matthew! The idea!"

"Good points in him; good points in him!" said Cousin John; "Heaven forbid I should deny good points in him! but he never had, and he never will have, any sense of the proprieties."

"You know I was obliged," said Camilla—"I was obliged to be firm. I said, 'I WILL NOT go for the credit of the family.' I told him that, without deep trimmings, the family was disgraced. I cried about it from breakfast till dinner. I impaired my digestion. And at last he flung out in his violent way, and said, with a D, 'Then do as you like!' Thank Goodness it will always be a consolation to me to know that I instantly went out in a pouring rain and bought the things."

"He paid for them, did he not?" asked Estella.

"It's not the question, my dear child, who paid for them," returned Camilla; I bought them. And I shall often think of that with peace when I wake up in the night."

The ringing of a distant bell, combined with the echoing of some cry or call along the passage by which I had come, interrupted the conversation, and caused Estella to say to me, "Now, boy!" On my turning round, they all looked at me with the utmost contempt, and, as I went out, I heard Sarah Pocket say, "Well! I am sure! What next?" and Camilla add, with indignation, "Was there ever such a fancy? The I—de—a!"

As we were going with our candle along the dark passage Estella stopped all of a sudden, and facing round said, in her taunting manner, with her face quite close to mine,

"Well?"

"Well, Miss?" I answered, almost falling over her, and checking myself.

She stood looking at me, and, of course, I stood looking at her.

"Am I pretty?"

"Yes; I think you are very pretty."

"Am I insulting?"

"Not so much so as you were last time," said I.

"Not so much so?"

"No."

She fired when she asked the last question, and she slapped my face with such force as she had when I answered it.

"Now?" said she, "you little coarse monster, what do you think of me now?"

"I shall not tell you."

"Because you are going to tell up stairs. Is that it?"

"No," said I, "that's not it."

"Why don't you cry again, you little wretch?"

"Because I'll never cry for you again," said I. Which was, I suppose, as false a declaration as ever was made; for I was inwardly crying for her then, and I know what I know of the pain she cost me afterward.

We went on our way up stairs after this episode; and, as we were going up, we met a gentleman coming down the way down.

"Who have we here?" asked the gentleman, stopping and looking at me.

"A boy," said Estella.

He was a burly man of an exceedingly dark complexion, with an exceedingly large head and a correspondingly large hand. He took my chin in his large hand and turned up my face to have a look at me by the light of the candle. He was prematurely bald on the top of his head, and had bushy black eyebrows that wouldn't lie down, but stood up bristling. His eyes were set very deep in his head, and were disagreeably sharp and suspicious. He had a very large watch-chain, and very strong black dots where his beard and whiskers would have been if he had let them. He was nothing to me, and I could have had no foresight then that he ever would be any thing to me, but it happened that I had this opportunity of observing him well.

"Boy of the neighborhood? Hey?" said he.

"Yes, Sir," said I.

"How do you come here?"

"Miss Havisham sent for me, Sir," I explained.

"Well! Behave yourself. I have a pretty large experience of boys, and you're a bad set of fellows. Behave yourself!" said he, biting the side of his great forefinger as he frowned at me, "you behave yourself!"

With those words he released me—which I was glad of, for his hand smelled of scented soap—and went his way down stairs. I wondered whether he could be a doctor; but no, I thought, he couldn't be a doctor, or he would have a quieter and more persuasive manner. There was not much time to consider the subject, for we were soon in Miss Havisham's room, where she and every thing else were just as I had left them. Estella left me standing near the door, and I stood there and saw Miss Havisham cast her eyes upon me from the dressing-table.

"So!" she said, without being startled or surprised; "the days have worn away, have they?"

"Yes, ma'am. To-day is—"

"There, there, there!" with the impatient movement of her fingers. "I don't want to know. Are you ready to play?"

I was obliged to answer in some confusion, "I don't think I am, ma'am."

"Not at cards again?" she demanded, with a searching look.

"Yes, ma'am; I could do that if I was wanted."

"Since this house strikes you old and grave, boy," said Miss Havisham, impatiently, "and you're unwilling to play, are you willing to work?"

I could answer this inquiry with a better heart than I had been able to find for the other proposition, and I said I was quite willing.

Then go into that opposite room, said she, pointing at the door behind me with her withered hand, "and wait there till I come."

I crossed the staircase landing, and entered the room she indicated. From that room, too, the one light was completely excluded, and it had an airless smell that was oppressive. A fire had been lately kindled in the dingy old-fashioned grate, and it was more distressed to see that than to burn up, and the reluctant smoke which hung in the room seemed colder than the clearer air—like our own marsh mist. Certain withery branches of candles on the high chimney-piece faintly lighted the chamber; or it would be more expressive to say faintly disturbed and troubled its darkness. It was spacious, and I dare say had once been handsome, but every discernible thing in it was covered with dust and mould and dropping to pieces. The most prominent object was a long table with a table-cloth spread on it, as if a feast had been in preparation when the house and the clocks all stopped together. An epergne or centre-piece of some kind was in the middle of this cloth; it was so heavily overlaid with cobwebs that its form was quite undistinguishable, and as I looked along the yellow expanse out of which I remember its seeming to grow like a black fungus, I saw speckled-legged spiders with blochy bodies running home to it, and running out from it, as if some circumference of the greatest public importance had just transpired in the spider community.

I heard the mice too rustling behind the panels, as if the same occurrence were important to their interests. But the black beetles took no notice of the agitation, and groped about the hearth in a ponderous elderly way, as if they were short-sighted and hard of hearing, and not on terms with one another.

These crawling things had fascinated my attention and I was watching them from a distance, when Miss Havisham laid a hand upon my shoulder. In her other hand she had a crutch-headed stick on which she leaned, and she looked like the Witch of the place.

"This," said she, pointing to the long table with her stick, "is where I will be laid when I am dead. They shall come and look at me here."

With some vague misgiving that she might get upon the table then and there and die at once, the complete realization of the ghastly waxwork at the Fair, I shrank under her touch.

"What do you think that is?" she asked me, again pointing with her stick; "that, where those cobwebs are?"

"I can't guess what it is, ma'am."

"It's a great cake. A bride-cake. Mine!"

She looked all round the room in a glaring manner, and then said, leaning on me while her hand twitched my shoulder, "Come, come, come! Walk me, walk me!"

I made out from this that the work I had to do was to walk Miss Havisham round and round the room. Accordingly, I started at once, and she leaned upon my shoulder, and we went away at a pace that might have been an imitation (founded on my first impulse under that roof) of Mr. Pumblechook's chaise-cart.

She was not physically strong, and after a little time she said "Slower!" Still we went at an impatient fitful speed, and as we went she twitched the hand upon my shoulder, and worked her mouth, and led me to believe that we were going round because her thoughts went fast. After a while she said, "Call Estella!" so I went out on the landing and roared that name as I had done on the previous occasion. When her light appeared I returned to Miss Havisham, and we started away again round and round the room.

If only Estella had come to be a spectator of our proceedings I should have felt sufficiently discontented; but as she brought with her the three ladies and the gentleman whom I had seen below, I didn't know what to do. In my politeness I would have stopped, but Miss Havisham twitched my shoulder, and we posted on—with a shamefaced consciousness on my part that they would think it was all my doing.

"Dear Miss Havisham," said Miss Sarah Pocket, "How well you look!"

"I do not," returned Miss Havisham. "I am yellow skin and bone."

"IT'S A GREAT CAKE.—A BRIDE-CAKE. MINE!"

Camilla brightened when Miss Pocket met with this rebuff; and she murmured, as she plaintively contemplated Miss Havisham, "Poor dear soul! Certainly not to be expected to look well, poor thing. The idea!"

"And how are you?" said Miss Havisham to Camilla. As we were close to Camilla then, I would have stepped as a matter of course, only that Miss Havisham wouldn't stop. We swept on, and I felt that I was highly obnoxious to Camilla.

"Thank you, Miss Havisham," she returned. "I am as well as can be expected."

"Why, what's the matter with you?" asked Miss Havisham, with exceeding sharpness.

"Nothing worth mentioning," replied Camilla. "I don't wish to make a display of my feelings, but I must be habitually thought of you more in the night than I am quite equal to."

"Then don't think of me," retorted Miss Havisham.

"Very easily said!" remarked Camilla, amiably repressing a sob, while a hitch came into her upper lip, and her tears overflowed. "Raymond is a witness what ginger and sal volatile I am obliged to take in the night. Raymond is a witness what nervous jerkings I have in my legs. Chalkey and nervous jerkings, however, are nothing new to me when I think with anxiety of those I love. If I could be less affectionate and sensitive I should have a better digestion and an iron set of nerves. I am sure I wish it could be so. But as to not thinking of you in the night—The idea!" Here a burst of tears.

The Raymond referred to I understood to be the gentleman present, and him I addressed as Mr. Camilla. He came to the rescue at this point, and said, in a consolatory and complimentary voice, "Camilla, my dear, it is well known that your family feelings are generally understemming you to the extent of making one of your legs shorter than the other."

"I am not aware," observed the grave lady whose voice I had heard but once, "that to think of any person is to make a great claim upon that person, my dear."

Miss Sarah Pocket, whom I now saw to be a little dry brown corrugated old woman, with a small face that might have been made of walnut shells, and a large mouth like a nut-cracker, without the wishers, supported this position by saying, "No, indeed, my dear. Hem!"

"Thinking is easy enough," said the grave lady.

"What is easier, you know?" assented Miss Sarah Pocket.

"Oh yes, no!" cried Camilla, whose fermenting feelings appeared to rise from her legs to her bosom. "It's all very true!" It's a weakness to be so sensitive, but I can't help it. No doubt my health would be much better if it was otherwise, still I wouldn't change my disposition if I could. It's the cause of many sufferings, but it's a consolation to know I possess it when I wake up in the night." Here another burst of feeling.

Miss Havisham and I had never stopped all this time, but kept going round and round the room, now brushing against the skirts of the visitors, and now giving them the whole length of the dismal chamber.

"There's Matthew!" said Camilla. "Never mixing with or marrying into us, and coming here to see how Miss Havisham is! I have taken to the sofa with my stay-lace cut, and have lain there hours insensible, with my head over the side, and my hair all down, and my feet I don't know where—"

"Much higher than your head, my love," said Mr. Camilla.

"I have gone off into that state hours and hours on account of Matthew's strange and inexplicable conduct, and nobody has thanked me."

"Really I must say I should think not!" interposed the grave lady.

"You see, my dear," added Miss Sarah Pocket (a blandly vicious personage), "the question to put to yourself is, who did you expect to thank you, my love?"

"Without expecting any thanks, or any thing of the sort," resumed Camilla, "I have remained in that room, hours and hours, and Raymond is a witness of the extent to which I have choked, and what the total inefficacy of ginger has been, and I have been heard at the neighbours' across the street, where the poor, mistaken children have even supposed it to be pigeons cooing at a distance—and now to be treated—" Here Camilla put her hand to her throat, and began to be quite chemical as to the formation of new combinations there.

When this same Matthew was mentioned Miss Havisham stopped me and herself and stood looking at the speaker. This change had a great influence in bringing Camilla's chemistry to a sudden end.

"Matthew will come and see me at last," said Miss Havisham, stemly, "when I am laid on that table. That will be his place—there," striking the table with her stick, "at my head! And yours will be there! And your husband's there! And Sarah Pocket's there! And Old Georgiana's there! Now you all know where to take your stations when you come to feast upon me, And now go!"

At the mention of each name she had struck the table with her stick in a new place. She now said, "Walk me, walk me!" and we went on again.

"I suppose there's nothing to be done," exclaimed Camilla, "but comply and depart. It's something to have seen the object of one's love and duty for even so short a time. I shall think of it with a melancholy satisfaction when I wake up in the night. I will think—I could have that comfort, but he sets it at defiance. I am determined not to make a display of my feelings, but it's very hard to be told one wants to feast on one's relations, and to be told to go. The bare idea!"

Mr. Camilla interposing, as Mrs. Camilla laid her hand upon her heaving bosom, that lady assumed an unnatural fortitude of manner which I supposed to be expressive of an intention to drop and choke without out of view, and kissing her hand to Miss Havisham, was escorted forth. Sarah Pocket and Georgiana contended who should remain last, but Sarah was too knowing to be outdone, and ambled round Georgiana with that artful slipperiness, that the latter was obliged to take precedence. Sarah Pocket then made her separate effect of departing with "Bless you, Miss Havisham dear!" and with a smile of forgiving pity on the old-witched countenance for the weaknesses of the rest.

While Estella was away lighting them down, Miss Havisham still walked with her hand on my shoulder, but more and more slowly. At last she stopped before the fire, and said, after muttering and looking at it some seconds:

"This is my birthday, Pip."

I was going to wish her many happy returns, when she lifted her stick.

"I don't suffer it to be spoken of. I don't suffer those who were here just now or any one to speak of it. They come here on the day, but the day does not refer to it."

Of course I made no further effort to refer to it.

On this day of the year, long before you were born, this heap of decay," stabbing with her crutched stick at the pile of cobwebs on the table but not touching it, "was brought here. It and I have worn away together. The mice have gnawed at it, and sharper teeth than teeth of mice have gnawed at me."

She laid the head of her stick against her heart as she stood looking at the table; she in her once white dress, all yellow and withered; the once white cloth all yellow and withered; every thing around in a state to crumble under a touch.

"When the pain is complete," said she, with a ghastly look, "and when they lay me dead in my bride's dress on the bride's table—which shall be done, and which will be the finished scene upon which passeth this shell of it is on this day!"

She stood looking at the table as if she stood looking at her own figure lying there. I remained quiet. She presently resumed, as if she had not remained quiet. It seemed to me that we continued thus for a long time. In the heavy air of the room, and like heavy air in which a storm is brooding, I felt a dread upon me, as if, even in the act of making fancy that Estella and I would presently begin to decay.

At length, not coming out of her distraught state by degrees but in an instant, Miss Havisham said, "Let me see you two play cards; why have you not begun?" And then I saw that Estella and I were to be her dogs, and sat down as before; I was bestgured as before; and again, as before, Miss Havisham watched us all the time, directed my attention to Estella's beauty, and made me notice it the more by tying her jewels on Estella's breast and hair.

Estella, for her part, likewise treated me as before; except that she did not condescend to speak. When we had played some half dozen games a day was beginning to dawn upon me. I was taken down into the yard to be fed in the former dog-like manner. There, too, I was again left to wander at my free will.

It is not much to the purpose whether a gate in that garden wall which I had scrambled up to peep over on the last occasion was, on that occasion, open or shut. Enough that I saw no gate then, and that I saw one now. As it stood open, and as I knew that Estella had let the visitors out that way, I passed out at the gate, with the boldness of a fortune-teller, and strolled all over it. It was quite a wilderness, and there were old melancholy-looking espaliers entirely overgrown with wood, in which seemed to their decline to have produced a spontaneous growth of feeble attempts at pieces of old hats and shoes, with an occasional weak old apple clinging to the leanness of a battered sauce-pan.

When I had exhausted the garden, and a speech-house which had the air of a fallen down grape-vine and some bottles, I found myself in the dismal corner upon which I had looked out of window. After considering it a little, I came to the conclusion that the house was now empty, I looked in at another window, and found myself, to my great surprise, exchanging a broad stare with a pale young gentleman with red eyelids and very light hair.

This pale young gentleman quickly disappeared, and reappeared beside me. He had been at his books when I had found myself starting at him, and I now saw that he was inky.

"Hallo!" said he, a young fellow!"

Hallos being a general observation which I have usually observed to be best answered by itself, I said "Hallo!" politely omitting young fellow.

"Who let you in?" said he.

"Miss Estella."

"Who gave you leave to prowl about?"

"Miss Estella."

"Come and fight," said the pale young gentleman.

What could I do but follow him? I have often asked myself the question since; but what else could I do? I have no doubt that if I had not, I was so astonished, that I followed where he led, as if I had been under a spell.

"Stop a minute, though," he said, wheeling round before we had gone many paces. "I ought to give you a reason for fighting, too. There it is!" In a most irritating manner he instantly slapped his hands under his armpits, and artfully flung one of his legs up behind him, pulled my hair, slapped his hands again, dipped his head, and ran it into my stomach.

The bull-like proceeding last mentioned, besides that it was unquestionably to be regarded in the light of a liberty, was particularly disagreeable just after bread and meat. I therefore hit out at him, and was going to hit out again, when he said, "Aha! Would you?" and began dancing backward and forward in a manner quite unparalleled within my limited experience.

"Leave off the game!" said he. Here he skipped backward and forward right. "Regular rules!" Here he skipped from his right leg on to his left. "Come to the ground, and go through the preliminaries!" Here he dodged backward and forward, and did all sorts of things, while I looked helplessly at him.

I was secretly afraid of him when I saw him so dexterous; but I felt morally and physically convinced that his light head or hair could have had no business in the pit of my stomach, and that I had a right to consider it irrelevant when so obtruded on my attention. Therefore I followed him, without a word, to a retired nook of the garden that lay behind the junction of two walls and screened by some rubbish. On his asking me if I was satisfied with the ground, and on my replying Yes, he begged my leave to absent himself for a moment and quickly returned with a bottle of water and a sponge dipped in vinegar. "Available for both," said he, placing them against the wall. And then fell to pulling off, not only his jacket and waistcoat, but his shirt too, in a manner at once light-hearted, businesslike, and lavish.

Although he did not look very healthy—having pimples on his face, and a breaking out at his mouth—these operations were performed quite by rule. I judged him to be about my own age, but he was much taller, and he had a way with his eyebrows when he pulled off his shirt, of peering and hitching himself expressive. For the rest he was a young gentleman in a gray suit (when not denuded for battle), with his elbows, knees, wrists, and heels considerably in advance of the rest of him as to development.

My heart failed me when I saw him squaring at me with every demonstration of mechanical nicety, and eying my anatomy as if he were minutely choosing his bone. I never have been so surprised in my life, than when I hit out at the first blow, and saw him lying on his back looking up at me with a bloody nose and his face exceedingly foreshortened.

But he was on his feet directly, and after sponging himself with a great show of dexterity, began squaring again. The second great surprise I have ever had in my life was seeing him on his back again, looking up at me out of a black eye.

His spirit inspired me with great respect. He seemed to have no strength, and he never once hit me hard, and he was always knocked down; but he would come up again with eminent, spongy himself or drinking out of the water-bottle, with the greatest satisfaction in seconding himself according to form, and fighting up to me with an air and a determination that made it really was going to do for me at last. He got heavily bruised, for I am sorry to record that the more I hurt him under I hit him, but he came up again and again and again, until at last he got a bad fall with the back of his head against the wall, which shook that crisis in our affairs. He got up and turned round and round confusedly a few times, not knowing where I was, but finally went on his knees to his bottle, and embraced it, as the manner time panting out, "That means you have won."

He seemed so brave and innocent, that, although I had taken no part in the contest, I felt but a gloomy satisfaction in my victory. Indeed, I go so far as to hope that I regarded myself while dressing as a species of savage young wolf, or other wild beast. However, I got dressed, gradually wiping my face at intervals, and I said, "Can I help you?" and he said, "No, thankee," and I said, "Good-afternoon," and he said, "Same to you."

When I got into the court-yard I found Estella waiting with the keys. But she neither asked me where I had been, nor why I had kept her waiting; and there was a bright flush upon her face as if she had been waiting for me to delight her. Instead of going straight to the gate, too, she stepped back into the passage, and beckoned me.

"Come here! You may kiss me, if you like."

I kissed her cheek as she turned it to me. I think I never before gone through a great deal to kiss her cheek. But I felt that the kiss was given to the coarse, common boy as a piece of money might have been, and that it was worth nothing.

What with the birthday visitors, and what with the cards, and what with the fight, my stay had lasted so long, that when I neared home the light on the spit of sand off the point on the marshes was gleaming against a black night-sky, and Joe's furnace was flinging a path of fire across the road.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Friday, December 21, in the Senate, the House Pacific Railroad bill was made the special order for the 31st of January. The bill to allow the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to cross the Potomac at Long Bridge was debated and read to cross the Potomac at Long Bridge was debated and read to cross the Potomac at Long Bridge was debated and read they will be respected no longer—not until every honorable, constitutional, and lawful effort to secure them is exhausted—will they consent to any efforts for a dissolution of the Union. The people of Maryland are among that time should be given and opportunity afforded for a fair and honorable adjustment of the difficulties and grievances of which they, more than the people of any other State, have a right to complain. He believes that a large majority of the people of that State desire such an adjustment, and he thinks it will be promptly effected. Until the effort is found vain he can not consent to any precipitate revolutionary action to aid in the dismemberment of the Union. When he is satisfied that there is no hope of adjustment, and not until then, will he exercise any power with which he is vested to afford even an opportunity for such a proceeding. Whatever powers he may have he will use only after full consultation with the other border States, since we and they, in the event of any dismemberment of the Union, will suffer more than all the others combined. He states that he is now in correspondence with the Governors of those States, and also with many who solicitude the indications of the course to be pursued by them. Whether this is made known to us or expected to take such steps as duty and the interests of the State demanded. He, consequently, unable to say whether or when the Legislature will be called.

SECESSION FEELING IN VIRGINIA.

A telegram, dated Norfolk, Virginia, December 25, says: The secession feeling here is at a high pitch. Ashland Hall was again crowded with citizens last night. Disunion speeches were delivered by Governor V. D. Grover and General John Tyler. The speeches were enthusiastically applauded. General Tyler concluded with the expression, "Let the Union go to hell!" which was received with loud and prolonged cheers.

Governor Letcher has completed his Message. He is in favor of a sovereign Confederacy if the Cotton States secede, and against the State Convention.

The secession excitement is rapidly increasing here.

ALABAMA FOR SECESSION.

A dispatch, dated Montgomery, Alabama, December 26, says: Returns from all the counties in the different sections of the State, thus far received, indicate that straight out secession has swept everything by fifty thousand in East, West, Middle, and Southern Alabama. Hardly one opposed to separate State action has been elected. The delegates to the Convention for immediate secession will be at least fifty. Alabama will follow South Carolina on the 10th of January. To-day passed off very quietly. No disturbance among the negro population, and no apprehension whatever. Governor Moore has issued his proclamation for an extra session of the Legislature, to convene on the 14th of January.

TEXAS FALLING INTO LINE.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, December 26, says: "The latest advices from Texas state that Governor Houston will convene an extra session of the Texas Legislature on the 21st of January, to consider the present crisis. The convention of the State will be held on the 28th of January. The secession feeling is in the ascendant."

MR. LINCOLN'S POSITION.

We read in the Albany Evening Journal: "Since the newspaper has made our recent letter to Lincoln the occasion of remark, it may not be improper to say that an interview with Mr. Lincoln has confirmed the views and strength ened our confidence in his fitness for the high position he is to occupy at his eminent qualifications for the new and untrust reposed in him; of his enlightened appreciation of the difficulties and dangers that surround him; of his desire that the Free States, if in any thing deficient, should fulfill their constitutional duties; of his determination to require from all the States the observance of the laws and obedience to the Constitution; and finally, of his earnest and kindly devotion to the principles and sympathies of Republicanism."

WHY LINCOLN WON'T SPEAK.

James P. Luse, of Indiana, publishes a narrative of an hour's conversation with Mr. Lincoln, in which he says:

"In reply to my inquiry as to the truth of the rumor that he intended to make public in some shape his views of public affairs at this juncture, he said that he had not much curiosity to know what kind of a pronunciamiento the South would submit to, but that he had to know what kind he would make, if he made one at all. 'If they would suppress Benjamin's speech because it contained extracts from my speeches, which he considered conservative, is it likely,' said he, 'that they would make public to the masses of the South any thing that I might have write?'"

SENATOR SEWARD ON SECESSION.

At the New England dinner at the Astor House, on Saturday night, Senator Seward said: "The Southern interested confederation. The people of South Carolina have invented secession. The wisdom of that device is never to be tried in comparison with the experience of the former. At the first appearance it exhibits this simplicity—that of a State which has in the Senate of the United States two seats, and in the House of Representatives seven members, each of them paid $3000 a year out of a treasury to which they contribute only a small proportion. State consisting of 700,000 people of all conditions, and of these 274,000 are white, going out of the Union to stand by itself, and sending to the Congress of the United States ambassadors, ministers to stand outside of the bar to negotiate for their interests, and to be paid by treasury, and having two Senators and six Representatives in Congress on an equality with all the other States. That is the experiment is to be tried by States on this continent—whether they will find it better to occupy such a position in Congress of the United States, and to have their representatives paid by the Union, for coming there, or to be left in lieu of their Send Commissioners to present their claims and their rights at the bar of the United States, with the privilege of voting on their own claims, and to be paid for by the State treasury. This is the only political invention of the times. I need not say to you that I do not think it is likely to be tried by many other States on this continent, or to be persevered in long, because it is manifestly very much inferior to the system that already exists."

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

He added:

"Now, in all this business I propose that we shall keep our own virtue and our own temper, in public and private as remembering that men must differ, brethren even in the same family must differ, and if we can be so entirely cool, and entirely calm, and entirely kind, a debate will ensue which will be kind to the last, and it will prove very soon that either we are wrong, and we shall come over to you (loud laughter), or that you are right, and they will have to acquiesce and come back here [renewed laughter with us. (Loud applause.) I do not want to anticipate any questions. We have a great deal of patriotism and a great many statesmen who propose to know at once what is to be done, and what is to be done with the measures proposed to be; whether they propose to coerce their Southern brethren into allegiance. Nothing of the sort, my friends, except as they may rightfully ask what will be the value of forcibly which is compelled. All that I have to say on that subject is, it was so as long ago as the time of Sir Thomas More, who discovered it and set down his discovery in his writings. You will find it there; that there is always in a great nation two governments, and that while there were a very few that know how to instruct others, there were a very many who knew how to whip them. [Applause and laughter.] I have proposed no questions on that subject, and I have no complaints, to redress them if to expect them to be withdrawn if they are unreasonable, and if those States are stronger to-day than they were when that Union was made, and that those necessities are enduring while the passions of men are short-lived and ephemeral. I believe that secession was stronger on the night of the 6th day of November, when a President and Vice-President who were unacceptables were elected, than it is now. That is now some fifty days since. I believe that every day that has set since that time has set upon mollified passions and prejudices; and that we shall only give it time, after more sane will give you a much better and more cheerful atmosphere."

GREAT ROBBERY IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Washington City was, on 23d, thrown into a high state of excitement by the announcement that the Department of the Interior had been robbed of a very large amount of bonds and stocks held in trust for the benefit of different Indian tribes under our treaties with them. Secretary Thompson, who arrived in Washington on Saturday night, immediately instituted an investigation, and a clerk named Gerhard Bailey, owning to the charge, confessed to having appropriated them to his own use. It seems that Bailey, according to his own statement, gave them to Russell, of Russell & Co., army contractors, in exchange for Government drafts in favor of the Indians. He confessed to have been stolen to $870,000. Russell has been arrested and is held in jail at Washington. The bonds stolen consist of Missouri, Illinois, Tennessee, and North Carolina.

EXCITEMENT AT PITTSBURGH.

The people of Pittsburgh and vicinity were thrown into a state of the greatest excitement on Monday by a revelation of the fact that a number of Secessionists and Disunionists were arranging for the shipment of seventy-eight heavy guns to Newport, Kentucky, for the purpose of arming Island, near the Kelzes, from the Allegheny Arsenal—the spot, and object known to but few of the persons whom they could be seized by the Secessionists. It appears that the forts at the point of destination are very weak, and have but any guns, and that these in question were originally designed for the defense of the coasting and harbors. However, the citizens of Pittsburgh think it better that the guns should remain where they are, and measures are being taken to retain them.

PERSONAL.

Hon. David Wilmot, of Pennsylvania, visited Mr. Lincoln on 24th, and we are informed over the wires that Mr. Wilmot has been offered a place in the Cabinet, and will undoubtedly represent Pennsylvania in some capacity. what, however, is still enveloped in the mysteries of the future.

His Honor the Mayor was on Saturday united to Miss Mills in the hotel of the Metropolitan Railroad, after the ceremony started on a Southern tour. Mr. Peck sets to his forces tenare during his absence.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

FRENCH OPINION ON OUR SECESSION QUESTION.

The Paris Presse has the following:

"France, who abolished slavery herself, can not even seem to protect it in other countries. Such an idea even would do her a serious injury. The election of South Carolina must, then, be persuaded that if ever they should form the Federal Government the moral support that they being proprietors of slaves, and by virtue of the principle, acknowledged for their States by the Washington Acts of Facto shall be recognized by the Governments of Europe and America.

* * * * * * *

"The rupture of the Union will entail more ruin than benefits: for while the commerce of England and the whole of Europe will be injured, that of the North, the real strength of the New Confederation, the Northern Confederation will be annihilated. It is the Southern cotton which will furnish a counterpoise to the Southern agreement with France. The Union will become a Federation of Republics. Having as allies slave proprietors. we will be forced, in the future, to defend their interests and to tolerate their plan of annexing Mexico and the whole of the South. North up to this time has alone prevented.

"France will not be indifferent to such a course. She ought not to allow the Southern States to deceive themselves in this matter. Their separation from the Northern States would be a misfortune for them, and would be a misfortune for the civilization of the world. The American Union is a power which is useful to the United States, Spanish, and Italian navies, to prevent a single Power from dominating the seas.

"France was the first ally of the United States—we hope that she will be their counselor, and expose the abyss into which they are hastening. We hope that she will not be buried forever a Past glorious and a Future most hopeful. For the American Union is synonymous with liberty. It is the murder of a great nation and a great principle. France can not lend a hand to such a crime. Her glorious past has helped to make this people—she will never help to destroy it.

"Such are, we are convinced, the sentiments of our Government."

ITALY.

ARRIVAL OF THE KING AT PALERMO.

Naples, December 15.—The arrival of the King in Palermo, on Saturday morning, at 8 A. M., was the occasion of indescribable enthusiasm. The people insisted on taking the horses from the carriage, and drawing it to the city. It is calculated that upward of 400,000 persons had assembled to receive him. His Majesty alighted at the Cathedral, where he was received by the Archbishop. On arriving at the Royal Palace he received the Generals, Admirals, authorities, and afterward the deputations from the various municipalities of Sicily.

A LAST PROCLAMATION FROM GARIBALDI.

The Nationalities, of Turin, publishes the following proclamation by Garibaldi:

"ITALY AND VICTOR EMANUEL! The Italians must not on any account allow the Italian question to be complicated in the only indispensable man in Italy, around whom all the Italians can rally—Victor Emanuel. I do not care whether the Minister's name be Cavour or Rattazzi—the latter is preferable; but what I care for, and what all Italians must insist upon, is that he shall be on the 26th of March, 1861, Victor Emanuel be at the head of 500,000 soldiers.

GARIBALDI.

Nicastro 18."

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE GARIBALDI.

Passengers by the steamship Canada say that it was rumored at Queenstown that Garibaldi had been assassinated.

The papers by the Canada report that Colonel Dunn, of the Sicilian army, had been arrested on a charge of an assassinate him. The rumor of the assassination of Garibaldi probably arose from the circumstance.

CHINA.

THE FALL OF PEKIN.

The following is the latest Government telegram respecting affairs in China. It is dated Alexandria, November 6th, and comes by the Overland Telegraph through Europe:

"Two of the gates of Pekin are in our hands. Parkes and Lock have been returned to us. Captain Anderson and Mr. De Norman have died during their long and cruel treatment. Brabazon and Bouby are unaccounted for. The Emperor's Summer Palace has been taken and sacked, affording immense spoil. The Emperor has fled into Tartary. The forces are to winter at Pekin and Tien-tsin. Two Embassadors are at military head-quarters.

A Pekin letter of the 19th October confirms all that is stated in the above. It says that, on the 13th Pekin surrendered to the Allies on the 13th, yielding to all demands. Indemnity was ready when demanded. The Tartar army fled with the Emperor, and none of the enemy were visible in Pekin. All the Allies were encamped on the walls. Lord Elgin and Baron Gros were at Pekin. Little hope was entertained of Brabazon, Bouby (the Times Correspondent), or the French officers missing.

PEACE AT LAST.

A brief dispatch from Pekin, received in London via St. Petersburg, announces the cessation of hostilities, and an exchange of ratification of peace on the 25th of November. The Allies were evacuating the capital, and the Emperor would shortly return to it.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SEA.

Dickens's Christmas Story.

Mr Published from advance Proof-sheets purchased from the Author for "Harper's Weekly."

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST WEEK'S NUMBER.]

MINE is my brother's Ghost Story. It happened to my brother about thirty years ago, while he was wandering, sketch-book in hand, among the High Alps, picking up subjects for an illustrated work on Switzerland. Having entered the Oberland by the Brunig Pass, and filled his port-folio with what he used to call "bits" from the neighborhood of Meyringen, he went over the Great Scheideck to Grindlewald, where he arrived one dusky September evening, about three quarters of an hour after sunset. There had been a fair that day, and the place was crowded. In the best inn there was not an inch of space to spare—there were only two inns at Grindlewald thirty years ago—so my brother went to one at the end of the covered bridge next the church, and there, with some difficulty, obtained the promise of a pile of rugs and a mattress, in a room which was already occupied by three other travelers.

The Alps are a primitive locality, half farm, half inn, with great rambling cellarlike outside, and a huge general room, like a barn. At the upper end of this room stood long stoves, like metal countries, laden with pots and pans, glowing underneath like furnaces. At the lower end, smoking, supping, and chatting, were congregated some thirty or forty guides, sight-seeing tourists, chardrivers, and guides. Among these my brother took his seat, and was served, like the rest, with a bowl of coffee, a loaf of beef, a flagon of country wine, and a loaf made of Indian corn. Presently a huge St. Bernard dog came and laid his nose upon my brother's arm. In the mean time he had left open his sketch-book. Italian youths, bronzed and dark-eyed, near whom he happened to be seated. They were Florentines. Their names, Pietro Stefano and Battisto Martini. They had been traveling for some months on commission, selling cameos, mosaics, sulphur casts, and the like. They had been to Berne, and were now on their way to Interlaken and Geneva. Weary of the cold North, they longed, like children, for the moment when they could take them back to their own blue hills and gray-green olives; to their workshop on the Ponte Vecchio, and their home upon the Arno.

It was quite a relief to my brother, on going up to bed, to find that these youths were to be two of his fellow-lodgers. The third was already there, and sound asleep in a bed next to the wall. They scarcely looked at this third. They were all tired, and all anxious to rise at daybreak, having agreed to walk together over the Wengern Alp as far as Lauterbrunnen. So my brother and the two youths exchanged a brief good-night, and, before many minutes, were all far away in the land of dreams as their unknown companion.

My brother slept profoundly—so profoundly that, being roused in the morning by a clamor of merry voices, he started up dreamily in his rugs, and wondered where he was.

"Good-day, signor," cried Battisto. "Here is a fellow-traveler getting up before we are ourselves."

"Christien Baumann, native of Kanderstep, musical-box maker by trade, stands five feet eleven of his stout young limbs at present at service to command," said the sleeper of the night before.

He was as fine a young fellow as one would wish to see. Tall, broad, and strong, and well-proportioned, with curling brown hair, and bright, honest, fearless eyes.

"Capital, indeed," said Battisto. "We sold cameos and mosaics yesterday for nearly fifty francs."

"Oh, you sell cameos and mosaics, you two! Show me your cameos, and I will show you my musical boxes. I have such pretty ones, with colored views of Geneva and Chillon on the lids, playing two, four, six, and even eight tunes. Bah! I will give you a concert!"

And with that he unstrapped his pack, displayed his little boxes on the table, and wound them up, one after the other, to the delight of the Italians.

"I make up to nine hundred every one," said he, proudly. "Is it not pretty music? I sometimes set one of them when I go to bed at night, and fall asleep listening to it. I am sure, then, to have pleasant dreams! But let us see your cameos. Perhaps I may buy one for Mere, if they are not too dear. Marie is my sweet-heart, and we are to be married next week."

"Next week!" exclaimed Stefano. "That is very soon. Battisto has a sweet-heart also, up at Longvenetz; but they will have to wait a long time before they can buy the ring."

Battisto blushed like a girl.

"Hush, brother!" said he. "Show the cameos to Christien, and give your tongue a holiday!"

But Christien was not so to be put off.

"What is your name?" said he. "Tush! Battisto, you must tell me her name! Is she pretty? Is she dark or fair? Do you often see her when you are at home? Is she very fond of you? Is she as fond of you as Marie is of me?"

"Nay, how should I know that?" asked the sobered Battisto. "She loves me, and I love her—that is all."

"And her name?"

"Margherita."

"A charming name! And she is herself as pretty as her name, I'll engage. Did you say she was fair?"

"I said nothing about it one way or the other," said Battisto, unlocking a green box clamped with iron, and taking out tray after tray of his pretty wares. "There! Those pictures all inlaid in little bits are Florentine mosaics—three flowers on a black ground are Florentine. The ground is of hard, dark stone, and the flowers are made of thin slices of agate, onyx, cornelian, and so forth. Those forget-me-nots, for instance, are bits of turquoise, and that poppy is cut from a piece of coral."

"I like the Roman ones best," said Christien. "What place is that with all the arches?"

"This is the Coliseum, and the one next to it is St. Peter's. But we Florentines care little for the Roman work. It is not half so fine or so valuable as ours. The Romans make their mosaics of composition."

"Composition or no, I like the little landscapes best," said Christien. "There is a lovely one, with a bridge, a building, and a tree, and mountains at the back. How I should like that one for Marie!"

"You may have it for eight francs," replied Battisto; "we sold two such mosaics as those for each. It represents the tomb of Caius Cestius, near Rome."

"A tomb!" echoed Christien, considerably dismayed. "Diable! That would be a dismal present to one's bride."

"She never guess that it was a tomb if you did not tell her," suggested Stefano.

Christien shook his head.

"That would be next door to deceiving her," said he.

"Nay," interposed my brother, "the owner of that tomb has been dead these eighteen or nineteen hundred years. One almost forgets that he was ever buried in it."

"Eighteen or nineteen hundred years? Then he was a heathen?"

"Undoubtedly, if by that you mean that he lived before Christ."

Christien's face lighted up immediately.

"Oh, that settles the question," said he, pulling out his little canvas purse, and paying his money down at once. "A heathen's tomb is as good as no tomb at all. I'll have it put into a brooch for her, at Interlaken. Tell me, Battisto, what gift you take home to Italy for your Margherita?"

Battisto laughed, and chinked his eight francs. "That depends on trade," said he; "if we make good profits at Interlaken and Chrisbruck I may take her a Swiss muslin from Berne; but we have already been away seven months, and we have hardly made a hundred francs over and above our expenses."

And with this the talk turned upon general matters. The Italians looked away their treasures, Christien restrapped his pack, and my brother and all went down together, and breakfasted in the open air outside the inn.

It was a magnificent morning: cloudless and sunny, with a cool breeze that rustled in the vine upon the porch, and flecked the table with shifting shadows of the green leaves. All around and about them stood the great mountains, with their blue-white glaciers bristling down to the verge of the pastures, and the pine-woods creeping darkly up their sides. To the left, the Wetterhorn; to the right, the Eigher; straight before them, dazzling and turquoise-blue, an obelisk of frosted silver, the Schreckhorn, or Peak of Terror. Behind ever, they bade farewell to their hostess, and, shouldering staff in hand, took the path to the Wengern Alp. Half an hour's light and shadow, they the quiet valley, dotted over with farms, and traversed by a torrent that rushed, milk-white, from its prison in the glacier. The three lads walked briskly in advance, their voices chiming together every now and then in chorus of laughter. Somehow my brother fell behind them. He was behind, and, plucking a little red flower from the bank, he stitched it hurry away with the torrent, like a life on the stream of time. He was his heart so heavy, and why were their hearts so light?

As the day went on my brother's melancholy and birth of the young men seemed to increase. Full of youth and happiness, and of the joyous future, and built up pleasant castles in the air. Battisto, grave more communicative, admitted that to-morrow, Margherita's father, a master mosaicist, would fulfill the dearest dream of his life. Stefano, not being in love, preferred to travel. Christien, meanwhile, as the most prosperous, declared that it was his darling ambition to rent a farm in his native Kander Valley, and lead the contented life of a Swiss boor. As for the musical-box trade, he said, one should live in Geneva to make it answer; and, for his part, he loved the pine-forests and the snow-peaks better than all the cities in Europe. Marie, he knew, had born among the mountains, and it would break her heart if she thought she were to live in Geneva all her life. And so he talked on, and my brother let him. Starting thus the morning were on to noon, and the party rested a while in the shade of a clump of gigantic firs festooned with trailing banners of gray-green moss.

Here they ate their lunch, to the silvery music of one of Christien's musical boxes, and my brother heard the sullen echo of an avalanche far away on the shoulder of the Jungfrau.

Then they went on again in the burning afternoon, to heights where the Alp-rose falls from the sterile steep, and the brown lichen grows more and more scantily among the stones. Here only the bleached and barren skeletons of a forest of dead pines varied the desolate monotony; and high on the summit of the pass stood a little solitary inn, between them and the sky.

At this inn they rested again, and drank to the health of Christien and his bride in a jug of country wine. He was in uncontrollable spirits, and shook hands with them all, over and over again.

"By nightfall to-morrow," said he, "I shall hold her once more in my arms! It is now nearly two years since I came home to see her, at the end of my apprenticeship. Now I am foreman, with a salary of thirty francs a week, and well able to marry."

"Thirty francs a week!" echoed Battisto. "Corpo di Bacco! that is a princely fortune."

Christian's face beamed.

"Yes," said he, "we shall be very happy; and by-and-by—who knows?—we may end our days in the Kinder Thal, and bring up our children to succeed us. Ah! if Marie knew that I should be there to-morrow night how delighted she would be!"

"How so, Christian?" said my brother. "Does she not expect you?"

"Not a bit of it. She has no idea that I can be there till the day after to-morrow—nor could I if I took the road all round by Untersoen and Frütigen. I mean to sleep to-night at Lauterbrunnen, and to-morrow morning shall strike across the Tschlingel glacier to Kandersteg. If I rise a little before daybreak I shall be at home by sunset."

At this moment the path took a sudden turn, and began to descend in sight of an immense perspective of very distant valleys. Christian flung his cap into the air and uttered a great shout.

"Look!" said he, stretching out his arms as if to embrace all the dear familiar scene; "look! Look! There are the hills and the valleys of Interlaken; and here, below the precipices on which we stand, lies Lauterbrunnen! God be praised, when his eyes open on their land in their natural!"

The Italians smiled at each other, thinking their own Arno Valley far more fair; but my brother's heart warmed to the boy, and offered his thanks—giving it to the spirit which accepts all beauty as a birth-right and an inheritance. And now their course lay across an immense green slope, dotted with corn-fields and meadows, and studded with substantial homesteads built of old brown wood, with huge sheltering eaves, and strings of Indian corn hanging like golden ingots along the carven balconies. Blue whortleberries grew beside the footway, and now and then they came upon a wild gentian, or a pink-tipped lingonberry. Then the path became a mere zigzag on the face of the precipice, and in less than half an hour they reached the lowest level of the valley. The growing afternoon had not yet faded from the uppermost pines when they were all dining together in the parlor of a little inn looking to the Staubfluss. In the evening my brother wrote letters, while the three lads strolled about the village. At nine o'clock they bade each other good-night, and went to their several rooms.

Weary as he was, my brother found it impossible to sleep. The same unaccountable melancholy still possessed him, and what at last it dropped into an uneasy slumber, it was but to start over and over again from frightful dreams, faint with a nameless terror. Toward morning he fell into a profound sleep, and never woke until the day was fast advancing toward noon. He then found, to his regret, that Christian had long since gone. He had risen before daybreak, breakfasted by candlelight, and started off in the gray dawn—"as merry," said the host, "as a fiddler at a fair."

Stefano and Battisto were still willing to see my brother, being charged by Christian with a friendly farewell message to him, and an invitation to the wedding. They, too, were afraid, and meant to go; so my brother agreed to meet them at Interlaken on the following Tuesday, whence they might walk to Kandersteg by easy stages, reaching their destination on the Thursday morning, in time to go to church with the bridal party. My brother then bought some of the little Florentine cameos which the two boys every good fortune, and watched them down the road till he could see them no longer.

Left now to himself, he wandered out with his sketch-book, and spent the day in the upper valley; at sunset he dined alone in his chamber, by the light of a single lamp. His meal dispatched, he drew nearer to the fire, took out a pocket edition of Goethe's Essays on Art, and promised himself some hours of pleasant reading. Ah, how well I know that busy book, in its faded cover, and how often I have heard him describe that lonely evening!) The night had by this time set in cold and wet. The dancing legs shipped on the hearth, and a wailing wind swept down the valley, bearing the rain in sudden gusts against the panes. My brother soon found that to read was impossible. His attention wandered incessantly. He read the same sentence over and over again, unconscious of its meaning, and let his long trains of thought leading far into the dim past.

Thus the hours went by, and at eleven o'clock he heard the doors closing below as the household retiring to rest. He determined to yield no longer to this dreaming apathy. He threw on fresh logs, trimmed the lamp, and took several turns about the room. Then he opened the casement, and suffered the rain to beat against his face, and the wind to ruffle his hair, as it ruffled the acacia leaves in the garden below. Seven minutes passed thus, and when, at length, he closed the window and came back into the room, his face and hair and all the front of his shirt were thoroughly saturated. To unstrap his knapsack and take out a dry shirt was, of course, his first impulse—to drop the garment, listen eagerly, and start to his feet, breathless and bewildered, was the next.

For, borne fitfully upon the outer breeze, now sweeping past the window, now dying in the distance, he heard a well-remembered strain of melody, subtle and silvery as the "sweet airs" of Prospero's isle, and proceeding unmistakably from the musical-box which had, the day before, accompanied the lunch under the fir-trees of the Wengern Alp!

Had Christian come back, and was it thus that he announced his return? If so, where was he? Under the window? Outside in the corridor? Sheltering in the porch, and waiting for admittance? My brother threw open the casement again, and called him by his name.

"Christian! Is that you?"

All without was intensely silent. He could hear the last gust of wind and rain moaning farther and farther away upon its wild course down the valley, and the pine-trees shivering, like living things.

"Christian!" he said again, and his own voice seemed to echo strangely on his ear. "Speak! Is it you?"

Still no one answered. He leaned out into the dark night, and could see nothing—not even the outline of the porch below. He began to think that his imagination had deceived him, when suddenly the strain burst forth again; this time, apparently in his own chamber.

As he turned, expecting to find Christian at his elbow, the sounds broke off abruptly, and a sensation of intensest cold seized him in every limb—not the mere chill of nervous terror, not the moral physical sensation produced by wind and rain, but a deadly freezing of every vein, a paralysis of every nerve, an appalling consciousness that in a few moments more the lungs must cease to play, and the heart to beat! Powerless to speak or stir, he closed his eyes, and believed that he was dying.

This strange faintness lasted but a few seconds. Gradually the vital warmth returned, and, with it, strength to close the window, and stagger to a chair. As he did so, he found the breast of his shirt dripping stiff and frozen, and the rain clinging in solid icicles upon his hair.

He looked at his watch. It had stopped at twenty minutes before twelve. He went to the thermometer from the chimney-piece, and found the mercury at sixty-eight. Heavenly powers! How were these things explained? He in a temperature of eighty degrees, and with a large fire blazing on the hearth!

He poured out half a tumbler of cognac, and drank it at a draught. Going to bed was out of the question. He felt that he dared not sleep—that he scarcely dared to think. All he could do was to endure his misery, pile on more logs, wrap himself in his blankets, and sit all night in an easychair before the fire.

My brother had not long sat thus, however, before the warmth, and probably the nervous reaction, drew him off to sleep. In the morning he found himself lying on the floor, and during able to remember the last hour or when he reached it.

It was again a glorious day. The rain and wind were gone, and the Silverhorn and all the Alps of Valley Habkern were unclouded sky. Looking out upon the sunshine, he almost doubted the events of the night, and but for the evidence of his watch, which still—for twenty minutes before twelve, would have been disposed to treat the whole matter as a dream. As it was, he attributed more than half of it to the effects of imagination, unwilling to pass another night at the house of the dead, and made up his mind to proceed that morning to Interlaken. While he was yet loitering over his breakfast, and considering whether he should walk the whole way or take a one-horse vehicle, a char came rapidly up to the inn door, and a young man jumped out.

"Why, Battisto!" exclaimed my brother, in astonishment, as he came into the room; "what brings you here to-day? Where is Stefano?"

Something there was in his voice, something in his face, both strange and startling.

"What is the matter?" said my brother, breathlessly. "He is not ill? No accident has happened?"

Battisto shook his head, glanced furtively up and down the passage, and closed the door.

"Stefano is well, signor; but—but a circumstance has occurred—a circumstance so strange!—Signor, do you believe in spirits?"

"In spirits, Battisto?"

"Ay, signor! Do you believe in the spirit of any man, dead or living, appealed to human ears, the spirit of Christian came to me last night, at twenty minutes before twelve o'clock!"

"At twenty minutes before twelve o'clock!" repeated my brother.

"I was in bed, signor, and Stefano was sleeping in the same room. I had gone up quite warm, and had fallen asleep, full of pleasant thoughts. By-and-by, although I had plenty of bed-clothes, and a cozy corner, I grew cold—frozen with cold and scarcely able to breathe. I tried to call to Stefano, but I had no power to utter the slightest sound. I thought my last moment was come. All at once I heard a scraping under the window—a sound which I knew to be Christien's musical box; and it played as it played when he lunched under the fir-trees—except that it was more solemn and strange and melancholy and most solemn to hear—awful to hear! Then, signor, it grew fainter and fainter—and then I heard no more. I grew warm, and fell asleep. When it ceased, my frozen blood grew warm again, and I cried out to Stefano. When I told him what had happened he declared I had been only dreaming. I made him strike a light, that I might look at my watch. It pointed to twenty minutes before twelve, and had stopped there: and strange still—Stefano's watch had done the very same. Now tell me, signor, do you believe that there is any meaning in this, or do you think, as Stefano persists in thinking, that it was all a dream?"

"What is your own conclusion, Battisto?"

"My own conclusion, signor, is that some harm has happned to poor Christien on the glacier, and that his spirit came to me last night."

"Battisto, he shall have help if living, or rescue for his poor corpse if dead; for I, too, believe that all is not well."

And with this my brother told him briefly what had occurred to himself in the night; dispatched messengers for the three best guides in Lauterbrunnen; and prepared ropes, ice-hatchets, alpenstocks, and all the necessaries for a perilous glacier expedition. Hasten as he would, however, it was nearly mid-day before the party started.

Arriving in about half an hour at a place called Stechelberg, they left the char, in which they had traveled so far, at a châlet, and ascended a steep path in full view of the Breithorn glacier, which rose up to the left like a battlemented wall of solid ice. The way now lay for some time among pastures and pine-forests. Then they came to a little colony of châlets, called Steinberg, where they filled their water-bottles, got their ropes in readiness, and prepared for the Tschlingel glacier. A few minutes more and they were on the ice.

At this point the guides called a halt and consulted together. One was for striking across the lower glacier toward the left, and reaching the upper ledge by the rocks which bound it on the south. The other two preferred the north or right side; and this my brother finally took. The sun was now pouring down with almost tropical intensity, and the surface of the ice, which was broken into long, treacherous fissures, smooth as glass and blue as the summer sky, was both difficult and dangerous. Silently and cautiously they went, tied together at intervals of about three yards each: with two guides in front, and the third bringing up the rear. Turning presently to the right, they found themselves at the foot of a steep rock, some forty feet in height, up which they must climb to reach the upper glacier. The only way in which Battisto or my brother could hope to do this, was by the help of a rope steadied from below and from above. The guides accordingly clambered up the face of the crag by notches in the surface, and one remained below. The rope was then let down, and my brother prepared to go up. As he planted his foot in the first notch a smothered cry from Battisto arrested him.

"Santa Maria! Signor! Look yonder!"

My brother looked, and there (for over afterward declared), as surely as there is a heaven above us all, he saw Christien Baumann standing in the sunlight on a ledge of rock a hundred yards distant! Almost in the same moment that my brother recognized him he was gone. He neither faded nor sank—he simply moved out of sight, but was simply gone as if he had never been. Pale as death, Battisto fell upon his knees and covered his face with his hands. My brother, awe-stricken and speechless, leaned against the rock and felt that the object of his journey was but too fatally accomplished. As for the guides, they could not conceive what had happened.

"Did you see nothing?" asked my brother and Battisto, both together.

But the men had seen nothing, and the one who had remained below said, "What should I see but the ice and the sun?"

To this my brother made no other reply than by announcing his intention to have a certain crevasse, from which he had not once removed his eyes since he saw the figure standing on the brink, explored. Battisto rose and went a step further, whereupon the two men came down from the top of the crag, resumed the ropes, and followed my brother cautiously. Within the narrow end of the fissure he paused, and drove his alpenstock firmly into the ice. It was an unusually low crevasse and at first a mere gaping, widening gradually as it went, and reaching down to unknown depths of dark deep blue, fringed with long pendent icicles like diamond stalactites. Before they had followed the course of the crevasse for more than ten minutes the youngest of the guides uttered a hasty exclamation.

"I see something!" cried he. "Something dark, wedged in the teeth of the crevasse, a great way down?"

They all saw it: a mere indistinguishable mass, almost closed over by the ice-walls at their feet. My brother offered a hundred francs to the man who would go down and bring it up. They all hesitated.

"We don't know what it is," said one.

"Perhaps it is only a dead chamois," suggested another.

Their apathy enraged him.

"It is no chamois," he said, angrily. "It is the body of Christien Baumann, native of Kandersteg. And, by Heaven, if you are all too cowardly to make the attempt I will go down myself!"

The youngest guide threw off his hat and coat, tied a rope about his waist, and took a hatchet in his hand.

"I will go, monsieur," said he; and without another word suffered himself to be lowered in. My brother turned away. A sickening anxiety came upon him, and presently he heard the dull echo of the hatchet far down in the ice. Then there was a call for another rope, and then—the men all drew aside in silence, and my brother saw the youngest guide descending more beside the chasm, flushed and trembling, with the body of Christien lying at his feet.

Poor Christien! They made a rough bier with their ropes and alpenstocks, and carried him, with great difficulty, back to Steinberg. There they got additional help from Lauterbrunnen, where they laid him in the char, and so brought him on to Lauterbrunnen. The next day my brother made it his sad business to preside at the body to Kandersteg, and prepare the minds for its arrival. To this day, though all these things happened thirty years ago, he can not bear to recall Marie's despair, or all the mourning that in Kander Thal at his way to the Ghemmi, he saw her grave, beside the grave of Christien Baumann, in the village burial-ground.—This is my brother's Ghost Story.

The chairman now announced that the clock declared the tenttorum spun out, and that the meeting was dissolved. Yet even then the young fisherman could not refrain from once more asking his question. This occasioned the Gentlemen King Arthurs, as they got on their hats and great-coats, evidently to regard him as a young fisherman who was touched in his head, and some of them even cherished the idea that question was his keeper.

As no man dared to awake the mighty Parvis, it was resolved that a heavy member of the society should fall against him as it were by accident, and immediately withdraw to a safe distance. The experiment was so happily accomplished that Mr. Parvis started to his feet on the best terms with himself, as a light sleeper whose wits never left him, and who could always be broad awake on occasion. Quite an airy jocundity sat upon this respectable man in consequence; and he rallied the bricket-maker on the fraternal theme, being a sleepy-head," with an amount of humor previously supposed to be quite incompatible with his responsible circumstances in life.

Gradually the society departed into the cold night, and the captain and his young companion were left alone. The captain had so refreshed himself by rubbing his hands with every kind of an amazing extent that he was in no hurry to go to bed.

"To-morrow morning," said the captain, "we must find out the lawyer and the clergyman here; they are the people to consults on our business. And I'll be up and out early, and asking questions of every body I see; thereby propagating at least one of the Institutions of my native country."

As the captain was slapping his leg, the landlord appeared with two small candlesticks.

"Your room," said he, "is at the top of the house. An excellent bed, but you'll hear the wind."

"I've heard it afore," replied the captain. "Come and make a passage with me, and you shall hear it."

"It's considered to blow here," said the landlord.

"Weather gets its young strength here," replied the captain; "goes into training for the Atlantic Ocean. Yours are little winds just beginning to feel their legs. Make a voyage here with me, and I'll show you a grown-up one out on business. But you haven't told my friend where he lies."

"It's the room at the head of the stairs, before you take the second staircase through the wall," returned the landlord. "You can't mistake it. It's a double-bedded room; because there's no other."

"The room where the sea-faring man is?" said the captain.

"The room where the sea-faring man is."

"I hope he may'n't finish telling his story in his sleep," muttered the captain. "I shall have into the room where the sea-faring man is, Alfred?"

"No, Captain Jorgan, why should you? There would be little fear of his waking me, even if he said his whole yarn out."

"He's in the bed nearest the door," said the landlord. "I've been in to look at him once, and he's sound enough. Good-night, Gentlemen."

The captain immediately shook hands with the landlord in quite an enthusiastic manner, and having performed this ceremonial ceremony as he had had no opportunity of performing it for a long time, accompanied his young friend up stairs.

"Sound asleep, eh, Alfred?" the captain as they went, "that Miss Kitty Tregarthen's marriage ain't put off for long, and that we shall light on what we want."

"I hope so. When, do you think?"

"Wa'al, I couldn't just say when, but soon. Here's your room," said the captain, softly opening the door and looking in; "and there's the berth of the sea-faring man. I wonder what like he is. He breathes deep; don't he?"

"Sleeping sound, I judge from the sound," said the young fisherman.

"Dreaming of home, maybe," returned the captain. "Can't see him. Sleeps a-head most wholesomely than Aaron Parvis, but a'most as sound; don't he? Good-night, fallow-traveler."

"Good-night, Captain Jorgan, and many, many thanks!"

"I'll wait till I 'arn 'em, boy, afore I take 'em," returned the captain, clapping him cheerfully on the back. "Pleasant dreams of—you know who!"

When the young fisherman had entered the door, the captain waited a moment or two, listening for any sign of the return of the unseen sea-faring man. But none being audible, the captain pursued the way to his own chamber.

CHAPTER IV.—THE SEA-FARING MAN.

WHO was the Sea-faring Man? And what might he have to say for himself? He answers those questions in his own words.

I begin by mentioning what happened on my journey from Falmouth to Exeter in Cornwall, to Stoneyrays in Devonshire. I have no occasion to say (being here) that it brought me last night to Lanrean. I had business in hand which was very serious, and part (as I hoped) very joyful—and this business, you will please to remember, was the cause of my journey.

I left the landing at Falmouth a traveled on foot; because of the expense of riding, and because I had anxieties heavy on my mind, and walking was the best way to relieve them. Brighten Harbor the first two days of my journey the weather was fine and soft, the wind being mostly light airs from south, and west and by west. On the third day I took a wrong turning, and had to fetch a long circuit to get right again. Toward evening, while I was still on the road, the wind shifted; and a sea-fog came rolling in on the land. By this time, not knowing where I was, and thinking voices inside, groped my way round to the door, and knocked on it smartly with the flat of my hand.

The door was opened by a slip-shop young hussey in a torn gown; and the first inquiries I made of her discovered to me that the house was in fire.

Before I could ask more questions the landlord opened the parlor of the inn and came out. A clamor of voices, and a fume comforting smell of fire and grog and tobacco came out, also, along with him.

"By the tap-room fire's out," says the landlord. "You don't think you would dry more comfortable, like, if you went to bed?" says he, looking hard at me.

"No," says I, looking hard at him, "I don't."

Before more words were spoken a jolly voice hailed us from inside the parlor.

"What's the matter, landlord?" says the jolly voice. "Who is it?"

"A sea-faring man, by the looks of him," says the landlord, turning round from me, and speaking into the parlor.

"Let's have the sea-faring man in," says the voice. "Let's vote him free of the Club, for this night only."

A lot of other voices thereupon said, "Hear! hear!" in a solemn manner, as if it was church service. After which there was a hammering, as if it was a trunk-maker's shop. After which the landlord took me by the arm, gave me a push into the parlor, and there I was, free of the Club.

The change from the fog outside to the warm room and the shining candles so completely dazed me, that I stood blinking at the company more like an owl than a man. Upon which the company again said, "Hear! hear!" Upon which I returned the answer, "Hear! hear!" Upon hearing those words to mean, in the Club's language, something similar to "How-d'ye-do." The landlord then took me to a round table by the fire, where I got my supper, together with the information that my bedroom, when I wanted it, was number four, up stairs.

I noticed before I fell to with my knife and fork that the room was full, and that the chairman at the top of the table was the man with the jolly voice, and was seemingly undergoing the company by telling them a story. I paid more attention to my supper than to what he was saying; and all I can now report of it is, that his story-telling and my eating and drinking both came to an end together.

"Now," says the chairman, "I have told my story to oblige you all. Who comes next?" He took up a tea-tray, and gave it a shake on the table. When it toppled over, it fell opposite me; upon which the chairman said, "It's your turn next. Order! order! I call on the sea-faring man to tell the second story!" He finished the words off with a knock of his hammer; and the Club (having nothing else to say, as I suppose) cried loud, and once again sang out altogether, "Hear! hear!"

"I hope you will please to let me off," I said to the chairman, "for the reason that I have got no story to tell."

"No story to tell!" says he. "A sailor without a story! Who ever heard of such a thing? Nobody!"

"Nobody," says the Club, bursting out altogether at last with a new word, by way of a change.

I can say I quite relished the gentleman's talking of me as if I was before the mast. A man likes his true quality to be known, when he is publicly spoken to among a party of strangers. I made my true quality known to the chairman and company in these words:

"All my relations of the sea, gentlemen, are sailors," I said. "But there's degrees aboard ship as well as ashore. My rating, if you please, is the rating of a steward mate."

"Ay, ay, surely" says the chairman. "Where did you leave your ship?"

"At the bottom of the sea," I made answer—which was, I am sorry to say, rather too true.

"What! you've been wrecked?" says he. "Tell us all about it. A shipwreck story is just the sort of story we like. Silence there all down the table!—silence for the second mate!"

The Club, upon this, instead of keeping silence, broke out immediately with another new word, and said, "Chair!" After which every man suddenly held his peace, and looked at me.

I did a very foolish thing. Without stopping to take counsel with myself, I kicked off at score, and did just what the chairman had bidden me. If they had waited the whole night long for it, I should never have got down the story they wanted from me at first, having all my life been a wretched bad hand at such matters—for the reason, as I take it, that a story ought to be something which is not true. But when I found the company willing, on a sudden, to put up with nothing better than the account of a ship-wreck (which is not a story at all), the unexpected luck of their not quarreling with telling the truth about myself was too much of a temptation for me—so I up and told it.

I got on well enough with the storm, and the striking of the vessel, and the strange chance, afterward, which proved to be the saving of my life—the assembly all listening (to my great surprise) as if they had never heard any thing of the sort before. But when the necessity came next for going further than this, and for telling them what had happened to me after the saving of my life—or, to put it plainer, for telling them what place I was cast away on, and what company I was cast away in—the words that stuck fast on my lips. For this reason—namely—that those particulars of my statement made up just that part of it which I couldn't, and durstn't, let out to strangers. So not if every man among them had offered me a hundred pounds apiece, on the spot, to do it!

"Go on!" says the chairman. "What happened next? How did you get on shore?"

Feeling what a fool I had been to run myself headlong into a scrape, for want of thinking before I spoke, I now cast about discreetly in my mind for the best means of finishing off-hand without letting out a word of the company concerning those particulars before mentioned. I was some little time before seeing my way to this; keeping the chairman and company, all the while, waiting for an answer. The Club, losing patience in consequence, got from staring hard at me to drumming with their feet, and then to calling out, lustily, "Go on! go on! Chair! Order!"—and such like. In the midst of this childish hubbub I saw my way to what I considered to be rather a neat finish—and got on my legs to cast them all out with it handsomely.

"Hear! hear!" says the Club. "He's going on again at last."

"Gentlemen!" I made answer, "with your permission I will now conclude by wishing you all good-night!" I made a bow, and I gave them a friendly nod, to make things pleasant—and walked straight to the door. It's hardly to be believed —though nevertheless it's true—that these curious men all howled and groaned at me directly, as if I had done them some grievous injury. Thinking I would try to pacify them with their own favorite catch-word, I said, "Hear! hear!" as civilly as might be, whereupon they all returned for answer "Oh! oh!" I never belonged to a Club of any kind myself; and, after what I saw of that Club, I don't care if I never do.

My bedroom, when I found my way up to it, was large and airy enough, but not over-clean. There were two beds in it, not over-clean either. Both being empty, I had my choice. One was near the window, and one near the door. Although the bed near the door looked a trifle the sweetest of the two, I took it.

After falling asleep, it was the gray of the morning before I woke. When I had fairly opened my eyes and shook up my memory into telling me where I was, I made, I remember well, that the room was a deal colder in the new morning than it had been overnight. Second, that the other bed near the window had been since sleeping in it. Not that I could see the man from where I lay; but I heard his breathing plain enough. He must have come up into the room, of course, after I had fallen asleep—how I had not tumbled myself quietly into bed without disturbing me. There was nothing wonderful in that; and nothing wonderful in the thing that I next found myself to be could find a customer for it. I turned and tried to go to sleep again; but I was out of sorts—out of sorts so badly, that I got up and looked at the man in the other bed fretted and worried me. After tumbling and tossing for a quarter of an hour or more, I got up for a wash. I walked softly in my stockings to the window to look at the weather.

The heavens were brightening into daylight, and the mists were blowing off, past the window, like puffs of smoke. When I got to the window my best I stopped to look at the man in it. He lay, sound asleep, turned toward the window; and the end of the counterpane was drawn up over the lower half of his face. Something struck me, on a sudden, in his hair and his forehead; and, though not an inquisitive man, I confess, I stretched out my hand to the end of the counterpane, in spite of myself.

I uncovered his face softly; and there, in the morning light, I saw my brother, Alfred Ray, in bed.

What I ought to have done, or what other men might have done in my place, I don't know. What I really did, was to stand looking at him steadily myself, with my hand, on the sill of the window—and to stand so, looking at him. Three years ago I had said good-by to him, and left him, never to see to my old mother, and to brother Alfred here, asleep under my eyes. For all those three years he never heard from me hardly once—and the underwriters, as I knew, must have long since reported that the ship I sailed in was lost, and that all hands on board had perished. My heart was heavy when I thought of my kindred at home, and of the weary time they must have waited and sorrowed before they gave me up for dead. Twice I reached out my hand to wake Alfred, and to tell him about my wife and my child; and twice I drew it back again, in fear of what might happen if he saw me, standing by him, in the dress of the gipsy moving, like Hugh Raybrock risen up from the grave.

I drew my hand back the second time, and waited a minute. In that minute he woke. I had not moved, or spoken a word, or touched him—I had only looked at him longingly. If such things could be, I should say it was my looking that woke him. His eyes, when they opened, were dim, pressed on a sudden from fast asleep to broad awake. They first settled on my face with a startled look—which passed slightly. Then they looked at the room and opened his lips to speak, but never said a word. His eyes strained and strained into mine; and his face turned pale, and he whispered to me, "Alfred?" I said, "don't you know me?" There needed to be a deadly terror pent up in him, and I thought my voice might set it free. That kept me still down by the hands, and spoke again. "Alfred?" I said—

Oh, sirs! where can a man like me find words to tell all that was said and all that was thought between us two brothers? Please to permit me to not saying more of it than I say here. We sat down together side by side. The poor lad burst out crying—and got very little help from me. I kept hold of his hands, and waited a bit before I spoke to him again. I think I was worst off now of the two—because tears came to help me—I haven't got my brother's quickness, my way: and my troubles have roughened and hardened me outside. But, God knows, I felt it keenly; all the more keenly, maybe, because I was slow to show it.

After a little, I put the questions to him which I had been longing to ask from the time when I first saw his face on the pillow. Had my girl given me up at home for dead (I asked)? Yes; after long, long hoping, one by one they had given me up—my wife (God bless her!) last of all. I meant to ask next if my wife was alive and well; but, try as I might, I could only say "Margaret?"—and look hard in my brother's face for the rest of what I meant. Yes (he said), she was alive and well was at home; she was in her widow's weeds—poor soul! her widow's weeds! I got on better with my next question about the child. Was it born alive? Yes. Boy or girl? Girl. And living now? and much grown? Living, surely, and grown—poor little thing, what a question it was!—grown of course, in three years! And mother? Well, mother was a trifle fallen away, and more silent within herself than she used to be—fretted at times; fretting (like my wife) on nights when the sea roared, and the windows shook and shivered in the wind. There was no other child in the house but a girl—I with my questions, and he with his answers—and while we waited, I thanked God, inwardly, with all my heart and soul, for bringing me back, living, to wife and kindred, while wife and kindred were living too.

My brother dried the tears off his face and looked at me a little. Then he turned aside suddenly, as if he remembered something, and stole his hand up in a hurry under the pillow on his bed. He then came out from below the pillow but his black pocket-handkerchief, which he now unfolded slowly, looking at me all the while with something strange in his face that I couldn't make out.

"What are you doing?" I asked him. "What are you looking at me like that for?"

Instead of making answer he took a crumpled morsel of paper out of his neck-handkerchief, opened it carefully, and held it to the light to let me see what it was. I saw, at once, my own writing —the morsel of paper I had committed, long, long since, to the mercy of the deep. Thousands and thousands of miles I had trusted that little message to the waters—and here it was now, in my brother's hands! A chilly fear came over me at the seeing it again. Scrap of paper as it was, it looked to my eyes like the ghost of my own past self, gone home before me invisibly over the great wastes of the sea.

My brother pointed down solemnly to the writing.

"Hugh," he said, "were you in your right mind when you wrote these words?"

"Tell me, first," I made answer, "how and when the Message came to you. I can't quiet myself for it till I know that."

He told me how the paper had come to hand—also how his good friend, the captain, having promised to help him, was then under the same roof with our two selves. But there he stopped. It was not till later in the day that I heard of what had happened (through this dreadful doubt about the money) in the matter of his sweet-heart and his marriage.

The knowledge that the Message had reached him by itself was the first word of a seaman, I half doubted it when I first set eyes on the paper! —eased me in my mind; and I now did my best to advise Alfred, in my turn. I told him that I was in my right senses, though sorely troubled, when my hand had written those words. Also, that where the writing was rubbed out, I could tell him, for his necessary information, what once stood in the empty places. Also, that I knew no more what the real truth might be than he did, till inquiry was made at the office on our father's good name was dragged boldly into daylight to show itself for what it was worth. Lastly, that all the young hope and courage I had lost in me and one determination uppermost in my mind—the hope that I might get safe to England, and find my wife and blessed wife to take me back among them again —the determination that I would put the doubt about father's five hundred pound to the proof, if ever my feet touched English land once more.

"I'll write to-day, Alfred," I said, after winding up as above, "and let me tell you in the quiet of the morning how that Message came to be written and sent adrift by me."

We went down stairs softly, and let ourselves out without disturbing any one. The sun was just rising as we left the village and took our way slowly over the cliffs. A mist on the sea began to open on us I returned to that true story of mine which I had left but half told the night before—and this time I went through with it to the end.

I skipped, as you may remember (were my first words to Alfred), the part about the birth, on board the Perseine, nine hundred tons' burden. We carried an assorted cargo, and we were bound, round Cape Horn, for the port of Santa Guyaquil, on the western coast of South America.

We went down stairs softly, and let ourselves out without disturbing any one. The sun was just rising as we left the village and took our way slowly over the cliffs. A mist on the sea began to open on us I returned to that true story of mine which I had left but half told the night before—and this time I went through with it to the end.

I skipped, as you may remember (were my first words to Alfred), the part about the birth, on board the Perseine, nine hundred tons' burden. We carried an assorted cargo, and we were bound, round Cape Horn, for the port of Santa Guyaquil, on the western coast of South America.

—namely, Guayaquil—we were to go back to Truxillo, and there to take in another cargo for the return voyage. There were all the instructions communicated to me when I signed articles with the owners, in London city, three years ago.

After we had been a month at sea, I heard from the first mate—who had himself heard it from the captain—that the supercargo we were taking with us, on the present voyage, was to be left at Truxillo, and that another supercargo (also connected with our firm, and latterly employed by them as foreign agent) was to ship with us at that port for the voyage home. His name on the captain's instructions was, Mr. Lawrence Clissold. None of us had ever set eyes on him to our knowledge, and none of us were more about him than what I have told you here.

We had a wonderful voyage out—especially round the Horn. The Perseine was such fair weather in that infernal latitude, and I never expect to see the like again. We followed our instructions to the letter—discharging our cargo in fine condition, and returning to load again at Truxillo as directed. At this place I was so unfortunate as to be seized with the fever of the country, which laid me on my back, for the time in earnest (and which only let me return to my duty after we had been ten days at sea, on the voyage home again. For this reason, the first morning when I was able to get on deck was also the first time of my setting eyes on our new supercargo, Mr. Lawrence Clissold.

I found him to be a long, lean, wiry man, with some complaint in his eyes which forced him to wear spectacles of blue glass. His age appeared to be fifty-five, though I dare say he might well have been more. There was not above a handful of gray hair, altogether, on his bald head—and, as for the wrinkles at the corners of his eyes and the sides of his mouth, if he could have had a pound apiece in his pocket for every one of them, he might have retired from business from that time forth. Judging by certain signs in his face, and by a suspicious morning-tremble in his hands, I set him down, in my own mind (rightly enough, as it afterwards turned out), for a drinker. In one word, I didn't like the looks of the new supercargo—and, for that reason, I kept clear of him. I don't think he had reason to know I gave him a dislike, for I kept my own coin, and not liking my looks, either.

I've been asking the captain about you," were his first words to me on my return for my circle's wishing him good-morning. "Your name's Raybrock, I hear. Are you any relation to the late Hugh Raybrock, of Raybrock, Devonshire?"

"Rather a near relation," I made answer. "I am the late Hugh Raybrock's eldest son."

There was no telling how his eyes looked, because they were hidden by his blue spectacles—but I saw him wince at the mouth when I gave him that answer.

"Your father ended by failing in business, didn't he?" was the next question the supercargo put to me.

"Who told you he failed?" I asked, sharply enough.

"Oh! I heard it," says Mr. Lawrence Clissold, both looking and speaking as if he was glad to have heard it, and he hoped it was true.

"Whoever told you my father failed in business told you a lie," I said to him. "His business fell off toward the last years of his life—I don't deny it. But every creditor he had was honestly paid at his death to almost as much as touching the provision left for his widow and children. Please to mention that next time you hear it reported that my father failed in business."

Mr. Clissold grinned to himself—and I lost my temper.

"I'll tell you what," I said to him, "I don't like your laughing to yourself when I ask you to do justice to my father's memory—and, what is more, I didn't like the way you mentioned that report of his failing in business, just now. You looked as if you hoped it was true."

"Perhaps I did," says Mr. Clissold, coolly. "Shall I ask you why? When I was a young man I was unlucky enough to owe your father some money. He was a merciless creditor; and he threatened me with a prison if the debt remained unpaid on the day it was due. I have never forgotten that circumstance; and I should certainly not have been sorry if your father's creditors had given him a lesson in forbearance, by treating him as harshly as he once treated me."

"My father had a right to ask for his own," I broke out. "If you owed him the money and didn't pay it—"

"I never told you I didn't pay it," says Mr. Clissold, as coolly as ever.

"Well, if you didn't pay it," I put in, "then, you didn't go to prison—and you have no cause of complaint now. My father wronged nobody; and I won't believe he ever wronged you. He was a just man in all his dealings; and whoever tells me to the contrary—"

"Hah! hah!" says Mr. Clissold, backing away to the cabin stairs. "You seem to have no guilts got over your fever yet. I'll leave you to air yourself in the sea-breeze, Mr. Second Mate; and I'll receive your excuses when you are cool enough to make them."

"It is a son's business to defend his father's character," I answered; "and, if you don't, I'll leave the ship sooner than ask your pardon for doing my duty!"

"You will leave the ship," says the supercargo, quietly going down into the cabin. "You will leave at the next port, if I have any interest with the captain."

That was how Mr. Clissold and I scraped acquaintance on the first day when we met together! And as we began, so we went on to the end. But though he pestered me in almost every sort of way, he did not anger me again about father's affairs: he seemed to have dropped talking of them at once and forever. As my wife nevertheless bore in mind what he had said to me, and determined, if I got home safe, to go to the lawyer at Barnstaple and look father's old books and letters for us, and see what information they might give on the subject of Mr. Lawrence Clissold. I, myself, had never heard his name mentioned at home—father (as you know, Alfred) being always close about business-matters, and mother never troubling him with idle questions about his affairs. But it was understood that he and Mr. Clissold might have been concerned in money-matters, in past years, and that Mr. Clissold might have tried to borrow, and failed. I say, if I got home safe, to prove to be so—for the truth is, the supercargo provoked me past all endurance, and I hated him as heartily as I ever hated man.

All this while the ship was making such a speedy voyage down the coast that we began to think we should get round with it as the fine weather we had brought out. But on nearing Cape Horn the signs and tokens appeared which told us that our run of luck was at an end. Down went the barometer, lower and lower; and we got the wind, in the northerly quarter, higher and higher. This happened toward nightfall—and at dawn next day we found ourselves hove-to forced to lay to. It blew all that day and all that night; toward noon the next day it lulled a little, and we made sail again. But at sunset the heavens grew blacker than ever, and the wind returned upon us with double and treble fury. The Perseine was a fine, stout, roomy ship, but the unhandiest vessel at laying-to I ever sailed in. After taking tons of water on board and losing our best boat, we had nothing left for it but to turn tail and scud for our lives. For the next three days and nights we ran before the wind. The gale moderated more than once in that time, but there was such a sea on that we dared not heave to the ship to. From the beginning of the gale none of us of-fleers had a chance of taking any observations. We only knew that the wind was driving us as hard as we could go in a southerly direction, and that we were by this time hundreds of miles out of the ordinary course of ships in sailing the Cape.

On the third night—or rather, I should say, early on the fourth morning—I went below, dead beat, to get a little rest, leaving the vessel in charge of the captain and the first mate. The night was then pitch-black—it was raining, hailing, and sleeting, all at once—and the Peruvian was wallowing in the frightful sea, as if she meant to roll the masts out of her. I tumbled into bed the instant my wet oil-skins were off my back, and slept at once as a man can who lays himself down dead beat.

I was woke—how long afterward I don't know—by being pitched clean out of my berth on to the cabin floor; and at the same moment I heard the crash of the ship's timbers, forward, which told me it was all over with us.

Thoroughly stunned and shaken by my fall I was on deck in a minute, and I have had taken two steps forward the Peruvian forged ahead on the send of the sea, swung round a little, and struck heavily at the bows for the second time. The shrouds of the foremast cracked one after another, like pistol-shots, and the mast went overboard. I next felt our people go tearing past me, in the black darkness, to the lee-side of the vessel; and I knew that in their last extremity they were taking to the boats. I say I felt them go past me, because the roaring of the sea and the howling of the wind deafened me, on deck, as completely as the darkness blinded me. I myself no more believed the boats would live in the sea than I believed the ship would hold together on the reef—but as the rest were running the risk, I made up my mind to run it with them.

But before I followed the crew to leeward I went below again for a minute—not to save money or clothes, for, with death staring me in the face, neither were of any account now—but to get my little writing-case which mother had given me at parting. A pair of Macgregor's life-boats was in the pocket inside it, with all the letters she had sent me when I had been away on other voyages. If I saved any thing, I was resolved to save this—and if I died, I would die with it about me.

My locker was jammed with the wrenching of the ship, and had to be broken open. I was, maybe, longer over this job than I myself supposed. At any rate, when I got on deck again with my case in my breast, it was useless calling, and useless growing on. The lights of the other boats, when I felt for it, was gone; and every soul on board was beyond a doubt gone with her.

Before I had time to think I was driven off my feet by another sea coming on board, and a great heave of the vessel which drove her farther over the reef, and rented the after-part of her up like the roof of a house. In that position the ship stuck, wedged fast into the rocks beneath, while the fore-part of the ship was all to pieces and down under water. If the after-part went the place it was now jammed in till daylight there might be a chance, but if the sea wrenched it out from between the rocks there was an end of me. After straining my eyes to discover if there was land beyond the reef, and seeing nothing but the flash of the breakers, like white fire in the darkness, I crawled below again to the shelter of the cabin stairs and waited for death or daylight.

As the morning hours were on the weather moderated again, and the after-part of the vessel, though shaken often, was not shaken out of its place. A little before dawn the winds and the waves, though in force enough to keep me on my at last to hear something besides themselves. What I did hear, crouched up in my dark corner, was a heavy thumping and grinding, every now and then, against the side of the ship to windward. Day broke soon afterward, and when I climbed to the deck I found my way up to windward first to see what the noise was caused by.

My first look over the bulwark showed me that it was caused by the boat which my unfortunate brother officers and the crew had launched and gone away in when the ship struck. The boat was bottom upward, thumping against the ship's side on the top of the sea. I wanted no second look at it to tell me that every mother's son of them was drowned.

The main and mizen masts still stood. I got into the mizen rigging to look out next to leeward —and there, in the blessed daylight, I saw a low, green, enchanted island, lying away beyond the reef, barely a mile distant from the ship! My life began to look of some small value to me again when I saw land. I got higher up in the rigging to note how the current set, and where there might be a passage through the reef. The ship had driven over the rocks through the worst of the surf, and the sea between myself and the island, though angry and broken in places, was not too high for a lost man like me to venture on—provided I could reach the land on some smallest boat still left in the vessel. I noted carefully the black, lizzel-looking channel for trying the experiment, and then got down on deck again to see what I could do, first of all, with the boat.

At the moment when my feet touched the deck I heard a dull knocking and banging just under them, in the region of the cabin. When the noise first reached my ears I got such a shock of surprise that I could neither move or speak. It had never yet entered my mind that any single soul was left in the vessel besides myself—but now, there was something in the knocking noise which started the hope in me that I was not alone. I shook myself up, and got down below directly.

The noise came from inside one of the sleeping berths, on the far side of the main cabin; the door of which was jammed, no doubt, just as my locker had been jammed, by the wrenching of the ship. "Who's there?" I called out. A faint, muffled kind of voice answered something through the stir grating in the upper part of the door. I got up on the overthrown cabin furniture; and, looking in through the trellis-work of the grating, found myself face to face with the blue spectacles of Mr. Lawrence Clissold, looking out!

God forgive me for thinking it—but there was not a man in the vessel I wouldn't sooner have found alive in her than Mr. Clissold! Of all that ship's company, we two, who were least friendly together, were the only two saved.

I had a better chance of breaking out the jammed door from the main cabin than he had from his berth inside; and in less than five minutes he was set free. I had smelled spirits already through the air-grating—smelled now, when he and I stood face to face, I saw what the smell meant. There was an open case of spirits by the bedside—two of the bottles out of it were by the floor—broken on the floor and Mr. Clissold was drunk.

"What's the matter with the ship?" says he, looking fierce, and speaking thick.

"You shall see for yourself," says I. With which words I took hold of him, and pulled him after me up the cabin stairs. I reckoned on the sight that would meet him, when he first looked over the deck, to sober his drunken brains—and I reckoned right: he fell on his knees, stock-still and speechless at the wreck and ruin of it.

I lashed him up safe to the cabin rail, and left it to the air to bring him round. He had, likely enough, been drinking in his sleeping berth for days together—for none of us, as I now remembered, had seen him since the gale set in—and even if he had kept sober enough to get out, or to call for help, when the ship struck, he was not the man made himself heard in the noise and confusion of that awful time. But for the fall in the weather I should not have heard him myself when he attempted to get free in the morning. Enemy of mine as he was, he had a pair of arms—and he was worth untold gold, in my situation, for that reason. With the help I could make him give me, there was no doubt now about launching the boat. In half an hour I had the satisfaction of seeing that experiment; and Mr. Clissold was sober enough to see that his life depended on his doing what I told him.

The sky looked clearer, and there was no opening any where—and the clouds were not looking up again to windward. The supercargo knew what I meant when I pointed that way, and worked with a will when he saw me set to work. I had previously stowed away in the boat such stores of meat, biscuit, and fresh water as I could readily lay hands on; together with what spirits appeared, a few candles, and some boxes of matches in my pocket, to kindle light and fire with. At the last moment I found my gun and powder-flask and shot. The powder and shot I found, and a stiff flint pocket-pistol in the captain's cabin—with which, for fear of wasting precious time, I was forced to be content. Mr. Clissold got a copy of the medicine-chest—and I took that also, finding it handy, and not knowing but what it might be of use. Having got these things together, we launched the boat, down the steep of the deck, into the water over the forward part of the ship which was next to us. I, after ordering Mr. Clissold to sit still in the stern-sheets, and pulled for the island.

It was sink or nothing with us more than once, before we were two hundred yards from the ship. Luckily, the supercargo was used to boats; and muddled as he still was, he had sense enough to take spirit. We found our way into the narrow channel which I had noted from the mizen-rigging—after which, it was easy enough to get ashore.

We landed on a little sandy bay. From the time of our leaving the ship the supercargo had not spoken a word to me, nor I to him. I now left him to look after the getting the stores out of the boat, and in helping me to carry them to the first sheltered place we could find in shore on the island. This done, he himself up with a sulky look at me, and did as I had ordered him. I left him free to do dip or dell in the ground, after getting up the low sides of the island, which was sheltered to leeward—and then left him to himself to get over stories while I walked farther on to survey the place.

According to the hasty judgment I formed at the time the island seemed to be about seven, and not much more than three miles round. I noted nothing in the way of food but a few wild roots and vegetables growing in ragged patches amidst the thick scrub which covered the place. There was not a tree on it any where; nor any living creatures; nor any signs of fresh water that I could see. Stealing on, I must confess, I looked about anxiously for other islands that might be inhabited; there were none visible—at least none in the direction of the ship! My last hope was gone. I got higher up in the rigging to note how the current set, and where there might be a passage through the reef. The ship had driven over the rocks through the worst of the surf, and the sea between myself and the island, though angry and broken in places, was not too high for a lost man like me to venture on—provided I could reach the land on some smallest boat still left in the vessel. We found our way into the narrow channel which I had noted from the mizen-rigging—after which, it was easy enough to get ashore.

We landed on a little sandy bay. From the time of our leaving the ship the supercargo had not spoken a word to me, nor I to him. I now left him to look after the getting the stores out of the boat, and in helping me to carry them to the first sheltered place we could find in shore on the island. This done by tying a fresh knot every morning in a piece of marline—we two men were just a week, each on his own side of the island, without seeing or communicating, any how, with one another. The first half of the week I had enough to do with cudgeling my brains for a means of helping ourselves to keep my mind steady.

I thought first of picking up all the longest bits of spars that had been cast ashore, lashing them together with ropes twisted out of the long grass on the island, and trusting to raft-navigation to get to that high land away in the south. But when I looked among the spars, there were not half a dozen of them left whole enough for the purpose. And even if there had been more, the short allowance of food would have given me time sufficient, or strength sufficient, to make the grass, to twist it into ropes, and to lash a raft together big enough and strong enough for us two men. There was nothing to be done but to give up that notion —and I gave it up. The next chance I thought of was to keep a fire burning on the shore every night, with the wood of the wreck, in case a sail at sea might notice it on one side—or the people of the high land in the south (if the distance was not too great) might notice it on the other. There was sense in this notion, and it could be turned to account the moment the wood was dry enough to burn. The wood got dry enough before the week was out. Whether it was the end of the stormy season in those latitudes, or whether it was only the shifting of the wind to the west, I don't know —but now, day after day, the heavens were clear, and the sun shone scorching hot. The scrub on the island (which was of no great account) dried up—and with it, water in the hollow of the rocks (which was, on the other hand, a serious business) dried up too. Troubles seldom come alone; and on the day when I made this discovery I also found out that I had calculated wrong about the food. Like it out as I might, with scurvy grass and roots, they would not be more eight days more of it left when the first week was past—and as for the fresh water, half a pint a day, unless more rain fell, would leave me at the end of my store, as nearly as I could guess, about the same time.

This was a bad look-out—but I don't think the prospect of it upset me in my mind so much as the having nothing to do. Except for the gathering of the wood, and the lighting of the signal-fire every night, I had no work at all toward the end of the week to keep me steady. I checked myself in thinking much about home, for fear of losing heart, and not holding out to the last, as became a man. For the same reasons I likewise kept my mind from raising hopes of help in me which were not likely to come true. What else was there to think about? Nothing but the other man on the other side of the island—and he hanged to him!

I thought about those words I heard him say in his sleep—I thought whether he was getting on by himself; how he had nothing but water to drink, and little enough of that; how he was eking out his provisions; whether he slept much or not; whether he saw the smoke of my fire at night or not; whether he held up better or worse than I did; whether he would be glad to see me if I went to him to make it up; whether he or I would die first; whether, if it was me, he would do for me what I would have done for him—namely, bury him, with the last strength I had left. All these things, and lots more, kept coming and going in my mind, till I could stand it no longer. On the morning of the eighth day I vowed to go to him in his territories, feeling it would do me good to see him and hear him, even if we quarrelled again the instant we came up to each other.

I climbed up to the grassy ground—and, when I got there, what should I see but the supercargo himself coming to me in my territories, and wandering up and down in the scrub through not knowing where to find them!

It almost frightened me over, when we met, the man was changed so. He looked eighty years old; the little flesh he had on his miserable face hung baggy; his blue spectacles had dropped down on his nose, and his eyes showed over them wild and red-rimmed; his lips were black; his legs staggered under him. He came up to me with his eyes all of a glitter, and put both his hands on my breast, just over the pocket in which I kept that flask of ginger-brandy which he had tried to steal from me.

"Have you got any of it left?" says he, in a whisper.

"About two mouthfuls," says I.

"Give us one of them, for God's sake," says he. Giving him one of those mouthfuls was just about equal to giving him a day of my life. In the case of a man I liked, I would not have thought twice about giving it. In the case of Mr. Clissold I did think twice. I would have been a better Christian if I could—but just then I couldn't.

He thought I was going to say No. His eyes got cunning directly. He reached his hands to my shoulders, and whispered these words in my ear:

"I'll tell you what I know about the five hundred pound if you'll give me a drop."

I determined to give it to him, and pulled out the flask. I took his hand, and poured the drop into the hollow of it, and held it for a moment.

"Tell me first," I said, "and drink afterward."

He looked all round him, as if he thought there were people on the island to hear us. "Hush!" he said; "let's whisper about it." The next question and answer that passed between us was louder than before on my side, and softer than ever on his. This was the question:

"What do you know about the five hundred pound?"

And this was the answer:

"It's Stolen Money!"

My hand dropped away from his as if he had shot me. He instantly fastened on the drop of liquor in the hollow of his hand, like a hungry wild beast on a bone, and then looked up for more. Something in my face (God knows what) seemed suddenly to frighten him out of his life. Before I could stir a step, or get a word out, down he dropped on his knees, whining and whimpering in the high grass at my feet.

"Don't kill me!" says he; "I'm dying—I'll think of my poor soul. I'll repent while there's time—"

Beginning in that way, he maundered awfully, groveling down in the grass; asking me every other minute for "a drop more, and a drop more;" and talking as if he thought we were both in England. Out of his wanderings, his beseechings for another drop, and his miserable beggar-speculations for his "poor soul," I gathered together these words—the same which I wrote down on the morsel of paper, and of which nine parts out of ten are now rubbed off:

The first I made out—though not the first he said —was that some one, whom he spoke of as "the old man," was at the bottom of it. That was the place he lived in. I was to go there, and ask, among the old men, for "Tregarthen—"

Did he mention by me of the name of Tregarthen, my brother, to my great surprise, stopped me with a start; made me say the name over more than once; and then, for the first time, told me of the trouble about his sweetheart and his marriage. We waited a little to talk that matter over, after which I went on again with my story, in these words):

Well, as I made out from Clissold's wanderings, I was to go to Laurean, to ask among the old men for Tregarthen, and to say that Clissold sent me. Clissold was the man. Clissold bore no malice: Clissold repented like a Christian, for the sake of his poor soul. He left it to me to make friends with Tregarthen. I was to say, "Look among the books: look at the leaf you know of, and see for yourself if you have the right leaf to be there." No! I was to say something else to Tregarthen. I was to say, "The right leaf is hidden, not burned. Clissold had time for every thing else, but no time to burn that leaf. Tregarthen came to me when he had got the candle lit to burn it. There was just time to let it drop from under his hand into the great crack in the floor, and the ship was ordered abroad by the House, and there was no chance of doing more." No! I was to say none of these things to Tregarthen. I was to say, "Look in Clissold's desk—and, if you blame me by body, blame miser Raybrock for driving him to it." And oh, another drop—for the Lord's sake, give him another drop!

So he went on, over and over again, till I found voice enough to speak and stop him.

"Get up and help me to the miserable wretch. "Get back to your own side of the island, or I may do you a mischief, in spite of my own scruples!"

"Give me the other drop and I will," was all the answer I could get from him.

I threw him the flask. He pounced upon it with a howl. I turned my back—for I could look at him no longer—and climbed down again to my territories on the beach.

I sat down alone on the sand, and tried to quiet myself fit to think about what I had heard. That father could ever have willfully done any thing unbecoming his character all honest men knew by what I wouldn't believe, in the first place. And that the wretched brute I had just parted from should, in his right senses, say what he believed, I believe, in the second place. What I had myself seen of drinkers, at sea and ashore, helped me to understand the condition in which he had fallen. I knew that when a man who had been sober for years is suddenly cut off his drink he drops to pieces like body and mind, for the want of it. I had also heard sailor-doctors talk, in the course of their own, of a drink-madness, which we ignorant men call the Horrors. And I made it out, easy enough, that I had been overwhelmed by a group of these conditions; and that if we both lived long enough without help coming to us, I might soon see him in the second stage, which was to end, to get farther, and settle how much of what I had heard was wanderings and how much truth, and what it meant if there was truth in it, my slowness got in my way again; and where it was that I should have made up his mind in an hour or two, I was all day, in my distress, making up mine. The upshot of what I settled with myself was, in my own words, this: Having mother's writing-case handy about me, I determined first to set down, for my own self's reminder, all that I had heard. Next, to clear the matter up if ever I got back to England alive; and if wrong had been done to that old man, to right my dead father's name (without father's knowledge), to make restoration for his sake.

All this day I neither saw nor heard more of the supercargo. I passed a miserable night of it, either writing my memorandum, fighting with my loneliness and my own thoughts. The remembrance of those words, "Stolen Money!" made the five hundred pound was money which he had once run a risk with, kept putting into my mind suspicions I was ashamed of. I was glad enough came I almost felt as if I was going to have the Horrors too, and got up to walk them off, if possible, in the morning air.

I kept on the northern side of the island, walking backward and forward for an hour or more. Then I returned to my cavern: and the first thing I saw, on getting near it, was the other footsteps than mine marked on the sand. I suspected at once that the supercargo had been lurking about watching me, instead of going to my other footsteps; and that, in my absence, he had been at his thieving tricks again.

The stores were what I looked at first. The food he had not touched; but the water he had either drunk or wasted—there was not half a pint of it left. The medicine-chest was open, and the bottle with the harisborn was gone. When I looked next for the pistol, which I had loaded with powder and shot for the chance of bird-shooting, that never came, the pistol was gone too. After making this last discovery, my last one thing left to be done—namely, to find out where he was, and to take the pistol away from him.

I set off to search first on the western side. It was a beautiful, clear, calm, sunshiny morning; and as I crossed the island, looking out on my left hand and my right, I stopped on a sudden, with my heart in my mouth, as the saying is. Something curled up my eye, far out at sea, in the north-west. I looked again—and there, as true as the heavens above me, I saw a ship, with the sunlight on her topsails, hull down, on the water-line in the offing!

All thought of the errand I was bent on went out of my mind in an instant. I ran as fast as my weak legs would carry me to the northern beach; gathered up the broken wood which was still lying there plentifully, and, with the help of the dry grass, lit the fire which I had made yet. This was the only signal it was in my power to make that there were men on the island. The fire, in the bright sunshine, would be invisible to the ship; but the smoke curling up from it in the clear sky might be seen, if they had a look-out at the mast-head.

While I was still feeding the fire, and so rapt up in doing it that I had neither eyes nor ears for any thing else, I heard the supercargo's voice, on a sudden, at my back. He had stolen on me along the sand. When I faced him he was swinging his arms about in the air, and saying to himself, over and over again, "I see the ship! I see the ship!"

After a little he came to his senses. By the look of him he had found out the ginger-brandy, and it had strung him up a bit, body and mind, for the time. He kept his right hand behind him, as if he was trying to conceal something, and that "something" to be the pistol I was in search of.

"Will the ship come here?" says he.

"Yes, if they see the smoke," says I, keeping my eye on him.

He waited a bit, frowning suspiciously, and looking hard at me all the time.

"What did I say to you yesterday?" he asked.

"What I have got written down here," I made answer, smacking my hand over the writing-case in my breast-pocket. "And what I mean to put to the proof, if the ship sees us and we get back to England."

He whipped his right hand round from behind him like lightning, and snapped the pistol at me. It missed fire. I wrenched it from him in a moment, and struck him on his hair's-breadth of knocking him on the head with the butt-end afterward. I lifted my hand—then thought better, and dropped it again.

"No," says I, fixing my eyes on him steadily— "I'll wait till the ship finds us."

He shrunk away from me; and, as he shunk, looked hard at the ship. He stepped a minute so, thinking to himself; then he looked back at me again, with some mad mischief in him, that twinkled through his blue spectacles, and grinned on his dry, black lips.

"The ship shall never find you," he said. With which words he turned about toward his own side of the island, and left me.

He only meant that saying to be a threat—but, fetch if almost that he was, it turned out as good as a prophecy for him, my hard work with the fire proved work in vain; and hope was quenched in me long before the embers I had set light to were burned out. The ship's company was seen or not from the vessel is more than I can tell. I only know that she filled away on the other tack, not ten minutes after the smoke began to rise. In less than an hour's time the last glimpse of the bright top-sails had vanished out of view.

I went back to my cavern—which was now lighter than ever to be a prison as well. In that hot climate, with all the moisture on the island dried up, with not quite so much as a tumblerful of water left, I had no chance but to die miserably, facing on half-rations of food — two days more, at most, would see me out. It was hard enough for me to make up my mind I had left at home how to make life precious, to die such a death as was now before me. It was harder still to have the thought of leaving a few words for it fit them—by what had just happened between the supercargo and myself. There was no hope now that the writing-case, the day before, had more falsehood in my breast about it than I knew, or that it was plainly true enough and serious enough to have scared him into attempting my life, rather than let it fall into possession of it, when there was a chance of the ship rescuing us. That secret had father's good name mixed up with it—and here was I, face to face with the hideous darkness from off of it, carrying it with me, black as ever, into my grave.

It was one of the horror I felt at doing that, and out of the yearning of my heart toward you. As I fred, when ✪ thought of it, that the notion came to comfort me of writing the Message at the top of the paper, and of putting it in the bottle to the sea. Drowning men, they say, catch at straws —and the straw of comfort I caught at was the one chance in ten thousand that the Message might float till it was picked up, and that it might reach you. My mind might, or might not, have been falling for this time—but it was true, either way, that I did feel comforted when I had emptied one of the two bottles left in the medicine chest, had put the paper inside, had fitted the stopper carefully over with the oil-skin, and had tied the whole by my pocket, ready, when I felt my time coming, to drop into the sea. I was rid of the secret, I thought to myself; and, if it pleased God, I was rid of it, Alfred, to you.

The day waned, and the sun set, all cloudless and golden, in a dead calm. There was not a ripple any where on the long oily heaving of the sea. Before night came I strengthened myself with a letter need than usual was to food—for where was the use of keeping meat and biscuit when I had not water enough to last along with them? When the stars came out and the moon rose I gathered the wood together and lit the signal-fire, according to custom, on the beach outside my cavern. I had no hope from it—but the fire was company to me; the looking into it quieted my thoughts, and the crackling of it was a relief in the silence. I don't know why it was, but the breathless stillness of that night had something awful in it, and went near to frightening me.

The moon got high in the heavens, and the light of her lay all in a flood on the sea and before me, on the rocks that jutted out from the land, and on the calm sea beyond. I was thinking of Margaret—wondering if the moon was shining on our little bay at Steepways, and if she was looking at it too—when I saw a man's shadow steal over the white of the sand. He was lurking near me again! In a minute he came into view. The moonshine glinted on his blue spectacles, and glimmered on his bald head. He stooped as he passed by the rocks and picked up more fuel—for I saw him found a large one, and came straight with it on tiptoe up to the fire. I showed myself to him on a sudden, to the fire. He threw, with the pistol in my hand. He dropped the stone, and shrank back at the sight of it. When he was close to the sea he stopped, and screamed out at me, "The ship's coming! The ship's coming!" The ship shall never find you!" That notion of the ship, and of my chance of getting me before help came to us, seemed never to have left him. When he turned, and went back by the way he had come, he went still shouting out those same words. For a quarter of an hour or more I heard him, till the silence swallowed up his ravings, and led me back again to my thoughts of home.

Those thoughts left me till the moon was on the wane. It was darker now, and stiller than ever. I had not fed the signal-fire for half an hour or more, and found myself up, at the mouth of the cavern, to do it, when I saw the flying gleams of moonshine over the sea on either side of me suddenly turn red. Black shadows, as from low-flying clouds, swept after each other over the deepening redness. The air grew hot—a hot wind began to sound nearer, from above me and behind me, like the rush of wind at the near of water, both together, and both far off. I ran out on the sand, and looked back. The island was on fire!

On fire at the point of it opposite to me—on fire in one great sheet of flame that stretched right across the island, from shore to shore, and steadily before the light westerly wind which was blowing at the time. Only one hand could have kindled that terrible fire—the hand of the lost wretch who had left me, with the mad thirst in his lips and the murderous notion of burning me out of my refuge, sooner than die by the crazy brain. On his side of the island (where the fire had begun), the dry grass and scrub grew all round the little hollow in the rocks which I had left to him for his place of refuge. And he had chosen rightly how to lose he would have lost that thousand already!

Having nothing to feed on but the dry scrub, the flame travelled with such a fierce, leaping swiftness that I had barely time, after mastering my own scattered senses, to turn back into the cavern to get myself a drink of water and my last mouthful of food, before I heard the fire behind me crackling over the thatched roof which my own hands had raised. I ran across the beach to the spur of rock which jutted out into the sea, and there crouched down on the farthest edge I could reach to. There was nothing for the tire to lay hold of between me and the tip of the rock's headland. I was far enough away to be out of the lick of the flames, and low enough down to get air under the sweep of the smoke. But my own wonder why, with death by starvation threatening me close at hand, I should have schemed and struggled as I did to save myself from a quicker death by suffocation in the smoke. I can only answer to that, that I wonder too—but so it was.

The flames their way to the edge of the bank, and lapped over it as if they longed to lick me up. The heat scorched nearer than I had thought, and the smoke poured lower and thicker. I lay down sick and weak, on the rock, with my face close over the calm, cool water. When I ventured to lift myself up again the top of the island was of a ruby red, the smoke was already in little streaks, and the air above was quivering with the heat. While I looked at it I felt a kind of surging and singing in my head, and a deadly faintness and coldness crept all over me. I took the bottle that held the Message from my pocket, and dropped it into the sea—then crawled a little way back over the rocks, and fell forward at once before I got so far as the sand. The last I remember was trying to say my prayers—losing the words—losing my sight —losing the sense of where I was—losing every thing.

The day was breaking again when I was roused up by feeling rough hands on me. Savages—savages —some on the rocks, some in the water, some in two long canoes—were clamoring and crowding about on all sides. They bound me, and took me off at once to one of the canoes. The other kept company—and both were paddled back to that high land which I had seen in the south. Death had passed me by once more—and Captivity had come in its place.

The story of my life among the savages having no concern with the matter now in hand, may be passed by here in few words. They had seen the fire on the island—and paddling over in reconnoitre, had found me. Not one of them had ever set eyes on a white man before. I was taken away to be shown about among them for a curiosity. When they were tired of showing me, they spared my life, finding my knowledge and general handiness as a civilized man useful to them in various ways. I lost all count of time in my captivity—and can only guess now that it lasted more than one year and less than two. I made two attempts to escape, each time in a canoe, and was talked in both. Nobody at home in England would ever, as I believe, have seen me again if an outward bound vessel had not touched at the little desert island for fresh water. Finding none there, she came on to the territory of the savages (which was an island, too). When they took me on board, I looked little better than a savage myself, and could hardly talk my own language. By the help of the kindness shown to me I was right again by the time we spoke the first ship homeward bound. To that vessel I was transferred; and in her I worked my passage back to Tahiti.

CHAPTER V.—THE RESTITUTION.

CAPTAIN JORGAN, up and out betimes, had put the whole village of Laurean under an amicable cross-examination, and was returning to the King Arthur's Arms to breakfast, none the wiser for his trouble, when he beheld the young fisherman advancing to meet him, accompanied by a stranger. A glance at this stranger assured the captain that he could be no other than the Sea-faring Man; and the captain was about to hail him as a fellow-craftsman, when the two stood still and silent before the captain, and the captain stood still, silent, and wondering before them.

"Why, what's this?" cried the captain, when at last he broke the silence. "You two are alike. You two are much alike! What's this?"

Not a word was answered on the other side, until after the sea-faring brother had got hold of the captain's right hand, and the fisherman brother had got hold of the captain's left hand; and if ever two people had had his fill of hand-shaking, from his birth to that hour, he had it then. And presently up and spoke the two brothers, one at a time, or two at a time, two down at a time for the bewilderment into which they plunged the captain, until he gradually had Hugh Raybrock's declaration clear to him, and had fully comprehended the fact that the person referred to in the half-obliterated paper was Tregarthen himself.

"Formerly, dear Captain Jorgan," said Alfred, "of Laurean, you recollect? Kitty and her father came to live at Steepways after Hugh shipped on his last voyage."

"Ay, ay!" cried the captain, fetching a breath. "Now you have me in tow. Then your brother here don't know his sister-in-law that is to be so much as his name?"

"Never saw her; never heard of her!"

"Ay, ay, sir!" cried the captain. "Why then we every one go back together—Kitty, write, and all—and take Tregarthen into the secret we keep from him?"

"Surely," said Alfred, "we can't help it now. We must go through with our duty."

"Not a doubt," returned the captain. "Give me an arm apiece, and let us set this ship-shape."

So, arm-in-arm up and down in the shrill wind on the wild moor, while the neglected breakfast cooled within, the captain and the brothers settled their course of action.

It was, that they should all proceed by the quickest means they could secure to Barnstaple, and there leave the father to look over the papers in the lawyer's keeping: as Hugh had proposed to himself to do if ever he reached home. That, enlightened or unenlightened, they should then return to Steepways and go straight to Mr. Tregarthen, and tell him all they knew, and see what came of it, and act accordingly. Lastly, that when they got there they should not enter the village with all precautions against Hugh's being recognized by any chance; and that to the captain should be assigned the task of first meeting his wife and mother for his restoration to this life.

"For you see," quoth Captain Jorgan, touching the last head, "it requires caution any way, great joys being as dangerous as great griefs—if not more dangerous, as being more uncommon (and therefore less provided against) in this round world of ours. And besides, I should like to free my name with the ladies, and take you home again at your brightest and luckiest; so don't let's throw away a chance of success."

The captain was highly lauded by the brothers for his kind interest and foresight.

"And now stop!" said the captain, coming to a stand-still, and looking from one brother to the other, with quite a new rigging of wrinkles about each eye; "you are of opinion," to the elder, "that you are ra'ather slow?"

"I assure you I am very slow," said the bowed Hugh.

"Wa'al," replied the captain, "I assure you that to the best of my belief I am ra'ather smart. Now, a slow man ain't good at quick business, is he?"

That was clear to both.

"You," said the captain, turning to the younger brother, "are a little in here; ain't you?"

"Not a little, Captain Jorgan."

"Much or little, you're sort-preoccupied; sin't you?"

It was impossible to be denied.

"And a sort preoccupied man sin't good at quick business; is he?" said the captain.

Equally clear on all sides.

"Now," said the captain, "I ain't in love myself, and I've made many a smart run across the ocean, and I should like to carry on and go ahead with this affair of yours and make a run slick through it. Shall I try? Will you hand it over to me?"

They were both delighted to do so, and thanked him heartily.

"Good," said the captain, taking out his watch. "This is half past eight A.M., Friday morning. I'll jot that down, and we'll compute how many hours we've got when we run into your mother's post-office. There! The entry's made, and now we go ahead."

They went ahead so well that before the Barnstaple lawyer's office was open next morning the captain was sitting whistling on the step of the door, waiting for the clerk to come down the street with his key and open it. But instead of the clerk there came the master, with whom the captain fraternized on the spot to an extent that utterly confounded him.

As he personally knew both Hugh and Alfred, there was no difficulty in obtaining immediate access to such of the father's papers as were in his keeping. These were chiefly old letters and cash accounts: from which the captain, with a shrewdness and dispatch that left the lawyer far behind, established with perfect clearness, by noon, the following particulars:

That, one Lawrence Clissold had borrowed of the deceased, at a time when he was a thriving young tradesman in the town of Barnstaple, the sum of five hundred pounds. That he had borrowed it on the written statement that it was to be laid out in furtherance of a speculation which he expected would raise him to independence; he being, at the time of writing that letter, no more than a clerk in the house of Dringworth Brothers, America Square, London City. That the money was required for a stipulated period; but that when the term was out the aforesaid speculation failed, and Clissold was without means of repayment. That, in addition, he had written to his creditor, in no very persuasive terms, vaguely requesting further time. That, the creditor had refused this concession, declaring that he could not afford delay. That, Clissold then paid the debt, accompanying the remittance of the money with an angry letter, describing it as having been advanced by a relative to save him from ruin. That, in acknowledging the receipt, Raybrock had cautioned Clissold to seek to borrow money of him no more, as he would never so risk money again.

Before the lawyer the captain said never a word in reference to these papers, but put them in their box, and he and his two companions were well out of the office his right leg suffered for it, and he said:

"So far that's done handsome, a fair wind and a prosperous; for don't you see that all this agrees with that dutiful trust in his father, maintained by the slow sensible of the dog-watch, Hugh?"

Whether the brothers had seen it before or no, they saw it now. Not that the captain gave them much time to consider it, for he was off again on their ease, for he instantly whipped them into a chaise again and bore them off to Steepways. Although the afternoon was but just beginning to decline when they reached it, and it was broad daylight, still they had no difficulty, by dint of muffling the returned sailor up, and ascending the village road on the Barnstaple side, in getting Tregarthen's cottage unobserved. Kitty was not visible, and they surprised Tregarthen sitting writing in the small room behind the little parlor.

"Sir," said the captain, instantly shaking hands with him, pen and all, "I'm glad to see you, sir. How do you do, sir? I'm Captain Jorgan, master of me by-and-by, and I congratulate you on going to do it."

Here the captain's eye fell on Tom Pettifer M.P. engaged in preparing some cookery at the fire.

"That critter," said the captain, smiting his leg, "is a born steward, and never ought to have been in any trade but the Navy where you are, Tom, and make yourself useful. Now, Tregarthen, I'm going to try a chair."

Accordingly, the captain drew one close to him, and went on:

"This loving member of the Raybrock family you know, sir, is under marriage to the same family, you don't know, sir. Wa'al, these two are brothers—fact! Hugh's come to life again, and here he stands. Now, see here, my friend! You don't want to be told (for there's a purpose in it) that he was cast away with another man. That man by name was Lawrence Clissold."

At the mention of this name Tregarthen started and changed color. "What's the matter?" said the captain.

"He was a fellow-clerk of mine, thirty—five-and-thirty—years ago."

"True," said the captain, immediately catching at the clew: "Dringworth Brothers, America Square, London City."

The other started again, nodded, and said, "That was the firm."

"Now," pursued the captain, "between these two men cast away there arose a mystery concerning the round sum of a hundred pounds."

Again Tregarthen started and changed color. Again the captain said, "What's the matter?"

As Tregarthen also answered, "Please to go on," the captain recounted, very tersely and plainly, the nature of Clissold's wanderings on the barren island, as he had confessed them in his mind from the sea-faring man. Tregarthen became greatly agitated during this recital, and at length exclaimed:

"Clissold was the man who ruined me! I have suspected it for many a long year, and now I know it."

"And how," said the captain, drawing his chair still closer to Tregarthen, and clapping his hand upon his shoulder, "how may you know it?"

"When we were fellow-clerks," replied Tregarthen, "in that London House, it was one of my duties to enter daily in a certain book an account of the sums received that day by the firm, and afterwards pay into the bankers' the amount every day—a Wednesday, the black day of my life—among the sums I so entered was one of five hundred pounds."

"I begin to make it out," said the captain. "Yes?"

"It was one of Clissold's duties to copy from this entry a memorandum of the sums which the clerk employed to go to the banker's paid in there. It was my duty to book the money as Clissold; it was Clissold's to hand it to the clerk, with that memorandum of his writing. On that Wednesday I entered a sum of five hundred pounds received. I handed that sum, as I handed the other sums in the day's entry, to Clissold. I was absolutely certain of it at the time; I have been absolutely certain of it ever since. A sum of five hundred pounds was afterward found by the House to have been that day wanting from the bag, from Clissold's memorandum, and from the entries in my book. Clissold, being questioned, stood upon his perfect clearness in the matter, and emphatically declared that he asked no better than to be tested by 'Tregarthen's book.' My book was examined, and the entry of five hundred pounds was not there."

"How not there," said the captain, "when you made it yourself?"

"I was then questioned. Had I made the entry? Certainly I had. The House produced my book, and it was not there. I could not deny my book; I could not deny my writing. I knew there must be forgery by some one; but the writing was wonderfully like mine, and I could impeach no one if the House could not. I was required to pay the money back. I did so; and I left the House, almost insolvent, rather than remain there—even if I could have done so—with a dark shadow of suspicion always on me. I returned to my native place, Laurean, and remained there, clerk to a mine, until I was appointed to my little post here."

"I well remember," said the captain, "that I told you that if you had had no experience of illjudgments on deceiving appearances, you were a lucky man. You went hurt at that, and I see why. I'm sorry."

"Than it is," said Tregarthen. "Of my own innocence I have of course been sure; it has been at once my comfort and my trial. Of Clissold I have always been morally almost amounting to certainty; but they have never been confirmed until now. For my daughter's sake and for my own I have endeavored to clear my name heart, as the only secret of my life, and have long believed that it would die with me."

"Wa'al, my good sir," said the captain, cordially, "I'm glad it won't die with you so long. I hope, concerning living, and not dying. Now, here are our two honest friends, the loving Raybrock and the Sea-faring Man! Here they agreed on one point, on which I'd back 'em round the world, and right across it from north to south, and then again from east to west, without doubt it, from your deepest Cornish mine to China. It is, that they will never use this same so-often-mentioned sum of money, and that refilling of it must be made to you. These two, the loving member and the slow, for the sake of the right and of their father's memory, will have it really for you to-morrow. That's it, and nothing short will suit mine, and a most mort'nate transaction."

Tregarthen took the captain by the hand, and gave his hand to each of the young men, but positively and finally answered No. He said, they trusted to his word, and he was glad of it, and at last in his mind; but there was no proof, and the money must remain as it was. All were very earnest over this; and earnestness in men, when they are right and true, is so impressive, that Mr. Pettifer deserted his cookery and looked on quite moved.

"And so," said the captain, "so we come—as that lawyer-critter says—to where we were this morning, might—to mere proof; do we? We must have it; must we? How? From this Clissold's relations? I mark you my say it ain't a hard to make out that there was a neat forgery of your writing committed by the two smart Rowdy and town practitioners, made his acquaintance, and a substitution of a forged leaf in your book for a real and true leaf torn out. Now, was that real and true leaf then and there destroyed? No—for there it is, all in its drunken way, let slipped it into a crack in his own desk, because you came into the office before there was time to burn it—and there it is now, to do it arterwards. Wait a bit. Where is that desk now? Do you consider it likely to be in America Square, London City?"

Tregarthen shook his head.

"The House has not, for years, transacted business in that place. I have heard of it and read of it, as removed, enlarged, every way altered. Things alter so fast in these times."

"You think so," returned the captain, with compassion; "you think so, and come over and see me afore you talk about that. Wa'al, now. This desk, this paper—this paper, this desk," said the captain, ruminating and talking about, and looking, in his uneasy abstraction, into Mr. Pettifer's hat on a table, among other things. "This desk, this paper—[Aside] Kitty, this letter," the captain continued, musing and roaming about the room, "I'd give—

However, he gave nothing, but took up his steward's hat instead, and stood looking into it, as if he had just come into Church. After that he roamed again, and again said, "This desk, belonging to that firm of Dringworth Brothers, America Square, London City—"

Mr. Pettifer, still strangely moved, and now more moved than before, came to the table as he backed across the room, and bespake him thus:

"Captain Jorgan, I have been wishful to engage your attention, but I couldn't do it. I am unwilling to interrupt, Captain Jorgan, but I must do it. I know something about that house."

The captain stood stock-still, and looked at him with the hat hanging from his elbow under his arm.

"You're aware," pursued his steward, "that I was once in the broking business, Captain Jorgan?"

"I was aware," said the captain, "that you had failed in that calling, and in half the businesses going, Tom."

"Not quite so, Captain Jorgan; but I failed in the broking business. I was partners with my brother, sir. There was a sale of old office furniture at Dringworth Brothers when the house was moved from America Square, and me and my brother made what we call in the trade a Deal there, sir. And I'll make bold to say, sir, that the only thing I ever had from my brother, or from any relation—for my relations have mostly taken property from me instead of giving me any—was an old desk we bought at that same sale, with a crack in it. My brother wouldn't have given me even that, when we broke partnership, if it had been worth any thing."

"Where is that desk now?" said the captain.

"Well, Captain Jorgan," replied the steward, "I couldn't say for certain where it is now; but when I saw it last—which was last time we were outward bound—it was at a very nice lady's at Wapping, along with a little chest of wine which was detained for a small matter of a bill owing."

The captain, instead of paying that rapt attention to his steward which was rendered by the other three persons present, went to Church again, in respect of the steward's hat. And a most especially agitated and memorable face the captain produced from it, after a short pause.

"Now, Tom," said the captain, "I spoke to you, when we first came here, respecting your constitutional weakness on the subject of sun-stroke."

"I do did, sir."

"Will any fear friend," said the captain, "lend me his arm, or I shall sink right backwards into this blessed steward's cookery? Now, Tom," pursued the captain, when the required assistance was given, "on the oath as a steward, didn't you take that desk to pieces to make a better one of it, and put it together fresh—or something of the kind?"

"On my oath I did, sir," replied the steward.

"And by the blessing of Heaven, my friends, one and all," cried the captain, radiant with joy—"of the Heaven that put it into this Tom Pettifer's head to take so much care of his head against the bright sun—he lined his hat with the original leaf in Tregarthen's writing—and here it is!"

With that the captain, to the utter destruction of Mr. Pettifer's favorite hat, produced the bookleaf, very much crushed, but still legible, and gave both his legs such tremendous slaps that they were heard far off in the bay, and never accounted for.

"A quarter to five P.M.," said the captain, pulling out his watch, "and that's thirty-three hours and a quarter in all, and a pritty run!"

How they were all overpowered with delight and triumph; how the money was restored, then and there, to Tregarthen; how Tregarthen, then and there, gave it all to his daughter; how the captain undertook to go to Dringworth Brothers and re-establish the reputation of their forgotten old clerk; how Kitty came in, and was nearly torn to pieces, and her marriage was appointed, needs not to be told. Nor how she and the young fisherman went home to the post-office to prepare the way for the happy coming, by declaring him to be the mightiest of men who had made all their fortunes—and then dutifully withdrew together, in order that they might have the coast quite clear entirely to himself. How he availed himself of it is all that remains to tell.

Deeply dighted with his trust, and putting his heart into it, he raised the latch of the post-office parlor where Mrs. Raybrock and the young widow sat, and said:

"May I come in?"

"Sure you may, Captain Jorgan?" replied the old lady. "And good reason you have to be free of the house, seeing how you have served us well used in it by some who ought to have known better. I ask your pardon."

"No you don't, ma'am," said the captain, "for I won't let you. Wa'al to be sure!" By this time he had taken a chair on the hearth between them. "Never felt such an all spirit in the whole course of my life! There! I tell you! I could almost have cut my own connection—Like the dealer in my country, away West, who, when he had let himself be cheated in a bargain, said to himself, 'Now I tell you what! I'll never speak to you again.' And he never did, but joined a settlement of oysters, and cultivated the Christian-fashion-table into their language. Which is a fact that can be proved. If you doubt it, mention it to any oyster you come across, and see if he'll have the face to contradict it."

He took the child from her mother's lap, and set it on his knee.

"Not a bit afraid of me now, you see. Knows I am fond of small people. I have a child, and she's a girl, and I sing to her sometimes."

"What do you sing, sir?" asked Kitty.

"Not a long song, my dear.

Silas Jorgan
Played the organ.

That's about all. And sometimes I tell her stories. Stories of sailors supposed to be lost, and recovered after all hope was abandoned." Here the captain smartly went back to his song:

"Silas Jorgan
Played the organ"

—repeating it with his eyes on the fire, as he softly danced the child on his knee. For he felt that Margaret had stopped working.

"Yes," said the captain, still looking at the fire, "I make up stories and tell 'em to that child. Stories of shipwreck on desert island, and long delay in getting off to civilized lands. It is to stories the like of that, mostly, that Plays the organ."

There was no light in the room but the light of the fire; for the shades of night were on the village, and the stars had begun to peep out of the sky one by one, as the lights in the village peeped out from among the foliage when the night departed. The captain felt that Margaret's eyes were upon him, and thought it discreetest to keep his own eyes on the fire.

"Yes; I make 'em up," said the captain. "I make up stories of brothers brought together by the good providence of God. Of sons brought back to mothers—husbands brought back to wives —fathers raised from the deep, for little children like herself."

Margaret's touch was on his arm, and he could not choose but look round now. Next moment her hand moved imploringly to his breast, and she was on her knees before him—supporting the mother, who was also kneeling.

"What's the matter?" said the captain.

"What's the matter?"

Silas Jorgan
Played the—

Their looks and tears were too much for him, and he could not finish the song, short as it was.

"Mistress Margaret, you have borne ill fortune well. Could you bear good fortune equally well, if it was to come?"

"I hope so. I thankfully and humbly and earnestly hope so!"

"Wa'al, my dear," said the captain, "p'raps it has come. He's—don't be frightened—shall I say the word?"

"Alive?"

"Yes!"

The thanks they fervently addressed to Heaven were again too much for the captain, who openly took out his handkerchief and dried his eyes.

"He's no further off," resumed the captain, "than my country. Indeed, he's no further off than his own native country. To tell you the truth, he's no further off than Falmouth. Indeed, I doubt if he's quite so far. Indeed, if you was sure you could bear it nicely, and I was to do no more than whistle for him—"

The captain's trust was discharged. A rush came, and they were all together again.

This was a fine opportunity for Tom Pettifer to appear with a tumbler of cold water, and he presently appeared with it, and administered it to the ladies: at the same time soothing them, and composing their dresses, exactly as if they had been passengers crossing the Channel. The extent to which the captain staged his legs, when Mr. Pettifer acquitted himself of this act of stewardship, could have been thoroughly appreciated by no one but himself; inasmuch as he must have shipped them black and blue, and they must have smarted tremendously.

He couldn't stay for the wedding, having a few appointments to kep at the irreconcilable distance of about four thousand miles. So next morning all the village cheered him up to the level ground above, and there he shook hands with a complete Census of its population, and invited the whole, without exception, to come and stay several months with him at Salem, Mass., U.S. And there, as he stood on the spot where he had seen that little golden picture of love and parting, and from which he could that morning contemplate another golden picture with a little of golden years in it, little Kitty put her arms round his neck, and kissed him on both his bronzed cheeks, and laid her pretty face upon his storm-beaten breast, in sight of all—ashamed to have called such a noble captain names. And there the captain waved his hat over his head three final times; and there he was last seen, going away accompanied by Tom Pettifer Ho, and carrying his hands in his pockets. And there, before that ground was softened with the fallen leaves of three more summers, a rosy little boy took his first unsteady run to a fair young mother's breast, and the name of that infant fisherman was Jorgan Raybrock.

Burnett's Kalliston.

Letter from a distinguished Physician in Massachusetts.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

Gentlemen.—Agreeably to your request, I have carefully examined the formula which you employ in the manufacture of the article to which you give the name of Burnett's Kalliston, and I am happy to say that I find the ingredients comprising it to be such as medical men would approve of, for ameliorating the condition of the skin in cutaneous affections.

The combination is entirely judicious and compatible, and well calculated to promote a healthy condition of the skin. I am glad to perceive that Glycerine is one of its components. As a cosmetic, your Kalliston must be very desirable, as in addition to its efficacy, it is a delightful perfume.

Respectfully yours,

A NEW YEAR'S STORY, APPEARS ON THE 3d JANUARY, 1861.

In the City of New York, on the above date, will be made public, the above all-absorbing incident, of which almost every one is talking, or hear or know something.

Be it known, therefore, that John Rose Dix, Esq., has written a most remarkable New Year's Story—remarkable alike for its intensely amusing and thrilling narrative, genius and power, which can not fail to carry with it delight and amusement into the household of every family in the land. Seldom, if ever, has a story been published more suited for universal perusal at the commencement of a new year. The records of the world-wide tales told by the pilgrims and pedlars who were all snowed up together on the memorable occasion referred to, are all happily blended together by the author in a style at once genial, attractive, and entertaining, and full of interest.

The above Story has been written specially for the Household Journal, commencing in No. 16. It will appear exclusively

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For January, 1861.

THE Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE have made exertions which they are confident will render the Twenty-second Volume, of which this is the second Number, more valuable and attractive than any which have preceded it.

The Article on "Washoe" in this Number is the second of a Series of Papers portraying Life and Character in California and Oregon, by J. ROSS BROWNE, late Special Government Agent for the Pacific States. They will be profusely illustrated with Drawings by FREDERICKS, SHAW, CHAPIN, and PARSONS, from the Character Sketches by the Author.

In the February Number will appear the first part of a New Story by W. M. THACKERAY, which, it is expected, will be continued in successive Numbers during the year.

Other Illustrated Papers, depicting Life, Character, and Scenery in every part of the American Continent, from Labrador to Florida, are in course of preparation by Several Authors and Artists.

The Publishers trust that the thousands of Voluntary Correspondents by whose aid the Editors have been able to make the "Drawer" a marked feature of the Magazine, will continue their favors; and that new correspondents will forward such anecdotes and facetiæ as come under their observation.

MAJOR ANDERSON, U.S.A., COMMANDING AT FORT SUMTER.

WE are indebted to Mrs. Anderson, wife of Major Anderson, for the likeness from which the accompanying portrait of that gallant officer has been copied. It may be safely said that he, above all other men, is in every one's thoughts and conversation at the present time.

Major Anderson is a Kentuckian; he was born in that State in September, 1805. At the age of fifteen he entered the Military Academy at West Point, and graduated in 1825. He joined the army with the rank of Second-Lieutenant of the Second and subsequently of the Third Artillery. In 1832 he was Inspector-General of the Illinois Volunteers, in the Black Hawk War; Mr. Lincoln, the President-elect being a captain of those volunteers. In 1833 he received his commission as First-Lieutenant, and became Instructor and Inspector at West Point. This post he held for four years, during which period he collected the material for his work on Artillery, the standard text-book on the subject. In 1838, for gallantry in the Florida War, he was made Brevet-Captain, and soon afterward joined General Scott's military family as aid-de-camp. The relations of Major Anderson with the gallant old chief were so friendly and agreeable that one can well imagine the interest felt by the latter in the Major's present movements. In October, 1841, so slow is promotion in our army, Anderson received his commission as captain in his regiment.

In March, 1847, he was with the Third Regiment of Artillery in the army of General Scott, and took part in the siege of VERA CRUZ—being one of the officers to whom was intrusted, by General Bankhead, the command of the batteries. This duty he performed with signal skill and gallantry, and he continued with the army until its triumphal entry into the city of Mexico, in September following. During the operations in the valley of Mexico, he was attached to the brigade of General Garland, which formed a part of General Worth's division. In the attack on El Molino del Rey, on the 8th of September, where he was wounded very severely, his conduct was the theme of especial praise on the part of his superior officers. Captain Burke, his immediate commander, in his dispatch of September 9, says: "Captain Robert Anderson (acting field-officer) behaved with great heroism on this occasion. Even after receiving a severe and painful wound, he continued at the head of the column, regardless of pain and self-preservation, and setting a handsome example to his men of coolness, energy, and courage." General Garland speaks of him as being, with "some few others, the very first to enter the strong position of El Molino;" and adds, that "Brevet-Major Buchanan, Fourth Infantry, Captain Anderson, Third Artillery, and Lieutenant Sedgwick, Second Artillery, appear to have been particularly distinguished for their gallant defense of the captured works." In addition to this testimony to his bearing on that occasion we have that of General Worth, who particularly directed the attention of the Commander-in-Chief to the part he had taken in the action. "For gallant and meritorious conduct in the Battle of Molino del Rey" he was promoted to the brevet rank of Major, dating from September 8, 1847. October 5, 1857, he was promoted to the position of Major of the First Artillery, which he now holds.

All last summer Major Anderson was occupied as a member of the Commission appointed to inspect the United States Military Academy at West Point—A Commission, by-the-way, whose report singularly confirms certain strictures passed on the diet of the cadets in this Journal last summer. It was only six weeks ago that he took the command at Fort Moultrie.

Of Major Anderson's physique a writer, who seems to know him well, says:

"In personal appearance he is about five feet nine inches in height; his figure is well-set and soldierly; his hair is thin and turning to iron grey; his complexion swarthy; his eye dark and intelligent; his nose prominent and well formed. A stranger would read in his air and appearance determination and an exaction of what was due to him. In intercourse he is very courteous, and his rich voice and abundant gesticulations go well together. He is always agreeable and gentlemanly, firm and dignified."

It is universally conceded by all who know Major Anderson, that he is a man who will die at his post rather than surrender. The following letter, written by him on Christmas Day to a friend in Baltimore, shows that he is as modest as he is brave:

"FORT MOULTRIE, S. C.,
December 25.

"——, Esq., Baltimore:

"DEAR SIR,—I thank you for the trouble you were kind enough to take in correcting some of the rumors about me. You are right in the opinion that I could not, and would not, say any thing contradictory of them. My plan always has been to try to do my duty honestly and fully; and to trust that, in the good sense of justice of the people, they would give me credit for good intentions, even if my judgment should turn out not to have been good.

"I must confess that I regret that the papers are making so much of my position here. I do not deserve the least credit for what I am doing—nothing more than any one else would do in my position — and, perhaps, not half so well as many others would do. I receive, hourly by every mail, letters of sympathy, and many of them from strangers.

MAJOR ANDERSON, U.S.A., COMMANDING AT FORT SUMTER, S. C.—[FROM A PORTRAIT IN THE POSSESSION OF MRS. ANDERSON.]

"I hope that it will not be long before something will occur to give me a chance of being relieved from my present position.

"Thanking you for your kind remembrance of me, I am, yours truly,

ROBERT ANDERSON."

All the officers of the command at Fort Sumter have seen service. Captain Truman Seymour, one of the most gallant officers in the service, is also renowned as a traveler; his successful ascent of Popocatepetl — the highest mountain in North America — has been frequently mentioned. Lieutenant Talbot crossed the Rocky Mountains with Frémont's first expedition; Lieutenant Davis was at Buena Vista, and Captain Foster was badly wounded at Molino del Rey.

A SEAT IN THE CITY CARS.

FIVE o'clock!—getting late!—never mind it a bit, I've a seat in the car, and here I will sit Till my street is announced. I will, I declare!—
I have paid the half dime—it is no more than fair.

I've been standing all day in the store and the street;
No rest for my limbs or the soles of my feet:
I am tired to death—would not budge for a king,
For an emperor, duke, or any such thing.

If a woman comes in, why, they shouldn't try
For a seat in the cars, when the evening is nigh.
"Be hang'd before sunset," I said to myself,
(She's a wife for a pattern, she gets home at three).

They say, to be sure, "I can just as well stand!"
But they put up a weak little bit of a hand
In pursuit of a strap that they find is too high,
Settle down on their toes, and give up with a sigh.

Then they seem so unsteady, and waver about
When the cars with a jerk let a passenger out.
There's one getting in!—I would not give up at all.
But stare out of doors: she looks very small.

Standing up in the crowd among those great men,
Her look is this way—I'll look once again.
'Tis a very nice look, and above and upon it,
With a curl peeping out, is a black velvet bonnet.

"Dear me!"—this is bad, then I—Up goes the hand—
Not bigger than Rosie's—she hardly can stand.
I don't feel quite so tired; I will let go all
In spite of temptations to come: and I will.

Well, I'm glad it ain't Rosie—she's not very strong;
A wee little woman, she couldn't stand long.
But stop! let me think: what if that one should be
To some other man what Rose is to me?

And how would I feel if some lazy boor
Should allow her to stand in the draught of the door;
I'm not sure a bit; I am fresh as I can tell
"Here, Madam, a seat"—"Oh. Fred?"—"Rosalie?"

MAJOR ANDERSON.

SOME journals have so far forgotten themselves as to censure Major Anderson for his removal from the defenseless work called Fort Moultrie to the strong fortification known as Fort Sumter. While chivalrous voices even in the Cotton States are loudly proclaiming that the gallant Kentuckian could not have acted otherwise than he has done, Governor Floyd, of Virginia, has carried his pique so far as to reign his post in the Cabinet in consequence of Major Anderson's proceeding.

We tender to President Buchanan our respectful sympathies on the loss he has sustained in the resignation of Governor Floyd. It is a bereavement which he will feel sensibly if, during the brief remainder of his administration, he should have occasion to sell or to buy new sites for military forts. Judging from the past, Governor Floyd's resignation will not diminish the safety of the property of the Government; though it may militate against the prospective profits of the contractors with the War Department. And we learn from the message which Governor Floyd condescended to transmit to Congress, the late Secretary of War was a man of such exuberant patriotism that he could not contemplate the attitude of the army contractor without emotion, and was ready to issue his own acceptances rather than see the firm which supplied flour to the troops put to any temporary inconvenience. The loss of such a patriot can not but be viewed with anguish; still, this is a country of remarkable recuperative powers, and the ingratitude of republics is proverbial. Mr. Buchanan must nerve himself to the trial: we once lost the City of Washington, and recovered from it; may we not hope to survive the retirement of Floyd?

If Major Anderson, laden with the responsibility of holding the United States forts at Charleston, had remained at Fort Moultrie, which he could not defend, leaving Fort Sumter, which he commanded it, to be seized any day by the Revolutionists, he would have proved himself a very poor soldier. By acting as he did he proved himself a good soldier, and, in all human probability, he saved the lives of the seventy men under his command.

The journals which accuse him of double-dealing forget that he made no contract with any one save with the United States, and that a contract was to hold the United States forts in the harbor of Charleston. That contract he has fulfilled. In forty-five minutes he can destroy Fort Moultrie; in forty-five weeks the South Carolinians can not take Fort Sumter.

The silly sailors who dare to couple his name with the word coward are men who dare not meet him face to face and impugn his conduct. He has proved his courage over and over again in Florida, under Taylor in Mexico, and again under Scott in the same country. Southern army officers unanimously concede that the United States has produced no more gallant soldier than Major Robert Anderson. It is to be hoped that he may not have to add to the long list of his gallant exploits a successful defense of Fort Sumter with an insufficient force against an overwhelming body of insurgents. Still, if he be attacked, it will be better to be with him than against him.

THE COTTON MOVEMENT.

In one of the late cotton circulars, prepared for the information of the trade in this country and abroad, mention was made of a shipment of 57,000 bales to Memphis, Tennessee. So far as our recollection goes the event is unprecedented. Some cotton has, for many years, been shipped north to Memphis, whence it has traveled by rail to the Northern factories. But the amount has always been so small that the belligerigerants of the present time could afford to disregard it till the end of the year. Last year the total amount so shipped was set down at about 300,000 bales—an unusually large quantity for the year. This year it is probable that the receipts at Memphis will amount to several hundred thousand more — perhaps a million bales.

The reasons are very simple. On the fall in cotton which followed the first outbreak of revolution in the South the planters held back their crops. By doing so they very gravely embarrassed the factors, who failed in consequence. Hence, the receipts at the Southern ports to date are more than 500,000 bales short of those to same date last year. From the tone of the letters from the South the planters do not seem disposed to send on their crops at the present time, to Mobile, or New Orleans, or Savannah. They must either hold it, and draw upon their resources for supplies for themselves and their negroes, or else ship to Memphis. They are generally adopting the latter alternative.

Many planters expect to make Memphis their principal receiving port, from the belief that between this and March the principal seaports of the Southern States will be blockaded. In this event, of course, planters would have to elect between shipping to Memphis or keeping their cotton. In the present state of science cotton has not been found to be a nutritious article of diet, and it is therefore presumed that the planters will decide to ship to the North.

Thus the ill wind of which we are all complaining is likely to enrich Memphis and Tennessee generally, to an extent which is not dreamed of by short-sighted politicians. That sagacious statesman, Andrew Johnson, may have seen it afar; the merchants of Memphis see it clearly enough.

THE CHRISTIAN PRISONERS IN CHINA.

WE learn that Captain Brabazon, Mr. De Norman, Mr. Boultby, and others—nineteen in all, French and English, who were taken prisoners by the Chinese on the approach to Pekin—have perished in consequence of the severity of their sufferings in captivity. They were tied with cords so tightly bound across the wrists, ankles, and fingers that mortification ensued, the poor life was engendered, and the wretched prisoners perished in agonizing torments.

We also learn, by telegraph from St. Petersburg, that the Allies have concluded peace and evacuated Pekin.

We are unacquainted with the vengeance exacted from the Chinese for the maltreatment of their prisoners. It is to be hoped that it was calculated to astonish the Chinese the value of Christian life. If it was not, Lord Elgin's expedition has been in vain, and the work will have to be done over again. His own reception in England, in this event, will not be enviable.

The brutal massacre of these Englishmen and Frenchmen is consistent with the uniform tenor of Chinese behavior toward foreigners of every race: and if their barbarous conduct has escaped condign punishment, an opportunity has been lost which might have secured the safety of Christians in China for many years to come.

THE LOUNGER.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR!

IT is not yet Twelfth-Night, and until then one may fairly wish a Happy New Year! The wish recurs often, and the oftener the older one gets. In any case, it comes once a year; and it always comes with the same kindly feeling, the same doubts, the same wistful peering into the future and tender remembrance of the past.

There is one rather melancholy fact made more apparent every time it is heard—not, good Sir, that of you and I are a shade nearer the tomb, but, nor yet, dear Madame, that you begin to see your daughter doing and feeling what you have not laid entirely aside—no, a very different fact from either of those, the decay of the New-Year's call!

Oh yes, there is plenty of calling. Fred, Tom, and Bob, in the full flush of expectation, heroically begin in thin boots and kid gloves, and they push zealously on; but the veteran of seven or eight and twenty knows that he simply can not do it. He may make a few calls, but he can not go through that list which fired his ambition seven or eight years ago.

No; the city has so spread, has so crossed the river and included Brooklyn and Jersey City, that you must either relinquish calling altogether or send your card. And, true enough, when pleasure has become a painful duty, it is time to try it no more. When your joints will not readily give, nor your instep quickly spring in the polka, it is time to perceive and acknowledge that your dancing days have gone by; and when the city has so thickened that you can not hope to stretch out with it to the doors of all your friends as easily and cozily as in the days that are no more, it is time for you to stay at home, and allow that New-Year's has one charm the less.

You may stay at home, and think of the good old Dutch days, when Wall Street was the northern boundary of the city, and on Broad Street the gable ends and stoops rebuilt the Old World in the New. You may dream of the time when the Brooklyn passenger ferry was the ferry-house to summon the boatman, and the high-capped Dutch girls looked like full moons out of the windows. Then a man had time enough and not too many friends for New-Years' visits. Then he could sit for a solid quarter of an hour and chat and smile and toast and wonder, while the young crave looked at him with wide eyes, whether the city would ever really extend beyond the fence, and what queer descendants would people the streets in eighteen hundred sixty-one.

MARIE ZAKRZEWSKA.

SOME time since, more than a year ago, the Lounger spoke of a most pleasant and readable history of the City of New York, compiled by Miss Mary L. Booth, who has since been signally successful in the translation of several French works; among which Achard's novel of "Germaine" is an admirable specimen of her skill. The name of this lady is now associated with another little book, edited by Mrs. Dall, whose forcible, temperate, judicious, and effective pen has done so much for a "Woman's right to labor," have given her a distinguished place among those who really wish to open practical avenues for women to keep themselves. It is not the technical "Women's Rights" spirit, but the broad claim of a common welfare of the sexes which is the motive of Mrs. Dall's devotion.

But we have to talk now of something with which her name and that of Miss Booth are but incidentally associated in the friends of Miss Marie Zakrzewska (pronounced Zak-shef-ska), who is already known to many, and prized as a physician peculiarly well qualified, by natural gifts and the most extensive study, for the treatment of women's diseases. She is still a young woman, but her career has been so profoundly interesting and unusual, that her friends were persuaded her to suffer it to be published; which has been done in the form of a letter to her friend Miss Booth, edited by Mrs. Dall, and offered by her as a "Practical Illustration of Woman's Right to Labor," which is the title of the little neat book of only 167 pages.

How well the friends were persuaded her the work itself proves. In no novel of highly-wrought French life has Miss Booth ever translated a chapter so curiously fascinating as Miss Zakrzewska's of a young German woman making her way in the world, not only against the ordinary, but the extraordinary, difficulties which beset women who, with talent, genius, and ambition, find themselves in a household earn an honest living by a career commensurate with their gifts and cultivation. From her childhood she contributed to the spectacle and care of the sick, with a clouded childhood, in which her love for her mother and her consuming desire to devote herself to a similar profession to that which her father—a highly accomplished midwife—she fought with the wild beasts of prejudice and skepticism at her Ephesus, which happened to be Berlin, and after eliciting the warmest sympathy and co-operation of the most accomplished men of medical science in Berlin—after teaching and practicing in the Hospital in that city, with unqualified success, of which her credentials to those who do not know her, and personal experience to those who do, are the proof—she was at last the victim of envy, jealousy, and finally came to this country with a younger sister.

Here they lived, two German girls who could not speak the language, and whose scant purse upon arriving was soon exhausted; protected by Marie's indomitable resolution, her knowledge of the world gained in the hard way, and by the employments which her quick perception showed would be profitable. When one of these failed, she turned to another; and, almost without a friend, she was gradually constantly improving her own and her sister's condition. At length, by constantly looking and asking for herself, she made the acquaintance of Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell, who introduced Marie to the college at Cleveland, in which she had herself studied. The stranger found other friends there; and after completing her course, returned to New York, where at last, in company with Miss Blackwell, she had the satisfaction of seeing the Woman's Infirmary, for the treatment by women of diseases peculiar to women, formally opened. She remained in it for two years, and then removed to Boston, where she is now the Resident Physician of the Female College.

The sobriety and sincerity of her story, its total freedom from offensive egotism, while it is necessarily all about herself, are most striking. Calm, firm, and capable, she has conquered every obstacle, and secured the heartiest recognition of her ability and skill. In saying so, the Lounger but pays a tribute of personal knowledge. Yet there is an undercore of profound sadness in the autobiography, of which she herself gives the best possible explanation:

"I remember that in January, 1845 [Marie was then sixteen years old] Lamy never attended thirty-five women in childbed—the list of names is still in my possession—and visited from sixteen to twenty daily, with my assistance. I do not think that during the month we were in bed for one whole night. Two-thirds of these patients were unable to pay a cent. During these years I learned all of this that it was possible for a human being to learn. I saw nobleness in dens, and meanness in palaces; virtue among prostitutes, and vice among so-called respectable women. I learned to judge human nature correctly: to see goodness where the world found nothing but faults, and also to see faults where the world could see nothing but virtue. The experience thus gained cost me the bloom of youth; yet I would not exchange it for a life of everlasting lavenescence."

Don't you suppose that what such a woman tells of her life must be of commanding and significant interest? You feel the electric force of her nature through her story. What Indian hales dreams to and wish they dared to do, Marie Zakrzewska has done. There are heroines without halos; and one such life is worth a torrent of talk about woman's sphere.

BROTHER JONATHAN AND TOM BROWN.

SCHOOL-BOYS are freemasons. The moment they meet they understand each other. Mr. Tom Hughes knew this when he wrote "School Days at Rugby"—a book which belongs to literature in America as in England, and which is always sure of a post of honor upon his shelf and in his heart. Stanley's Life of Dr. Arnold sent many pilgrims from this side the sea to the home of the beloved and famous schoolmaster; but Hughes's story has probably sent a larger and more enthusiastic throng. For it is the life of the Master for the men; but that of the pupil for boys. And if there is any pleasure truer and more satisfactory than that which springs from the interest and sympathy and love of boys, it has not yet been mentioned.

It seems that not long ago there was an event at Rugby School in which we all have a peculiar interest. Upon the 22d of November of this year just ended, after the "calling over" of Rugby School in the afternoon, Dr. Temple, the Headmaster, entered the room with a company of ladies and gentlemen, and followed by a man bearing a superb banner. The Doctor, in a few words, after alluding to the peculiar goodwill now existing between England and America, as shown and sealed by the late visit of the Prince, introduced to the school Mr. James Geddes Day, a young gentleman of Newark, in Connecticut, who, so far as appears, is the first representative of the American schoolboy (he is, we believe, a graduate of Yale) who has, in that capacity, visited Rugby School.

Following the Doctor Mr. Day made a little speech upon presenting the banner—a speech remarkable in the annals of American oratory for its brevity and point; saying just what is to be said, and nothing more or less. The report of the speech in the Rugby Advertiser of November 24, is as follows:

"'Gentlemen of Rugby, with your permission, in the name of Master Willie Mills, of Newark, Connecticut, of the United States of America, I present to you this standard, as a token of the interest which he and many others in our country feel in your noble school (Cheers). I need not tell you how we know of it. "Tom Brown's School Days" is a household book in America as well as in England, and since it came out I may say that Rugby I do not wonder that Mr. Hughes loved it and was proud of it, and wrote of it as lovingly and as proudly as he did (Great cheering). I hope that you will accept this standard and in the same spirit in which it is given—as an unpretending offering of the good will from a young American to his cousins in the Mother Country (Cheers). And now allow me, in his name and in my own, to promise you a warm, hospitable reception should any of you ever cross the Atlantic. May this (pointing to the banner) remind you of the welcome that awaits you; and may it be a long while ere we become cold and willing to sing as heartily as we do now "God save the Queen" (Immense cheering), and shout as lustily as any of you did Hughes-y-Tom (Renewed applause).

"Mr. Day having ended, three cheers were called for upon his account, and three for the school, and the Headmaster then said that the banner which was given in the well-known hearty manner of the Rugby scholars. The cheering had scarcely ceased when Mr. Day said that it was his desire that the school-house undertake the custody of the banner."

The standard is described as made of crimson velvet, embroidered magnificently with the arms of the school; the letters L. S. upon each side; the colors of England and America entwined in the corners, and mounted with a rich gold bullion fringe.

The incident is in every way graceful and interesting. There is an instinctive and indefeasible loyalty in the American heart toward England. The Revolution was but an event of our history. It did not disturb that deep consciousness that, as we have the same language, so we have the same traditions and literature in the past, and the same great hopes in the future.

A HINT TO WARKINS.

WARKINS is anxious to know what the Lounger thinks of his writing, and in the course of study. He says that he is no longer young, but that he has taste and means, and would like to turn his attention to some department of literature.

Warkins asks the Lounger for the same advice which De Quincey supposed a young man to ask him, and in reply to which he wrote some very sensible letters, which every young man might read with profit. The great point, of course, is to make up your mind what you will try to master, or master as much as possible. No man can read many books; he may know their titles. No man either can know many things; he may appear to know and smatter about them. This assumption of knowledge you can readily test at any moment. For instance, we are all in high debate about the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. People make the most furious and positive statements. Now try the next man whom you hear declaiming most loudly, and ask him when he read the Constitution last—and you will very probably discover that he never read the Constitution at all —or if he has, that he knows it very imperfectly.

It is precisely so with those who only seem to know in literature.

Beginning modestly then, and understanding how limited your studies must necessarily be, determine first of all whether you will undertake science or mere literature, or whether you will dabble a little in each. If you think of the latter plan you had better relinquish it, because you can't dabble in science,—you must know something of it or be worse than ignorant, that is, ridiculous; but you can not know it without making it your chief aim; and it would be foolish to make it your chief aim, unless you are strongly attracted to the study; or, in other words, unless you have a talent for it.

Pure Literature includes all that is not natural science or mathematics, and in all the languages of the leading nations.

Here, again, you must elect your special department—say philosophy, history, or what you will—unless your intention be mere desultory reading; in which case it is no matter when, where, or how you begin.

From this hint, dear Watkins, you can see how to direct yourself. If you wish to do nothing in particular, do it. But if you would accomplish something, determine what it shall be.

DOGS AND THEIR DAY.

It is remarkable that a nation which values dogs as the English nation does should have had no famous dog- festivals corresponding to the horse-races. But at length they are moving, and the dogs are to have their day. At the Birmingham Cattle and Poultry Show some of the sporting noblemen interested themselves in the collection of dogs for comparison and exhibition. There were three hundred picked dogs. One Scotch deerhound helped less than three hounds, although he was more than two years old; and he had killed a huge rat the day before he was brought to Birmingham. He was valued at fifty guineas, or about two hundred and fifty of our dollars. Another little pug, of a ravishing ugliness, was valued, for his inestimable services as a lap-dog, at a thousand guineas, or five thousand dollars, which shows a perfectly dizzy height of civilization.

Yet the show of the nobler dogs must have been very fine. Earl Dugcd contributed bloud-hounds, "a very grand class." Earl Grosvenor and Viscount Curzon were the prize-winners with the foxhounds. Regius devoted deer-hounds were there also, but harriers and beagles few. The Earl of Derby, the Earl of Lichfield, and other gentlemen whom, as the list is an earls, it is unnecessary to mention, took the pointer classes. Lord A. Paget and Mr. Brailsford were strong in retrievers. The spaniels and English and Irish setters were noted. Earl Spencer exhibited the "most meritorious" of Clumber spaniels. There were two German boarhounds, much admired; and the mastiff, the bulldog, the Newfoundland, the many terriers, the ringleted King Charles, the sheep-dog, and the Italian and other greyhounds, were all represented. Among the representatives of foreign breeds, the Alpine mastiffs, the St. Bernards, the rough Russian terriers, Maltese lion-dogs, and Esquimaux fox-dogs are mentioned with praise.

If some such enterprising Barnum would go and do likewise, and give us a complete exhibition of the various breeds, it would be more successful than the Opera.

INDISCRIMINATE LOOT.

THE late accounts of the capture of Pekin by the French and English allied armies, announce that when the Emperor's Summer Palace was taken, "indiscriminate loot was allowed for two days." What is "loot"? does some ingenuous youth inquire? Loot, gentle youth, is pillage, sacking, robbery. When the Indians surprised Deerfield in Massachusetts and Schenectady in New York, they slew all they could, and indiscriminate loot was allowed as long as they chose to stand to it. In like manner, when the Allies captured the Emperor of China's Summer Palace, or rather received it from the authorities who surrendered, they ransacked every apartment, breaking up the valuable articles that were too large to carry away, and ruining the most costly and precious merchandise. How the red American savages would have looked on at the shining eyes and watering mouths! How gladly they would have been instructed by the processes of "civilized warfare" in the grand principles of indiscriminate loot!

In many men's faces the human contour is but a thin and transparent mask over the wild beast. In the countenances of professional pugilists the tiger is very near the surface. In armies and men whose profession is to fight other men, the brute is necessarily not far away. It is perhaps the fault of our education in this country, where we don't fight much, that we had supposed modern warfare to be ameliorated by some amenities. That the army must be used upon occasion—that there must be wars and battles, is not an open question among nations, however civilized or Christian. It is conceded. But that some kind of honor is to be preserved, that the beast in men shall be unchained only to the degree which is absolutely necessary—that we had supposed to be also conceded.

But it is not so. The good old times of giving up a conquered place to wholesome fire and slaughter, of "putting to the inhabitants to the sword," which the valiant heroes of history were so forward in doing, appears, indeed, to have been somewhat bettered upon the present occasion. There were three hundred eunuchs and thirty or forty men in charge of the palaces and gardens, of whom only two were killed, upon some slight show of resistance which they unluckily made; but beyond this there was nothing but ravage and ransacking and destruction of property—in a word, indiscriminate loot.

Now a French-English Chinese war is not very creditable to either nation in any point of view. The English have no business to try to force opium upon China, and that is the real secret of the origin of these wars. If they make a treaty, fair and square, the Chinese ought, of course, to observe it. But will you mention any such treaty made by England with any of the barbarous powers? Would you not describe the English foreign policy toward such powers a bullying policy? But granting that the Chinese, failing to observe their treaty, must be reasoned with from the mouths of forty-pounders—what is the object? The object clearly is to subdue them, and make them feel the superiority of the conquerors. Yes; but would you not facilitate this conviction if you showed your superiority to your discipline as well as in your fighting? Allowing that the Chinese are only accessible to the military argument, would it not be immensely enforced by proving to them not only that your power is irresistible, but under perfect control?

"Indiscriminate loot" shows that the General is afraid of his men. And that is the reason why all modern armies belongs to the nation, not to the soldiers: and if you are obliged to whet their zeal or purchase their good conduct by loot, you do more than what Sir Hope Grant said he had done, take upon yourself "a serious responsibility"—for you have done what you can as such a moment to brutalize your army. Is this a preparation for an English gentleman of the nineteenth century—that of issuing an order to a rabble of armed men for "indiscriminate loot!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A STINGING HEAD-DRESS.

We read in one of the Magazines of Fashion as follows: "Pretty little cops are worn of a round form encircled with a tube." Now, from what we can understand of this, a cache is a hive, and we can hardly imagine that as being about the most becoming coiffure that a lady could wear. We know that many of the beautiful sex carry their love of flowers to the extent of making it out still to encircle one's face with a hive would be decidedly to pertain a method of getting "a bee in one's bonnet" that we can not believe any woman of taste would think of adding her countenance to it. It is true that bees delight to live in a bed of flowers, and a graceful lenary delights in poetically supposing bloom perennially in every woman's heart; nevertheless, it is doubtful whether the most floricultural beauty would like to expose her face to the attacks of insects, even if the will of their sting, even if she could be sure that from the honeyed result there would be distilled for her the very "sweetest of bonnets."

ATTEMPT BY A NEGRO.—There were two learned negroes in Kentucky, of whom the one was already made the great founder of the Roman Empire, and the other bore the name of Cassius Marcellus Brutus, smoking a cigar, was accosted by Julius Cæsar.

"What,—you smoke?" asked the latter slegar.

"I like," said Brutus, "to smoke a little."

"Si chew, Brute!" was the exclamation of Cæsar.

THE SPREAD OF FASHION.

(An Extract from a beautiful and fashionable Young Lady's Letter.)

"I must tell you, dear, that I have got such a capital Crinoline. I wish I could send you the pattern. It is a perfect love,—the most angelic thing I ever saw,—so light and graceful, and easy, and so comfortable that one feels as though one was expanded into a state of real virtue. Of course it is thoroughly French. I got mine at Rouligne, in the Corso de Rosa. It is distinguished from all the rest by an extra case, which unbuttons down the front, and allows the steels to slip out, so that you would pull a pair of scissors out of their leather sheath. There is no stitching to be undone, I need not say that this is a very great convenience, as it enables a lady to send her Crinoline to the wash with the utmost ease, and she would not ordinary petticoat. The body is deeply gored all the way down on both sides," etc., etc.

Lâid so the letter runs on for twenty lines more, but we think we have printed quite enough to warn the gentlemen to prepare themselves for a very severe Winter.]

CALLING NAMES.

Where are the old familiar names?
John and Ann and Mary Jane?
We never hear of a Susan now,
And it's not Sally, but Evaline, who follows the plow.

You'll not travel far by Second Class rail
But you are sure to encounter some Florence pale,
With curls and curls, but Dorothy's down in dress,
But with never a trace of loveliness!

Our laundress's infants have no great charms,
Yet they've names that are quite divine;
While Victor Albert swings on a gate,
And mesmerizes his baby village mate.

'Twould be hard to say there is any blame,
There is no monopoly in a name;
But it strikes one as rather absurd
That contrast between the child and the word.

And what will it be when years have flown?
And there's Adolphus and Jane grown grown?
When Evelyn Ada must polish the grates,
While Edith Amelia is washing the plates!

Think of it then, ye sensible mothers,
Before you arrange fine names for the others;
For though it is pretty, nor perhaps next Sunday,
It will happen as sure as my name is Miss Grundy.

VULGAR SUPERSTITIONS.

That it is not "the thing" to run in any public thoroughfare, even although you are in a hurry, is a fact, and (of course) find that the streets are far too crowded for a man except to crawl along as slowly as an alderman would walk after a dinner at the Mansion House.

That when you call on a swell couple you ought to leave two cards, although a single wife, you have no notion of upon as one.

That calling servants by their surnames gives them a higher rank in the eyes of one's acquaintances, and invests a "Button" with the bearing of a butler.

That it betrays a vulgar mind to be seen carrying a parcel, more particularly supposing it to be wrapped up in a newspaper.

That the worse than seeing magpies or walking under ladders is it to be caught drinking a glass of beer at dinner, or eating a cabbage by any other than its genteel synonym of "greens."

A TRUE FOR A NEW SAILOR.—"I'll warm you."

GHOSTS WE NEVER WISH TO SEE.

The Ghost of all our good intentions.
And still less, should we like to see every day of our lives, the Ghost of a leg of mutton.
The only Ghost we do care about seeing is the Ghost in Richardson's show.

NEGATIVE ADVICE.

Never "for form's sake" write your name across a bill, unless you are prepared to "form" a certain concurrence.

Never expect to touch a street musician by your story of your own misfortunes taken in your house, except you emphasize it pointedly with a heavy knock at the door.

Never marry a rich widow who calls you by your Christian name the second time you meet her, unless you have quite made your mind up to the worst.

WHY AND BECAUSE.

Why does a jolum never come up cold at a one-side lodging-house?—Because the rule of such places is, "Cut and come again."

Why does a pint of milk at 5d. go twice as far in New York as it does in London?—Because the same money?—Because water is the cheapest mode of conveyance.

Why do young ladies bore themselves so tight that they can neither swallow easily nor digest properly?—Because they bear so much stress laid upon "Grace before meat."

THE HOME-FARM.

An abundant growth of wild oats is, often, only a proof of the richness of the soil. The ground may always be put into decent, if not into rich tame crops. The deeper you plant or sow the better; but when they are up, keep the ground let'em take their chance, and don't always be pulling up to see how they are doing, lad.

Avoid the dangerous practice of bringing your husband under the harrow.

Don't be in a hurry to grub up your husband's weeds. It is a dangerous experiment, sometimes.

The worst sign of a neglected home-farm is bachelors' buttons on a married man's shirts.

WHAT IS WOMAN'S MISSION?

This momentous question being asked the other evening, Spoonley said: "A woman's mission is whatever she says it must be thought her mission was to—say—wait on the gentlemen—to—to—sit and look pretty—to—to—say about one's dinners, and one's—aw—furniture, and things,—" In fact, said Miss Porter, "Woman's Mission simply is to polish the spoons!"

VANITY.—What no man, nor woman either, by any accident, ever becomes, but what is always very largely developed in every body else.

THE GIRL OF MY HEART.—Oyster Patty.

GASTRONOMICAL PARADOX.—Buck venison is the best for venison-pasty, although the pasty must be made of dough.

ZOOLOGICAL EMBLEM.—The hedgehog is well known to be accustomed to roll itself up into a ball. This is remarkable; for not only does it eat black-beetles, but also, kept in a domestic state, it becomes very playful, and its favorite game is cricket.

THE ARITHMETICAL PARADOX.—The half is sometimes more than the whole. That is the case when the half of half-and-half is finite, and the whole be infinite.

INVALID CHITCHAT.—"Why, Sowerby, what's the matter? You don't look as though you were glad to see me. What have you been taking?" "Nothing but my meals for the last fortnight, Mr. Hobbleday." "Ah, I thought you seemed off your physic."

HINT TO ELECTIONEERING AGENTS.—If you want to secure a vote by treating an elector, ask him to dinner, and give him canvass-back ducks.

QUEER QUERIES.

Is it not affectation in husbands of short stature to say that they were married in the Temple of Hy-men?

Why is a man who has lost his wife like unto the heir of the French?

Did you ever see a lame dog helped over a stile?

What are the odds that the first owner of a milk walk was a dairy-man?

Was he a great walker that he earned the name of the Colossus of Roads?

What proof is there extant that King James the First wrote the Bible?—Is not the phrase "as cool as a cucumber" was applied first to a Scald?

A WHOLESOME BEVERAGE.—The leaves of Deadly Nightshade, infused in boiling hot water, make a fine tea. It may be sweetened with sugar if need. This has one great advantage over common tea, which, according to some medical authorities, is a slow poison.

NEGATIVE ADVICE.—Never, unless you speak French fluently, enter a shop in Paris where you see the notice, "Here they Spike the English."

HOMEOPATHY.—Like cures like. One irritation relieves another. That is the reason why, from a natural curative instinct, people scratch themselves when they itch. For this purpose, Sowerby says, they do not use a millionth part of the right finger.

OUR COMET CIRCULAR.—We have not the slightest regret in stating that the King of Naples is still confined to his castle, in which he has been for the last three months. He is suffering from a violent blow dealt to him by one Garibaldi on the head. The wound is extremely unceratain—almost as uncertain, we should say, as the recovery of his throne.

CAUTION!

If you value your peace of mind, kind reader, pray don't read this riddle:

Q. When does an old woman who is driving a donkey into a shed resemble another who is giving an alarm of murder?

A. When she cries "ASS-ASS-IN!"

THE DANGER OF JESTING.—"When is a brick a title?" asked Powers, Senior, of Smith, Junior. "Give it up? When it's a prophecy, for it is to throw a brick-bat and broke a window. His precepter forgave him the mischief he had done, but whipped him for punning.

NOTES ON NURSING.

BY A CLOWN.

Toss the baby to Pantaloon, crying "Catchee, catchee!" Snatch it away from Pantaloon, and run with it over the stiles, knocking him down. Squat upon the ground with the baby in your lap, and pretend to be afraid of a huge pan with a great dripping-ladle. Ram the ladle into the mouth of the baby, and scrape the fat into the edges of it, then lick them clean. Now wash the baby by putting it in a tub, pouring hot water on it from the kettle, and swabbing its face with a mop. Dry the baby with a rake; then put the baby into a mangle and roll it out flat. Set the baby in the table-drawer, and shut the drawer. Make the baby cry; then take it out of bed to quiet it, and give it Paregoric to make it sleep. Administer poppy-drop. Smear the slop over its face. Take it away again, catch hold of it by the ankles, and swing it round and round by the legs, thrash Pantaloon off the stage with the baby, and throw it after him.

SPORT IN SEASON.—On Valentine's Day birds may pair, but men go popping on the first of September.

THE POWER OF SOUND.—Of all examples of descriptive music the most perspicuous is certainly a wedding-peal. Bell-ringing is very frequently the essential act of the marriage ceremony, which may be said to consist in ringing a belle; unless, indeed, the bride is a griffin.

MAKING LIGHT OF IT.—That inveterate punster, Jones, hearing that his friend Harding had suddenly had his gas cut off, exclaimed, "Ah yes, I suppose they did it by a coup de Hardy."

A BAD ATTEMPT BY A HEADSMEN.—Q. When is a ship's sail most fit to be sold in a linen-draper's shop?—A. When it is torn to ribbons.

SENSITIVE.—A young gentleman of our acquaintance, whose genius is perhaps exceeded by his gallantry, declares that no reason for not living in the country is the fear lest it should not have him get into ride health.

SPIRITUALISM.—Surprise has been expressed at the fact that spiritual communications convey no sort of instruction. The fact is accounted for by the supposition that the mediums are inspired by raw spirits.

QUESTION!—To any Debating Society that may want a question for discussion, we would recommend the question, as to whether a dishonest tailor may be deemed a vegetable, on the ground that he lives almost entirely upon cabbage.

SOCIAL STATISTICS.

At a Spiritualist Soirée, which was held in town last summer, as many as six profound testators averred that they felt under the influence of spirits.

Of the hundred young gentlemen who last year travelled on the Continent, no fewer than a dozen did not seize the opportunity to try and get up a mustache.

One hundred and eleven members of the Peace Society have this year duly discontinued dwelling with their penny-cook, on the ground that they believe no death is sinful now, because of the inscription in his window, "Bulls Supplied."

Proofs are extant, in the shape of lines-drapers' bills, that since Macbeth's time ten thousand so-thought-to-be-minded women have been weak enough to purchase things for which they could not afford because they were ticketed "Great Bargains."

Of a hundred young man who last season received cards for what he genteel call "At homes," and the vulgar "Evenings," seventy pleaded "sudden illness" or "previous engagement," and of the ten heroes who virtuously stayed at home only two manage to pass beyond the staircase.

In the course of the last twelve months no less than a couple of advertising vans were discovered being driven on the right side of the road.

Of two million young ladies who last year were asked to sing, it is a fact that sixteen did so without making an apology for having a bad cold.

A DITTY BY A DOCTOR.

Written in the Presence of a nice Orchard-House.

Hurrah! 'tis drear December,
It snows and blows like fun;
Abroad is darkness,
As sure as any gun:
The fogs are growing yellow;
There's Jaundice in the air;
And agues, coming round the wet,
To earth will soon repair.
Chorus.—All among the bottles
When you're sick and sad;
While physic for some throttles
Is washed down such day!

The spring is not a bad time,
When hooping-cough is briggs;
The summer is glad time,
With fever on its wings:
If autumn is bad, lickly,
Our profits are not small;
But in winter we have steady
Complaints around us fall.
Chorus.—So, all among the bottles, etc.

CAUTION TO ELDERLY FEMALES.—Buildings are protected from the effects of lightning by means of conductors, which are long iron rods or wires. The safest place for you in a thunder-storm is that omnibus of which the conductor is tall and wiry.

HOW TO GET A GOOD FRAME CHEAP.

Live temperately, be abstemious, cultivate early hours, rise with the lark and go to bed after owls, have a plenty of exercise, don't be afraid of lots of cold water, make a practice of always being cheerful, avoid debt, draughts, bad company, bills, and wet feet, and you will have a good constitution, which is, or shall be a Frame, moreover, worth more than its weight in gold, such as shall inclose the very picture of health.

RURAL RAPTURES.

'Tis sweet at dewy eve to rove
When softly sighs the western breeze,
And wanderers by the moonlight rove
To take a pinch of snuff and sneeze.

'Tis sweet to see in dalsied field
The flocks and herds their pleasure take;
But sweeter are the joys they yield
In tender chop and juicy steak.

'Tis sweet to hear the murmurous sound
That from the wood woods doth rise,
To mark the virgins shelling round,
And think how nice they'd be in pies.

When nightingales pour from their throats
Their gushing melody, 'tis sweet;
Yet sweeter 'tis to catch the notes
That issue from Thundernold Street.

USEFUL FAMILY RECIPES (FOR WIVES).

Honey Soup.—Take of smiles, soft answers, tolerance, temper, and good humor. Mix well, and place ready for use to your husband.—The above will be found an invaluable recipe for removing all roughness and irritation—for giving smoothness to the temper, and for dertaining all the unpleasant effects of domestic friction.

An Excellent Dish for Any Chafed and Irritable Substance. Placidity, and pleasant looks.

To Render Your Husband Comfortable.—Steep them in common sense, self-respect, and consideration for others.

The Best Way to Preserve Peace.—Make it before marriage.

RECIPE FOR A PLEASANT DINNER-PARTY.

A round table, holding eight;
A hearty welcome and little state;
One dish at a time,
As plain as you please, but always prime;
Beer for strong feeders, sherry for wine;
Servants who don't require a tutor;
Good roasts and good puddings;
Warm plates and hot potatoes.

SLANG.—"Down with your dust." Pay: put down your money. The phrase originated with moral writers, who are accustomed to describe money as dross and dirt, and, as thus implying a contempt of riches, it is much used by the serious.

A NEW ANSWER TO AN OLD QUESTION.—Where was Moses when he put the candle out? Not necessarily in the dark. He might have been a Jewish hairdresser, and have been taking a friend daylight, which his mustache required.

AN INEVITABLE CERTAINTY OF CATCHING A COLD.—Being asked to sleep.

CHINESE POETRY.

It took a three-hours' fight,
It cut four hundred men,
To change the Forts Taku
Into Forts Dakes.

THE BOTHERATIVE OF THE TIMES.—We expect to see, very shortly, houses opened all over the country, at which will be held the following refreshments—namely, sweet:—"A GLASS OF ALE AND A SANDWICH, AND YOUR PHOTOGRAPH, FOR FOURPENCE!"

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

Splendidly Illustrated by John McLenan.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased from the Author by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XI.

My mind grew very uneasy on the subject of the pale young gentleman. The more I thought of the light and recalled the pale young gentleman on his back in various stages of puffy and in crimsoned countenance, the more certain it appeared that something would be done to me. I felt that the pale young gentleman's blood was on my head, and that the Law would avenge it. Without having any definite idea of the penalties I had incurred, it was clear to me that village boys could not go stalking about the country, ravaging the houses of gentlefolks and pitching into the studious youth of England, without laying themselves open to severe punishment. For some days I even kept close at home, and looked out at the kitchen-door with the greatest caution and trepidation before going on an errand, lest the officers of the County Jail should have come upon me. The pale young gentleman's nose had stained my trowsers, and I tried to wash out that evidence of my guilt in the dead of night. I had cut my knuckles against the pale young gentleman's teeth, and I twisted my imagination into a thousand tangles, as I devised incredible ways of accounting for that damnatory circumstance when I should be haled before the Judges.

When the day came round for my return to the scene of the deed of violence, my terrors reached their height. Whether myrmidons of Justice, specially sent down from London, would be lying in ambush behind the gate? Whether Miss Havisham, preferring to take personal vengeance for an outrage done to her house, might rise in those grave-clothes of hers, draw a pistol, and shoot me dead? Whether subsorned boys—a numerous band of mercenaries—might be engaged to fall upon me in the brewery, and knock me about until I was no more? It was high testimony to my confidence in the spirit of the pale young gentleman, that I never imagined him accessory to these retaliations; they always came into my mind as the acts of injudicious relatives of his, goaded on by the state of his visage and an indignant sympathy with the family features.

However, go to Miss Havisham's I must, and go I did. And behold! nothing came of the late struggle. It was not alluded to in any way, and no pale young gentleman was to be discovered on the premises. I found the same gate open, and I explored the garden, and even looked in at the windows of the detached house; but my view was suddenly stopped by the closed shutters within, and all was lifeless and deserted. Only in the corner where the combat had taken place could I detect any evidence of the young gentleman's existence. There were traces of his gore on the spot, and I covered them with garden-mould from the eye of man.

On the broad landing between Miss Havisham's own room and that other room in which the long table was laid out, I saw a garden-chair—a light chair on wheels, that you pushed from behind. It had been placed there since my last visit, and I entered, that same day, on a regular occupation of pushing Miss Havisham in this chair (when she was tired of walking with her hand upon my shoulder) round her own room, and across the landing, and round the other room. Over and over and over again, we would take those journeys, and sometimes they would last as long as three hours at a stretch. I insensibly fell into a general mention of my trade, my life, my prospects, because it was at once settled that I should return every alternate day as noon for these purposes, and because I was going to sum up a period of at least eight or ten months.

As we began to be more used to one another, Miss Havisham talked more to me, and asked me such questions as what I had learned and what was I going to be? I told her I was going to be apprenticed to Joe, I believed; and I enlarged upon my knowing nothing and wanting to know every thing, in the hope that she might offer some help toward that desirable end. But she did not; on the contrary, she seemed to like my being ignorant. Neither did she ever give me any money—or any thing but my daily dinner—nor ever stipulate that I should be paid for my services.

Estella was always about, and always let me in and out, but never told me I might kiss her again. Sometimes, she would coolly tolerate me; sometimes, she would condescend to me; sometimes, she would be quite familiar with me; sometimes, she would treat me energetically that she hated me. Miss Havisham would often ask me in a whisper, or when we were alone, "Does she grow prettier and prettier, Pip?" And when I said yes (for indeed she did), would seem to enjoy it greedily in secret. Also, when we played at cards Miss Havisham would look on, with a miserly relish of Estella's moods, whatever they were. And sometimes, when her moods were so many and so contradictory of one another that I was puzzled what to say or do, Miss Havisham would embrace her with lavish fondness, murmuring something in her ear that sounded like "Break their hearts my pride and hope, break their hearts and have no mercy!"

There was a song Joe used to hum fragments of at the forge, of which the burden was Old Clem. This was not a very ceremonious way of rendering homage to a patron saint; but I believe Old Clem stood in that relation toward smiths. It was a song that imitated the measure of beating upon iron, and was a mere lyrical excuse for the introduction of Old Clem's respected name. Thus, you were to hammer boys round—Old Clem! With a thump and a sound —Old Clem! Beat it out, beat it out—Old Clem! With a clink for the stout—Old Clem! Blow the fire, blow the fire—Old Clem! Roaring fire, roaring higher—Old Clem! One day soon after the appearance of the chair, Miss Havisham suddenly saying to me, with the impatient movement of her fingers, "There, there, there! Sing!" I was surprised into crooning this ditty as I pushed her over the floor. It happened so to catch her fancy, that she took it up in a low brooding voice as if she were singing in her sleep. After that, it became customary with us to have it as we moved about, and Estella would often join in; though the whole strain was so subdued, even when there were three of us, that it made less noise in the grim old house than the lightest breath of wind.

What could I become with these surroundings? How could my character fail to be influenced by them? Is it to be wondered at if my thoughts were dazed, as my eyes were, when I came out into the natural light from the misty yellow rooms?

Perhaps I might have told Joe about the pale young gentleman, if I had not previously been betrayed into those enormous inventions to which I have confessed. Under the circumstances, I felt that Joe could hardly fail to discern in the pale young gentleman an appropriate passenger to be put into the black velvet coach; therefore I said nothing of him. Besides: that shrinking from having Miss Havisham and Estella discussed, which had come upon me in the beginning, grew much more potent as time went on. I reposed complete confidence in no one but Biddy: but I told poor Biddy every thing. Why it came natural to me to do so, and why Biddy had a deep concern in every thing I told her, I did not know then, though I think I know now. Shade of poor Biddy, forgive me!

Meanwhile councils went on in the kitchen at home, fraught with almost insupportable aggravation to my exasperated spirit. That ass, Pumblechook, used often to come over of a night for the purpose of discussing my prospects with my sister; and I really do believe (to this hour with less penitence than I ought to feel) that if these hands could have taken a linch-pin out of his chaise-cart they would have done it. The miserable man was a man of that confined stability of mind that he could not discuss my prospects without having me before him—as it were, to operate upon—and he would drag me up from my stool (usually by the collar) where I was quiet in a corner, and, standing me before the fire as if I was going to be cooked, would begin by saying, "Now, mum, here is this boy! Here is this boy which you brought up by hand. Hold up your head, boy, and be forever grateful unto them whom sis did do. Now, mum, with respections to this boy!" And then he would rumple my hair the wrong way—which, from my earliest remembrance, as already hinted, I have in my soul denied the right of any fellow-creature to do—and would hold me before him by the sleeve; a spectacle of imbecility only to be equaled by himself.

Then he and my sister would fair off in such nonsensical speculations about Miss Havisham, and about what she would do with me and for me, that I used to want—quite painfully—to burst into spiteful tears, fly at Pumblechook, and pommel him all over. In these dialogues my sister spoke of me as if she were morally incapable of my teeth out at every reference; while Pumblechook himself, self-constituted my patron, would sit supervising me with a depreciatory eye, like the architect of my fortunes who thought himself engaged on a very unremunerative job.

In these discussions Joe bore no part. But he was often talked at, while they were in progress, by reason of Mrs. Joe's perceiving that he was not favorable to my being taken from the forge. I was fully old enough now to be apprenticed to Joe; and when Joe sat with the poker on his knees thoughtfully raking out the ashes between the lower bars, my sister would so distinctly construe that innocent action into opposition on his part, that she would dive at him, take the poker out of his hands, shake him, and put it away. There was a most irritating end to every one of these debates. All in a moment, with nothing to lead up to it, my sister would step herself in a yawn, and would swoop upon me, with "Come! There's enough of you! You get along to bed: you've given trouble enough for one night, I hope!" As if I had besought them as a favor to bother my life out.

Well! We were on in this way for a long time, and it seemed likely that we should continue to go on in this way for a long time, when one day Miss Havisham stopped short as she and I were walking, she leaning on my shoulder; and said, with some displeasure,

"You are growing tall, Pip!"

I thought it best to hint, through the medium of a meditative look, that this might be occasioned by circumstances over which I had no control.

She said no more at the time; but she presently stopped and looked at me again; and presently again; and after that looked frowning and moody. On the next day of my attendance when our usual exercise was over, and I had landed her at her dressing-table, she staid me with a movement of her impatient fingers:

"Tell me the name again of that blacksmith of yours."

"Joe Gargery, ma'am."

"Meaning the master you were to be apprenticed to?"

"Yes, Miss Havisham."

"You had better be apprenticed at once. Would Gargery come here with you, and bring your indentures, do you think?"

I signified that I had no doubt he would take it as an honor to be asked.

"Then let him come."

"At any particular time, Miss Havisham?"

"There, there! I know nothing about times. Let him come soon, and come alone with you."

When I got home at night, and delivered this message for Joe, my sister "went on the Rampage, as Joe expressed it, in a more alarming degree than at any previous period. She asked me and Joe whether we supposed she was down-stairs under our feet, and how we dared to use her so, and what company we graciously thought she was fit for? When Joe had escaped a torrent of such inquiries, she threw a candlestick at Joe, burst into a loud sobbing, got out the dust-pan—which was always a very bad sign—put on her coarse apron, and began cleaning up to a terrible extent. Not satisfied with a dry cleaning, she took a pail and scrubbing-brush, and cleaned us out of house and home, so that we stood shivering in the back-yard. It was ten o'clock at night before we ventured to creep in again, and then she asked Joe why he hadn't married a Negress Slave at once? Joe offered no answer, poor fellow! but stood feeling his whisker and looking dejectedly at me, as if he thought it really might have been a better speculation.

CHAPTER XII.

It was a trial to my feelings, on the next day but one, to see Joe arraying himself in his Sunday clothes to accompany me to Miss Havisham's. However, as he thought his court-suit necessary to the occasion, it was not for me to tell him that he looked far better in his working dress; the rather, because I knew he made himself so dreadfully uncomfortable, entirely on my account, and that it was for me he pulled up his shirt-collar so very high behind that it made the hair on the crown of his head stand up like a tuft of feathers.

At breakfast-time my sister declared her intention of going to town with us, and being left at Uncle Pumblechook's, and called for "when we had done with our fine ladies"—a way of putting the case, from which Joe, I thought, declined to augur the worst. The forge was shut up for the day, and Joe inscribed in chalk upon the door (as it was his custom to do on the very rare occasions when he was not at work) the monosyllable HOUT, accompanied by a sketch of an arrow supposed to be flying in the direction he had taken.

We walked to town, my sister leading the way in a flowered large bonnet and carrying a basket like the Captain's head of Flopsy in a straw, a pair of pattens, and an umbrella, though it was a fine bright day. I am not quite clear whether these articles were carried for ostentation or ostentatiously; but I rather think they were displayed as articles of property—much as Cleopatra, or any other sovereign, lolls on the Rampage, might exhibit her wealth in a pageant-procession.

When we came to Pumblechook's my sister bounced in and left us. As it was almost noon Joe and I held straight on to Miss Havisham's house. Estella opened the gate as usual, and the moment she opened it took his hat off and stood weighing it by the brim in both his hands—as if he had some urgent reason in his mind for being particular to half a quarter of an ounce.

Estella took no notice of either of us, but led us the way that I knew so well. I followed next to her, and Joe came last. When I looked back at Joe in the long passage he was still weighing his hat with the greatest care, and was coming after us in long strides on the tips of his toes.

Estella told me we were both to go in, so I took Joe by the coat-cuff and conducted him into Miss Havisham's presence. She was seated at her dressing-table, and looked round at us immediately.

"Oh!" said she to Joe. "You are the husband of the sister of this boy?"

I could hardly have imagined dear old Joe looking so unlike himself or so like some extraordinary bird; standing, as he did, speechless, with his ruff of feathers ruffled, and his mouth open, as if he wanted a worm.

"You are the husband," repeated Miss Havisham, "of the sister of this boy?"

It was very aggravating, but throughout the interview Joe persisted in addressing Mr. instead of Miss Havisham.

"Which I meantersay, Pip," Joe now observed in a manner that was at once expressive of forcible argumentation, strict confidence, and great politeness, "as I hup and married your sister, and I were at no time wishful to slight a call (if you was any ways inclined) a single man."

"Well?" said Miss Havisham. "And you have reared the boy, with the intention of taking him for your apprentice; is that so, Mr. Gargery?"

"You know, Pip," replied Joe, "as you and me were ever friends, and it were look'd for'ard to betwixt us, as long calculated to lead to larks. Not but what, Pip, if you had ever made objections to the business—such as its being open to black and sut, or such-like—but not what you would have been attended to; don't you see?"

"Has the boy," said Miss Havisham, "ever made any objection? Does he like the trade?"

"Which it is well beknown to yourself, Pip," returned Joe, strengthening his former mixture of argumentation, confidence, and politeness, "that it were the wish of your own hart." (I saw the idea suddenly break upon him that he would adapt his epitaph to the occasion, before he went on to say:) "And there were no objection on your part, and, Pip, it were the great wish of your hart."

It was quite in vain for me to endeavor to make him sensible that he ought to speak to Miss Havisham. The more I made faces and contorted myself, the more he persisted mutual, argumentative, and polite he persisted in being to Me.

"Have you brought his indentures with you?" asked Miss Havisham.

"Well, Pip, you know," replied Joe, as if that were a question reasonable, "you yourself see me put 'em in my 'and, therefore you know as they are here." With which he took them out, and gave them, not to Miss Havisham, but to me. I was afraid I was ashamed of the dear, good fellow—I know I was ashamed of him—when I saw that Estella stood at the back of Miss Havisham's chair, and that her eyes laughed mischievously. I took the indentures out of his hand and gave them to Miss Havisham.

"Good," said Miss Havisham, as she looked them over, "no premium with the boy?"

"Joe!" I remonstrated, for he made no answer at all. "Why don't you—"

"Pip," returned Joe, cutting me short as if he were hurt, "which I meantersay that were not a question requiring a answer betwixt yourself and me, and which you know the answer to be full well No. You know it to be No, Pip, and wherefore should I say it?"

Miss Havisham glanced at him as if she understood what he really was, better than I had thought possible, seeing what he was there; and took up a little bag from the table beside her.

"Pip has earned a premium here," she said, "and here it is. There are five-and-twenty guineas in this bag. Give it to your master, Pip."

As if he were absolutely out of his mind with the wonder awakened in him by her strange figure and the strange room, Joe, even at this pass, persisted in addressing me.

"This is very liberal on your part, Pip," said Joe, "and it is as such received and grateful welcome, though never looked for, far nor near nor nowheres. And now, old chap," said Joe, conveying to me a sensation, first of burning and then of freezing, for I felt as if that familiar expression were applied to Miss Havisham; "and now, old chap, may we do our duty! May you do your duty, both on us by one and another, and by them which your liberal presents—have—conweyed—to be—for the satisfaction of mind—of—them as never—here Joe showed that he felt he had fallen into frightful difficulties, until he triumphantly released himself with the words, "and from myself far be it!" These words relieved me of a cruel and convincing sound to him that he said them twice.

"Good-by, Pip!" said Miss Havisham. "Let them out, Estella."

"Am I to come again, Miss Havisham?" I asked.

"No. Gargery is your master now. Gargery! One word!"

Thus called to him back as I went out of the door, I heard her say to Joe in a distinct emphatic voice, "The boy has been a good boy here, and that is his reward. Of course, as an honest man, you will expect no other and no more."

How Joe got out of the room I have never been able to determine; but I know that when he did get out he was insanely proceeding up stairs instead of coming down, and was dead to all remonstrance until I went after him and laid hold of him. In another minute we were outside the gate, and it was locked, and Estella was gone.

When we stood in the daylight alone again, Joe backed up against a wall, and said to me, "Astonishing!" And there he remained so long, saying "Astonishing!" at intervals, so often, that I began to think his senses were never coming back. At length he prolonged his remarks by saying, "Pip, I do assure you that this is as-tro-nishing!" and, so, by degrees, became conversational and able to walk away.

I have reason to think that Joe's intellects were bewildered by the encounter they had passed through, and that on our way to Pumblechook's he invented a subtle and deep design. My reason for so thinking is as what took place in Mr. Pumblechook's parlor: where, on our presenting ourselves, my sister sat in conference with that detested seedsman.

"Well?" cried my sister, addressing us both at once. "And what's happened to you? I wonder you condescend to come back to such poor society as this, I am sure I do!"

"Miss Havisham," said Joe, with a fixed look at me, like an effort of remembrance, "made it very particular her that we should give her—were it compliments or respects, Pip?"

"Compliments," I said.

"Which have we got our own belief," answered Joe—"her compliments to Mrs. J. Gargery."

"Much good they'll do me!" observed my sister; but not sharply, "nothing."

"And wishing," pursued Joe, with another fixed look at me, like another effort of remembrance, "that the state of Miss Havisham's health were such as would have—allowed, were it, Pip?"

"Of her having the pleasure," I added.

"Of taking company," said Joe. And drew a long breath.

"Well!" cried my sister, with a mollified glance at Pumblechook. "Much you deserve to have had the politeness to send that message at first, but it's better late than never. And what did she give young Rantipole here?"

"She gave him," said Joe, "nothing."

Mrs. Joe was going to break out, but Joe went on.

"What she giv," said Joe, "she giv' to his friends. And by his friends,' were her explanation, 'I mean into the hands of his sister Mrs. J. Gargery.' There now, you have it, 'Mrs. J. Gargery.' She mayn't have know'd," added Joe, with an appearance of reflection, "whether it were Joe, or Jorge."

My sister looked at Pumblechook: who smoothed the elbows of his wooden arm-chair, and nodded at her and at the fire, as if he had known all about it beforehand.

"And how much have you got?" asked my sister, laughing. Positively laughing!

"What would present company say ten pound?" demanded Joe.

"They'd say," returned my sister, curtly, "pretty well. Not too much, but pretty well."

"It's more than that, then," said Joe.

That fearful Impostor, Pumblechook, immediately nodded, and said, as he rubbed the arms of his chair, "It's more than that."

"Why, you don't mean to say—" began my sister.

"Yes, I do, mum," said Pumblechook; "but wait a bit. Go on, Joseph. Good in you! Go on!"

"What would present company say," proceeded Joe, "to twenty pound?"

"Handsome would be the word," returned my sister.

"Well, then," said Joe, "it's more than twenty pound."

That abject Hypocrite, Pumblechook, nodded again, and said, with a patronizing laugh, "it's more than that, mum. Good again! Follow her up, Joseph!"

"Then to make an end of it," said Joe, delightedly handling the bag by my sister; "it's five-and-twenty pound."

"It's five-and-twenty pound, mum," echoed that beast of wonders, Pumblechook, rising to shake hands with her; "and it's no more than your merits (as I said when my opinion was asked), and I wish you joy of the money!"

If the Villain had stopped here his ease would have been sufficiently awful, but he blackened his guilt by proceeding to take me into custody, with a right of patronage that left all his former criminality far behind.

"Now you see, Joseph and wife," said Pumblechook, as he took me by the arm above the elbow, "I am one of them that always go right through with what they've begun. This boy must be bound out of hand. That's my way. Bound out of hand."

"Goodness knows, Uncle Pumblechook," said my sister (grasping the money), "we're deeply beholden to you."

"Never mind me, mum," returned that diabolical corn-chandler. "A pleasure's a pleasure all the world over, and I'm free to say, you know; we must have him bound. I said I'd see to it—to tell you the truth."

The Justice-room sitting in the Town Hall near at hand, and we at once went over to have me bound apprentice to Joe in the Magistrates' presence. It was a large room, and was presided over by Pumblechook, exactly as if I had that moment picked a pocket or fired a rick; indeed it was the general impression in Court that I had been taken red-handed, for, as Pumblechook shoved me before him through the crowd, I heard some people say, "What's he done? Stole a pie, I'll be bound!" "No, he don't look bad, don't he?" One person of mild and benevolent aspect even gave me a tract onwards-and-upwards, which I put in my pocket, a young man in a perfect sausage-shop of fetters, and entitled, To be read in my Cell.

The Hall was a queer place, I thought, with higher pews in it than the pews—and with people hanging over the pews looking on—and with mighty Justices (one with a powdered head) leaning back in chairs, with folded arms, or taking snuff, or going to sleep, or writing, or reading the newspapers—and with some shining black portraits on the walls, which my companion regarded as a composition of hardtack and sticking-plaster. Here, in a corner, my indentures were duly signed and executed, and the seal of Mr. Pumblechook holding me all the while as if we had looked in on our way to the scaffold to have those little preliminaries disposed of.

The formalities were soon over, and had got rid of the boys who had been put into great spirits by the expectation of seeing me publicly tortured, and I was free. Pumblechook seemed to find that my friends were merely rallying round me, we went back to Pumblechook's. And there my sister became so excited by the money-fever in my business, that nothing would serve her but we must have a dinner out of that windfall, at the Blue Boar, and that Pumblechook must go over in his chaise-cart, and bring the Hubbles and Mr. Wopsle.

It was agreed to be done; and a most melancholy day I passed. Not only was I regarded to stand to reason, in the minds of the whole company, that I was an excrescence on the entertainment. And to make it worse, Joe all asked me separately, whenever in short, whenever they had nothing else to do—why I didn't enjoy myself. And what could I possibly do then but say I was enjoying myself—which I was not.

However, they were grown up and had their own way, and they made the most of it. That swindling Pumblechook got obstinately the best scent curriver of the whole occasion, actually took the top of the table; and, when he addressed them on the subject of my being bound, and fondlingly congratulated them on my being liable to imprisonment if I played at cards, drank strong liquors, kept late hours or bad company, or indulged in other vagaries that were the sowing of my indentures appeared to contemplate as next to inevitable, he placed me standing on a chair behind the table for their better inspection.

My only other remembrances of the present festival are, that they wouldn't let me go to sleep, but whenever they saw me drooping off, woke me up and told me to enjoy myself. That, rather late in the evening Mr. Wopsle gave us Collins's Ode, and threw his blood-stain'd sword in thunder down with such effect that the whole company came in and said, "The Commercials underneath sent up their compliments, and it wasn't the Tumbler's Arms." That, they were all in excellent spirits, on the road home, and sang O Lady Fair! Mr. Wopsle taking the bass, and asserting with a tremendously strong voice (in reply to the ingenious remarks of the company) that music in a most impertinent manner, by wanting, to know all about every body's private affairs, that he was the man with his live lodger flowing, and that he was upon the whole the weakest pilgrim going.

Finally, I remember that when I got into my little bedroom I was truly wretched, and had a strong conviction on me that I should never like Joe's trade. I had liked it once, but once was not now.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Thursday, December 27, in the Senate, a bill was reported to provide for a Territorial Government for Arizona. Senator Brown, of Mississippi, wished to have a motion added for the protection of slave property. Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, declared that the law in force when the Territory was annexed to the country was continued until it shall become a State. Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, made a long and powerful speech, in which he reviewed the whole question of Slavery. He was followed by Senators Davis of Mississippi, Green of Missouri, Mason of Virginia, and others, and, without taking a vote, the Senate adjourned until Monday.——In the House, Mr. Stevens, of Washington Territory, made personal explanation in reference to a dispatch which had appeared in a Boston and a New York paper. Mr. Morris, of Illinois, Chairman of the Special Committee appointed to investigate the Salaries, offered a resolution empowering the Committee to sit elsewhere than in Washington, should circumstances require it, and after some opposition it was passed. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation Bill, and soon after adjourned until Monday.

On Monday, 31st, in the Senate, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, presented the report of the Committee of Thirteen on the State of the Union, reported that the Committee had been unable to agree, and asked that the journal of their proceedings be printed. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution, which was objected to and laid over, requesting the Committee on War to inform the Senate relative to the condition of the arms in the national armories, etc. The Territorial Government Bill was then postponed, and Senator Benjamin proceeded to make his elaborate argument against the right of coercion, and in favor of the right of secession. He argued that the Constitution was a compact between sovereign States, and that the Federal Government was the agent of the whole country. Senator Baker, without concluding, yielded to a motion to adjourn; but before the adjournment took place, Senator Green, of Missouri, read and obtained leave to print an elaborate speech.

In the House, on the same day, Mr. Bingham reported back from the Judiciary Committee the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, with various amendments. The House, for want of a quorum, adjourned over until Monday.

On Tuesday, January 1, in the Senate, Mr. Bingham's bill, reported by him from the House Judiciary Committee on 31, provide, whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to execute the custom laws and collect the duties on imports in the ordinary way, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with such district to be established and kept in any secure place within some port or harbor of said district, or in any vessel that may be convenient; and in that case it should be the duty of the Collector to reside at such place, and there perform all vessels and cargoes arriving within the district until the duties imposed on the cargoes by law shall be paid in cash, any thing in the laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding; and in such cases it shall be unlawful to take the vessel or cargo from the custody of the proper officer of the customs, unless by a process from some Court of the United States; but the owner or consignee shall be made to take such vessel or cargo by any force or combination, or assemblage as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for any officer of the customs, it shall and may be lawful for the President, or such other person as he shall have empowered for the purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of preventing the removal of such vessel or cargo and protecting the officers of the customs in retaking such vessel or cargo.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

On 26th ult., in this body, citizens of the United States in South Carolina, assembled in the State of South Carolina. An ordinance was introduced by Mr. Rhett, providing for a withdrawal of the Southern States to be held at Montgomery, Alabama. On 27th, the Governor was authorized to receive any fortifications which the State was provided to advise him. On 29th, the collector of customs at Charleston informed the Convention that all the officers of the revenue had entered the service of the State. An ordinance was introduced permitting duties to be paid in gold or specie. On January 2d, an ordinance was passed which defines and prescribes the punishment for treason. It declares that treason against the Carolina war against the State, adhering to its enemies, and giving them aid and comfort within the State, are penalty is "death without the benefit of clergy." Another ordinance provides for the appointment of Commissioners to Texas, and another that all powers heretofore vested in Congress shall be vested in the Legislature and people of the State.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA CABINET.

Governor Pickens has appointed Hon. A. G. M'Grath Secretary of State of South Carolina, Hon. D. F. Jamison Secretary of War, Hon. Christopher G. Memminger Secretary of the Treasury, W. H. Harlee to republish the Postal Department of the United States, and C. Gardington Secretary of the Interior.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY TO THE SOUTH CAROLINA COMMISSIONERS.

A dispatch to the Herald, dated Washington, January 5, says:

"The President's reply to the Commissioners of South Carolina has just been communicated. The President has given a preliminary step in the initiation of negotiations, that the troops be withdrawn from the forts in Charleston Harbor.

"The President positively refuses to do this, and refers also to views in former public property as set forth in his Messages to Congress, and informs them that he has not only no power to withdraw the troops from the town, but to defend the property of the United States with all the power at his command.

"He does not recognize the Commissioners officially, but regards them as distinguished citizens of the United States from South Carolina.

"The orders to Major Anderson are given in full.

"From them it appears he could only have acted as he has done, and certainly, if he had any tangible evidence that South Carolina designed taking Fort Sumter.

"The policy pursued and the understanding had with the people of South Carolina as to the evacuation of Fort Moultrie are given, and the people of the United States will now understand how the compact was entered between the President and the authorities of South Carolina, and whether South Carolina will be sustained, even by the South, in taking possession of property which does not belong to her.

"The position taken by the President has produced the utmost consternation among the Commissioners and their friends."

THE FIRST HOSTILE MOVEMENTS.

On 31st the people of Charleston seized Fort Moultrie, Castle Pinckney, Governor's Island, the Citadel Arsenal at Charleston, and the revenue cutter in the bay.

The President issued a proclamation to the duties by force, and has sent to the Senate the name of Mr. M'Intyre, of York, Pennsylvania, as Collector, vice Colonel Pickens, who is sheep of war Brooklyn, which has recently returned with the expedition sent out to survey the proposed route for a railroad across the Isthmus at Chiriqui, together with another war-vessel at Norfolk, has been ordered to be kept in readiness to proceed to Charleston at a moment's warning, and a rumor is current that all the important Southern ports will be immediately reinforced.

HOW THE REVENUE CUTTER AT CHARLESTON WAS SEIZED.

First Lieutenant Underwood, second in command of the revenue-cutter Aiken, seized by the secessionists at Charleston, arrived at Washington on 31, and reported to the Secretary of the Treasury. Lieutenant Underwood states that Captain Coste, the commander of the cutter, was on shore on leave of absence. Some time before South Carolina decided to go out, and agreed, when the State declared herself out of the Union, to turn and hand the vessel over to him, Lieutenant Underwood; but instead of doing so he sailed from Charleston before Major Anderson took possession of it, and examined it for several hours, and finally placed the cutter in such a position as to have her at low-water high and dry on land. While she was thus situated the secessionists took possession of her, Captain Coste being still in command, and Lieutenant Underwood, as second in command, was of course powerless to act. Captain Coste then informed Lieutenant Underwood that his services would not be required there any longer, and he proceeded to Washington, where he arrived and reported the above facts to Secretary Thomas.

THE STATE SEIZED IN GEORGIA.

A dispatch from Charleston states that returns from Georgia indicate that the State has gone largely for secession.

Forts Pulaski and Jackson have positively been occupied by the Georgia State troops, under the Governor's instructions, and it is said that for this the fortresses would be turned over to the Confederate authorities.

Senator Toombs received a dispatch on 3d from Governor Brown, of Georgia, stating that he had ordered the Georgia troops to occupy Fort Pulaski, to prevent the Federal troops from taking it until the meeting of their Convention. Neither Fort Jackson nor the steamer had been taken, and the Governor gave no information that he intended to seize Fort Pulaski. Senator Toombs received a dispatch from Fort Pulaski for the reason that he had learned that the Administration had given orders to reinforce all the forts in the South. Other forts have undoubtedly been taken for the same reason. The Governor of Georgia denied the fact, as one such an order, but it was afterward revoked. The President has received a dispatch announcing the occupation of Fort Pulaski by the Georgia troops.

SEIZURE OF FORTS AT MOBILE.

A telegram from Mobile announces the seizure of the United States Arsenal at that place, in which were stored fifteen hundred barrels of powder, three hundred thousand percussion caps, fifteen hundred guns, and other stores of war, but only six stand of arms. It was also rumored that Fort Morgan had been occupied by troops.

MAJOR ANDERSON BESIEGED.

A dispatch, dated Washington, January 5, says: "Intelligence was received here last night that Major Anderson is besieged; that all Major Anderson's communications are cut off; that Fort Moultrie has been completely spiked, and the guns remounted, and every thing is in readiness to open a fire on Fort Sumter. All the batteries are being erected around him by the secessionists, and every day his danger and the difficulties of reinforcing him are increased. His friends have solicitations for reinforcements, and even the tears and prayers of his wife having failed to move the President, he has determined never again to renew his request, but will perish, if he must, in the fort. He is resolved to hold possession of it as long as he can, and perish with him.

"It is beyond a doubt that a combination is forming to take forcible possession of the government at Washington on or before the 4th of March, but the precise time is not yet determined.

"The above is from sources which leave no room for doubt as to reliability."

MAJOR ANDERSON'S REASON FOR MOVING.

The Wilmington (North Carolina) Herald says: "Major Anderson's reasons for leaving Fort Sumter, Governor Pickens sent Colonel Pettigrew and Major Capers down to him with a flag-of-truce. The Governor says his reply had been anticipated, but we learn that a gentleman who arrived here from Charleston on Saturday night, and who had been conversed the above-named gentlemen courteously, and stated to them that he should act upon his own responsibility, and for security; that he deprecated the necessity for it, and hoped no such step would be taken; that he was willing to take to turn his guns upon his countrymen; but unless commanded by the constituted authorities of the United States, he would never surrender the post while he lived; and that if an attack was made upon him he hoped the first shot fired would be aimed at pierce his heart. It is said he has one year's provisions in the fort, and over 900 men."

THE PERILOUS COMMITTEES.

The Senate Committee of Thirteen, as above-mentioned, reported a failure to agree upon a Compromise on Monday. The House Committee, on 28th, voted to report a bill to restore the Missouri Compromise. They passed resolutions in favor of sending a fleet for New York, as the troops of Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts. They have done nothing else of moment. A new Committee composed of members from the border States is in session.

RESIGNATION OF MR. FLOYD.

On 30th Secretary Floyd resigned his position as the head of War Department. He says that the movement of Major Anderson in evacuating Fort Moultrie and occupying Fort Sumter, was by no means according to the spirit of assurances which had been given by Secretary Floyd to the authorities of South Carolina, that no change should be made in the disposition of the Government forces in the harbor of Charleston. He says that the Hon. Jacob Thompson could arrive in Washington and leave a hearing. As soon as the action of Major Anderson became known, the Commissioners called upon Secretary Floyd for explanations. Mr. Floyd disavowed the act, but the Commissioners say that they were satisfied with any kind of disavowal of the troops from Fort Sumter. This, it appears, Secretary Floyd refused to do, although he had accordingly asked the permission of the President to issue the necessary orders. The Cabinet had a very long discussion on the subject; but, finally, the weight of the Cabinet was thrown in favor of the course pursued by Major Anderson, and Secretary Floyd felt himself called upon to resign.

WHY GOVERNOR FLOYD RESIGNED.

In his letter of explanation he says:

"I then considered the honor of the Administration pledged to maintain the troops in the position they occupied, for such had been the understanding given to the gentlemen of South Carolina who had a right to speak for her, and who, on the part of their band, gave reciprocal pledges that no force should be brought by them against the troops or against the property of the United States. The sole object of both parties in these reciprocal pledges was to prevent a collision and the effusion of blood, to the hope that some means might be found for a peaceful accommodation of the existing troubles, the two Houses of Congress having both raised Committees looking to that object. These offices stood until the action of Major Anderson, taken unfortunately while the Commissioners were on their way to Washington with a peaceful mission fraught by the sentiments of bloodshed, has completed matters in the existing manner. Our refusal or even delay to repair affairs has, in my mind, made our agreement inviolate a collision, and must inevitably inaugurate civil war. I can not consent to be the agent of such calamity. I deeply regret that I find myself under the necessity of tendering to you my resignation as Secretary of War, because I can no longer hold it under my convictions of patriotism nor with honor, subjected as I am to a violation of solemn pledges and plighted faith."

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The Governor's Message was delivered to the Legislature at Harrisburg on 3d inst.

He declares the doctrine of secession erroneous. The Constitution is something more than a mere compact. Organized resistance to the Federal Government is rebellion. If successful, it may be purged of the crime by revolution; if unsuccessful, the persons may be executed as traitors. But while denying the right of a State to absolve its citizens from allegiance to the Federal Government, nevertheless it is proper that we carefully and candidly examine the causes which have led, if they are well founded they should be unhesitatingly removed, and reparation made for the past and security for the future. For a government created by the people should never do injustice to any portion of them. The only complaints being included in the States alleged to have refused compliance with the Fugitive Slave Law, are substantially reduced to that the State has been almost invariably influenced by a high regard for the rights of her sister States. After examining the present State laws, he says there is nothing to prevent the revival of the act of 1826, leaving to the claimant the right to seek a remedy under the State or National laws. He recommends that the consent of the State be given to the matter, while relinquishing the passing through Pennsylvania, to retain the services of the slave. He suggests the propriety of the call of the Missouri Compromise, and that the line be extended to California by amendment of the Constitution; recommends that Legislature to instruct our representatives in Congress to support such an amendment, to be submitted to the State Convention for ratification, and if Congress fails to propose it, let it emanate from the people. He closes by declaring that Pennsylvania is devoted to the Union, and will follow the stripes and stripes through every peril. He adds: "But before assuming the responsibilities that may foreshadowed, it is the solemn duty of Pennsylvania to remove every just cause of complaint, that the cry can stand before high Heaven without fear and without reproach, and then she will be ready to stand or fall with any alliance to the best form of government ever devised by the wisdom of man. Though I am for the Union as long as the Union, my hope and affections still cling to it. My prayer is, my hope is, and that of millions of patriotic, when he shall have punished us for our sins, will again have mercy upon us, and bless us with a Union in stronger and more hallowed bonds of fraternity, so that the Union may remain unbroken through all future time."

MISSOURI FOR THE UNION.

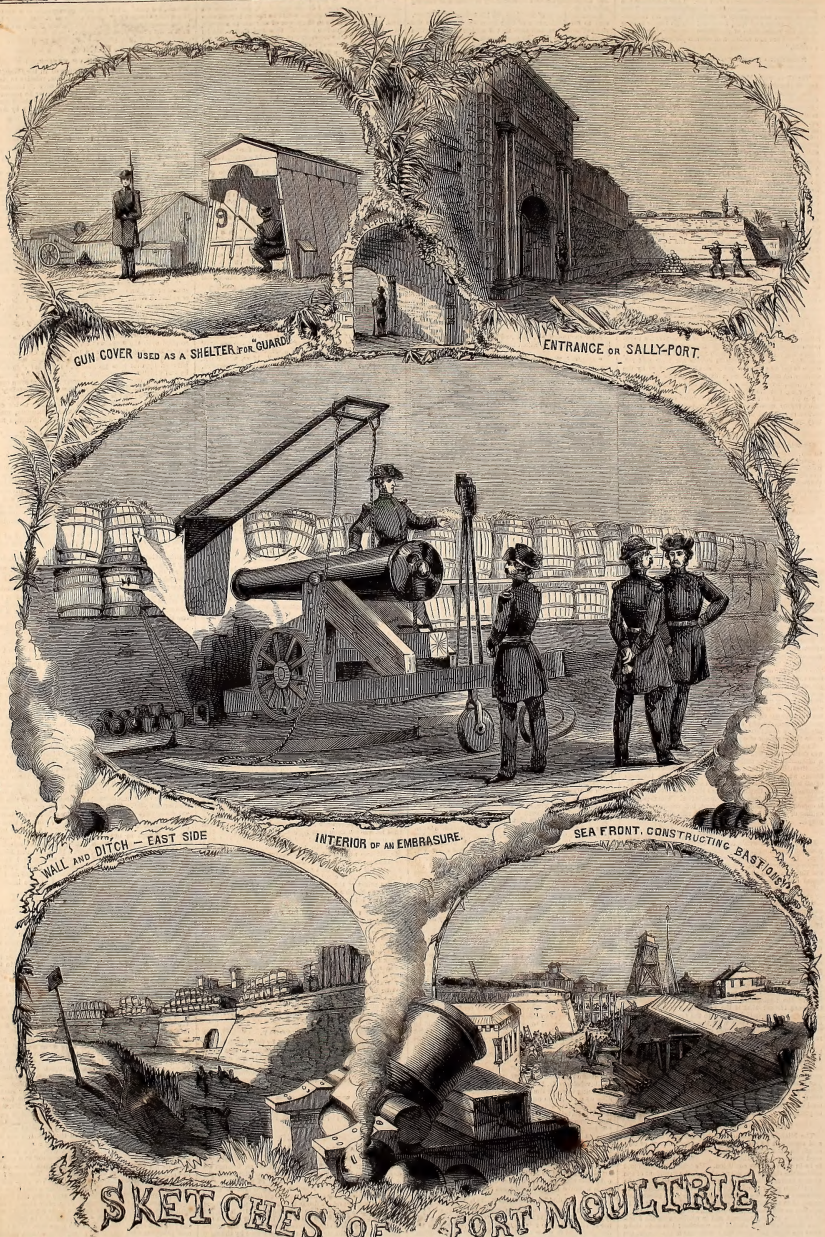
Governor Stewart's Message was read to the Legislature on 3d.

After reviewing the progress of the Abolition and Republican parties, and stating the result of their success, the Governor says that Missouri occupies a peculiar position owing to these troubles that should make her voice potent in the councils of the Union. Her institutions are Christian per se within her borders, she is still determined to demand and maintain her rights at every hazard.

Missouri loves the Union, and will never submit to wrong. She came into the Union upon a compromise, and is willing to abide by a fair compromise, and every subsequent contracts as are enacted by Congress to-day and repealed to-morrow, but a compromise cannot be made the just rights of the States, and agreed to in solemn convention of all the parties interested.

Missouri has a right to speak on this subject, because she has suffered deeply, having been robbed of as much in the past few years by abductions of slaves as all the rest of the Southern States put together.

Speaking of secession, the Governor deprecates the action of South Carolina, and says: "Her people have passed the point of no return, and will never submit to wrong. She does not stand alone. Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Florida will follow in her footsteps, and will be joined by all the Southern States, and even Virginia notes are not long delayed in the event of coercion. Missouri will not be long behind. Her people are not disposed to submit to wrong. She will not submit to the degradation of coercion. She will not submit to the degradation of coercion. She will not submit to the degradation of coercion



SKETCHES OF FORT MOULTRIE

BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.

ENTRY OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND INTO FORT SUMTER ON CHRISTMAS NIGHT, 1860.

THE REVOLUTION AT CHARLESTON.

We are enabled, through the kindness of an officer of Major Anderson's command, and others, to present our readers with a series of pictures of Fort Moultrie, which was evacuated by the United States troops on the night of Christmas; also of the occupation of Castle Pinckney by the Charlestonians; and of the entry of Major Anderson and his force into Fort Sumter. The relative bearing and general appearance of these various works have already been fully illustrated in the Weekly.

The pictures of Fort Moultrie explain themselves. At the time the sketches were taken it is not probable that the officers had any intention of evacuating the work; if their chief had formed the resolution, he kept it to himself. It will be seen that, notwithstanding the weakness of the place, our gallant troops had prepared for a desperate struggle.

The evacuation took place, as was said, on the night of 25–26th December. Major Anderson had dined with the Charleston authorities, and returned to Fort Moultrie about 9 A.M. One story says that the Major deceived his friends by pretending sleep, and that accordingly the watch kept on his movements by the Nina was that night relaxed. At any rate, to use the language of a Charleston contemporary, "the evacuation commenced on Tuesday evening. The men were ordered to hold themselves in readiness, with knapsacks packed, at a moment's notice; but up to the moment of their leaving had no idea of abandoning the post. They were reviewed on parade, and were then ordered to two schooners, lying in the vicinity, where they embarked, taking with them all the necessaries, stores, etc., requisite in their evacuation. Several trips were made during the night, and a great part of the provisions and camp furniture were transported under cover of night. The brightness of the moon, however, afforded but slight concealment to their movements; and in one of the trips, Lieutenant Davis in command, a schooner full of soldiers and baggage passed directly under the bow of the guard-boat Nina. The officer who made the statement expressed himself to be ignorant whether the watch on board the Nina discovered the movement or not—at all events, he said they did not signify any cognizance of the fact."

Next day the Charlestonians were greatly excited at the news. They had calculated, it seems, on taking Fort Sumter without resistance; and as it commands Fort Moultrie, they would have reduced that work, and taken Major Anderson and his command prisoners whenever they chose. The Major was a little too smart for them, however. With the small force he has he can hold Fort Sumter against a very large body of assailants, and in the event of an attack, can shell Charleston with his heavy guns. However, to console themselves, the people of Charleston resolved to occupy Castle Pinckney, a fort of minor importance. The Charleston Mercury gives the following account of the movements:

"The Rifle battalion, under command of Colonel J. J. Pettigrew, assembled promptly upon the Citadel green. They were substantially equipped in winter uniform, with blankets, knapsacks, and revolvers. The battalion numbered some 190 men, and consisted of detachments from the Meagher Guards, the Carolina light infantry, and the Washington light infantry. Shortly after four o'clock the word was given, and the companies advanced in double quick time, without music, toward the Cooper River. None of them, we believe, excepting the officers, were aware of their destination. They embarked on the steamer Nina, which immediately headed for Castle Pinckney, and the surmise soon became confirmed that the destination of the command was to take possession of that fortress. On nearing the fort, a number of men were observed on the wharf, one of whom, in advance of the others, was observed holding what appeared to be a paper in his hand. This was said to have been the civil war. As soon as the front touched the wharf, the storming party who had been detailed for that duty sprang ashore, and rushed round to the rear of the fortress, where the gate is situated. This was found closed, and a cry for storming ladders was soon answered by a mechanic hurrying forward with one or more of them. These were instantly planted, and under cover of the rifles of the battalion, the walls were escaladed and the gates thrown open.

"On entering the fort it was found to be tenanted only by an officer of engineers and a number of laborers—none of whom made any resistance. The engineer officer was informed that he was at liberty to leave, and remove his personal effects, and in a few minutes he set out in a boat belonging to the fort, accompanied by four other men. From the direction in which he steered, it is supposed that he went to Fort Moultrie.

"The flag of the Nina, consisting of a white star on a red ground, was then hoisted amid loud cheers; and when our reporter left a strong guard had been mounted, and preparations for garrisoning the fortress were well advanced."

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER,

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.

WHAT a pleasant little dinner we had that day! It was laid out in a little summer-house of the inn garden. All overgrown with a fine old fig-tree, through whose leaves the summer wind played deliciously, while a tiny rivulet rippled close by, and served to cool our "Achen thoier"—an amount of luxury that made Unthenfeck quite wild with laughter.

"Is it cold enough?" she asked, archly, in her peasant-dialect, each time the old man laid down his glass.

As I came gradually to pick up the occasional meaning of her words—a process which her expressive pantomime greatly aided—I was struck by the marvelous acuteness of a mind so totally without culture, and I could not help asking Vaterchen why he had never attempted to instruct her.

"What can I do?" said he, despondently; "there are no books in the only language she knows, and the only language I could condescend to speak. She can understand Italian, and I have read stories for her, and sonnets too, out of Leopardi, but though she will listen in all eagerness till they are finished, no sooner over than she breaks out into some wild Calabrian song, and asks me is it not sweet; all the fine things I have been giving her, thrice told."

"Could you not teach her to write?"

"I tried that. I bought a slate, and I made a bargain with her, that she should have a scarlet knot for her hair when she could ask me for it in written words. Well, all seemed to go on prosperously for a time; at last she got through half the alphabet very successfully, till we came to the letter H. This made her laugh immediately, it was so like a scaffold set up in the circus for certain exercises; and no sooner had I marked down the letter than she snatched the pencil from me and drew the figure of a man on each side of the letter. There, in a hour forth, as though her wayward humor had been only imprisoned, she burst forth into every imaginable absurdity at our lessons. Every ridiculous event of our daily life she drew, and with a rapidity almost incredible. I was not very apt, as you may imagine, in acquiring the new accomplishments they thought to give me, and she caricatured me under all my difficulties."

"Si, si," broke she in at this; for with a wonderful acuteness she could trace something of a speaker's meaning where every word was unknown to her. As she spoke she arose and led down the garden at top speed.

"Why has she gone? Is she displeased at your telling me all these things about her?" asked I.

"Scarcely that; she loves to be noticed. Nothing really seems to pain her . . much as when she is passed over unremarked. When such an event would occur in the circus, I have seen her sob through her sleep all the night after. I half suspect now that she is piqued at the little notice you have bestowed upon her. All the better if it be so."

"But here she comes again."

With the suggestion she now came back to us, holding her slate over her head, and showing that she rightly interpreted what the old man had said of her.

"Now for my turn!" said Vaterchen, with a smile. "She is never weary of drawing me in every absurd and impossible posture."

"What is it to be, Tintenfleck?" asked he.

"How am I to figure this time?"

She shook her head without replying, and, making a sign that she was not to be questioned or interrupted, she nestled down at the foot of the fig-tree, and began to draw.

The old man now drew near me, and proceeded to give me further details of her strange temper and ways. I could mark that throughout all he said a tone of intense anxiety and love prevailed, and that he felt her disposition was exactly that which exposed her to the greatest perils for her future welfare. Her artist instinct who need to follow her through all the South Tyrol, affecting to be madly in love with her, but of whose sincerity and honor Vaterchen professed his grave misgivings. He gave her lessons in drawing, and, what was less to be liked, he made several studies of herself. "Two witless ways," said the old man, "she would come and repeat to me all his raptures about her, was at first a sort of comfort to me. I felt reassured by her confidence, and also by the little impression his praises seemed to make, but I saw later on that I was mistaken. She grew each day more cognizant of his admiration, and it was not power laughingly, but in earnest seriousness she would tell me that she 'Fornarina' in some gallery had not such colors in her cheek that some Roman beauty in that all the world admired was far inferior to her in shape. If I had dared to rebuke her vanity, or to ridicule her pretensions, all my influence would have been gone forever. She would have left us, gone who knows whither, and been lost, so that I had nothing for it but to seem to credit all she said, and yet hold the matter lightly, and I said beauty has no value except when associated with rank and station. If queens are often fitted to adorn high estate, but for humble folk it is as great a mockery as these tinsel gems we wear in the circus.

"'Max says not,' said she to me one evening, after one of my usual lectures. 'Max says there are queens whose beauty seemed to have my hair, ay, or even one of the dimples in my cheek.'

"'Max is a villain,' said I, before I could control my words.

"'Max is a very signor!' said she, haughtily, 'and not like one of us; and more, too, if I will and tell him what you have said of Max.' She bounded away from me at this, and I saw her no more till nightfall.

"'What has happened to you, poor child?' said I, as I saw her lying on the floor of her room, her forehead bleeding, and her dress all draggled and torn. She would not speak to me for a long while, but by much entreating and caressing I won upon her to tell me what had befallen her. She had gone to the top of Unkenhaupt, and thrown herself down. It was a fearful height, and only was she saved by being caught by the brambles and tangled foliage of the cliff; and this for some idle word of her master, she said. But I knew better; the struggle was deeper in her heart than she was aware of, and Max had gone suddenly away, and we saw no more of him."

"Vagabonds!" Yes," thought I, "there was once on a time such a vagabond, and he strolled along from village to village making of his flute a livelihood; a poor performer, too, he tells us he was, but yet he could touch the hearts of these simple villagers with his tones as he could move the hearts of thousands more learned than they with his marvelous skill, and this vagabond was called Oliver Goldsmith." I have no words to say the ecstasy this thought gave me. Many a proud traveler doubtless saw in the poor wayfarer only a strolling beggar and footsore, and who was, nevertheless, journeying onward to a great immortality; to be a name remembered as a blessing and treasured as a boon. The haughty man that scorned him was forgotten forever. "And so now," thought I, "some splendid Russian or some Austrian will crash by Goldsmith's home without a thought that the gentle and breezy minded poet, that I told her of my love. We were walking along, our arms around each other, as might two happy, guileless children be, when my young ambition is called the world, but I had a boundless confidence in myself; my theory was, "If I be strengthened by the deep devotion of one loving heart, I have no fears of failure." Beautiful words, and worthy of all memory! And then he goes on: 'I drew her gently over to a grassy bench on the roadside, and taking my purse from my pocket, poured out before her its humble contents, in all something less than twenty sestents, in all something less than twenty sestents, but by her eyes a very Pactolus of wealth.'"

"What if I were to try this experiment?" thought I; "what if I were, so to say, to anticipate my own biography?" The notion pleased me much. There was something novel in it, too. It was making the experiment in the "compare vile" of accident, to see what might come of it.

"Come here, Catinka," said I, pointing to a moss-covered rock at the roadside, with a little seek companionship with the sluggish. If his tendency bear to over-imagination, let him frequent the society of realists. Why, therefore, should not I and Tintenfleck be mutually beneficial? Take the two different kinds of wood in a bow: one will supply resistance, the other flexibility. It was a pleasant notion, and I resolved to test it.

"Vaterchen," said I, "call me to-morrow, when you get ready for the road. I will keep you company as far as Innsbruck."

"Ah, Sir," said he, with a sigh, "you will be well weary of us before half the journey is over; but you shall be welcome."

CHAPTER XXXII.

NEXT morning, just as day was breaking, we set out on foot on our road to Constance. There was a pinkish gray streak of light on the horizon, sure sign of a fine day, and the bright stars twinkled still in the clear half-sombre sky, and all was calm and serene—nothing to be heard but the tramp of our own feet on the hard causeway.

With the cowardly caution of one who feels the water with his foot before he springs in to swim, I was glad that I made my first experiences of companionship on these humble terms. Should evil ensue, I was yet dark and none could see us. The old leaven of snobbery was unsubdued in my heart, and as I turned to look at poor old Vaterchen, and then at the tinsel finery of Catinka, I bethought me of the little consideration the world extends to such as these and their belongings. "Vaterchen," I should say some rich banker, as he rolled by in his massive travelling-carriage, creaking with imperials and dingling with "Lagabonda all'!' would not utter the Jew peddler as he looked down from the banquette of the diligence. How slight is the sympathy of the realist for the poor creatures whose life-labor is to please! How prone to regard him as useless, or, even worse, forgetting the while how a wiser than he has made many things in this world of ours for the very use they should merely minister to enjoyment, gladden the eye and ear, and make our pilgrimage less weary! Where would be the crimson joy? where the scarlet bustard? where the gorgeous peacock, with the nosegay on his tail? where the rose, and honeysuckle, and the purple convolvulus, mingling with the wild thorns in our hedgerows, if the universe were of their creation, and this great globe but one big workshop? You never insist that the navy and the daffodil should be pot-herbs; and why are there not to be wild flowers in humanity as in the fields? It is but a proud pride to say that you are not bell-glass, nurtured and cared for, and with your name attached to a cleft-stick at your side—is it not a great pride to say that you are not a pot-herb nor poor dog-roses? Be satisfied, then, with that glory; we only ask to live! Shame on me for that "only!" As if there could be any thing more delightful than life. Life, with all its capacities for love, and friendship, and heroism, and self-devotion, for generous actions and noble aspirations! Life to feel life; to know that we are in a sphere specially constructed for the exercise of our senses and the play of our affections; free to choose the road we would take, and with a glorious reward if our choice be the right one!

"Si, si," broke she in at this; for with a wonderful acuteness she could trace something of a speaker's meaning where every word was unknown to her. As she spoke she arose and led down the garden at top speed.

"Why has she gone? Is she displeased at your telling me all these things about her?" asked I.

"Scarcely that; she loves to be noticed. Nothing really seems to pain her . . much as when she is passed over unremarked. When such an event would occur in the circus, I have seen her sob through her sleep all the night after. I half suspect now that she is piqued at the little notice you have bestowed upon her. All the better if it be so."

"But here she comes again."

With the suggestion she now came back to us, holding her slate over her head, and show-well at its base—"come here, and let me have a drink of this nice clear water."

She assented with a smile and a nod, detaching at the same time a little cup from the flask which she wore at her side, in vinaigrière fashion. "And we'll fill my flask, too," said she, showing that it was empty, with a sort of childish glee. She now knelt beside the stream, and washed the cup. What is it, I wonder, that gives the charm to running water, and imparts a sort of glad feeling to its contemplation? Is it that its ceaseless flow suggests that "forever" which comprises so powerful an all shortlived pleasures? I can not tell, but I was still musing over the difficulty, when, having twice offered me the cup without my noticing it, she at last raised it to my lips. And I drank—oh, what a draught it was! so clear, so cold, so pure; and all the time my eyes were resting on hers, looking, as it were, into another well, the deepest and most unfathomable of all.

"Sit down here beside me on this stone, Catinka, and help me to count these pieces of money; they have got so mangled together that scarcely know what is left me." She seemed delighted with the project, and sat down at once, and I, throwing myself at her feet, poured the contents of my purse into her lap.

"Ducats ma!" was all she could utter, as she beheld the gold. Aladdin in the cave never felt a more overwhelming rapture than did she at sight of those immense piles of neath: in his whole face and bearing an expression of temper amounting to ferocity.

He spoke to me peremptorily and haughtily; asked me my name, age, family condition, previous history, as if he had been examining me on oath, scarcely waiting for my answers, and all the while fixing me with those small angry eyes till I felt dazed and restless, as creatures under torture. Then he said, abruptly:

"You have a strange look—a scared look, I may call it. How have you come by it?"

"I am of a nervous temperament, Sir," I answered, pulling at the ends of my gloves.

"Nothing else? Nothing hereditary?"

"Yes, Sir," said I, as steadily as I could, "there is hereditary insolvency among us."

"Father or mother?"

"Mother."

"Ah!" he said the man, rubbing his mustache, and looking at me with eyes all aflame; "so much the nearer and more dangerous."

"I am not dangerous, Sir," said a little too humbly, perhaps; but that man was completely subduing me. "I am nervous, but I have no worse tendency."

He laughed.

"Perhaps not," he said, with a sneer that made my blood curdle; "no one ever has. Don't you know that all maniacs are philosophers, when they are not kings and queens? Shall I take you on trust, then, according to your own estimate of yourself, or discharge you at once, according to mine?"

"I think I may be trusted, Sir," I answered, looking every where but into his face.

"What do you think, Mrs. Brand?" he said, turning to the pale woman unraveling her strip of muslin, at which she had not, as I thought, looked at me once yet.

"She is ugly," said she, in a dull, monotonous voice; "all the ugly people."

Mr. Brand laughed again.

"Never mind that, Mrs. Brand; goodness don't go by looks, does it, Miss—Miss what? Are you a nun or a nurse?"

"Miss Erfurt."

"Oh, yes! I forgot—Jane Erfurt—I remember now; and a queer name it is, too. Does it, Miss Jane Erfurt?"

"Not always, Sir," I said, moving restlessly.

"Well, Mrs. Brand, what do you say?"

"She is ugly, and George will not like her," said the lady, in the same half-alive manner.

"Why the deuce cares?" shouted Mr. Brand, flaming with passion on the instant. "Let him like it or not, who cares for a stupid fool, or for what he thinks? That for his liking!" snapping his fingers insolently.

The lady's face grew a shade paler; but beyond a furtive, terrified glance at her husband she took no notice of his words. He then turned abruptly to me, and told me that I was to hold myself engaged to perform the duties of companion to Mrs. Brand, and that I was to enter on those duties early next week.

"But without the lady's consent?" said I, too weak to resist, and too nervous to accept.

She put away her muslin and rose. "Mr. Brand is master here," she said; "do what he tells you: it saves trouble."

The week after I went to Penhouse as the companion of Mrs. Brand.

The first day's dinner was a strange affair. After we had seated ourselves to what was a very scanty supply, there lounged in a youth of about seventeen: a heavy, full-blooded, lumpish being, with a face devoid of intelligence, but more animal than imbecile: not specially good-natured, but not vicious—a mere idle, eating and drinking clown, scarcely raised above the level of a dog or a horse, and without even their instinctive emotions. What an unwholesome, unnatural circle we made! I longed for a little healthy life among us, not intense, but in a feeling of envy and relief to the commonplace servant-maid, who, if not intellectual, was at the least more in accord with pure or lively than we.

There was ill-blood between Mr. Brand and Master George, as the boy was called; and I soon understood why. His mother's only son by a former marriage, and heir of the entailed lands by long round Penhouse, he stood in the way of his step-father, whose influence over his wife was supreme, but not for the boy's good. He had also absolute possession of every thing. He had married for money, and had been balked of half his prize. I used often to wonder that the woman was not afraid to trust themselves in the hands of one so passionate and unscrupulous; but though Mrs. Brand was undisputed head of her husband, and the boy was no too stupid to understand that he was hated, and why, neither seem d to look forward to evil days. I did not think that they had mind enough to look to the future in long or dread. Mother and son loved each other, with the mute instinctive love of dumb animals—a love in which both would be helpless to save if calamities came. They were not much together, and they seldom spoke when they met; but they sat close to each other, played at the same game and on the same chairs, and Mrs. Brand unraveled her eternal slips of muslin, while her son gathered up the threads and thrust them into a canvas bag.

I had been there a fortnight, and I never saw either of them employed in any thing else; and I never heard half a dozen words pass between them. It was a silent house at all times; more silent than this, it was a house full of hate. Save this dumb animal kind of love between the two, not a ray of even kindly feeling existed among any of us. The servant was the mark for every one's ill-temper, while I stood out as a kind of pariah among them all, not even dignified by active dislike. I was shunned, and could not understand why I was there at all. The lady never spoke to me—not even to say good-morning; she gave me no duties, but she forbade me no employment. I was free to do what I liked, provided I did not make my existence too manifest to her, and did not speak to her husband or Master George. If by chance any thing like a conversation began—for Mr. Brand had his talkative moods in a violent, angry kind of way—she used to order me out of the room in just the same tone as she used to speak to the dog. If I remonstrated, as I did once, her only answer was, "You can go if you like; I did not hire you."

One thing especially troubled me. It troubled me because, like all morbidly imaginative people any thing of a mystery terrified me more than an open danger; and this, of which I am going to speak, was a mystery. The boy took no notice of me at the first. He never spoke to me when he came into the room; he passed me in the fields as if he did not see me; indeed, he had always that manner to me—he did not see me—I did not exist for him. I was well content that this should be; but after I had been three a short time Mr. Brand began to make distinct mischief between us. From brutish indifference Master George passed rapidly into dislike, aggression. When he met me in the lanes and fields he made mouths at me, and once he flung stones and mud as I passed him; at table he would kick me silently, and whenever I caught his eye he made hideous grimaces, muttering in his broad, provincial accent, "Mad dog! mad dog! We hang mad dogs here-away!" His insolence and brutality increased daily, and Mr. Brand encouraged him. This was the mystery. Why should he wish this lad to hate me?

There was a plot underneath it all which I tormented myself to discover. Day and night the thought haunted me, till I felt growing crazed with dread and terror. I could not conceal my abhorrence of the youth—I was too nervous for this—nor hide the fear with which that wicked man inspired me. I was as helpless as the most pale woman there, and as thoroughly the victim of a stronger fate.

One night Master George had been more than usually intolerable to me. He had struck me openly before both father and mother, had insulted my life more up before me with the force and vividness of living scenes actually present to my senses. I paced my room for some time in a state of despair, wringing my hands and sobbing violently, but without tears. By degrees a little calmness came to me, and I determined to go down stairs for a book. I would get some quiet, calm, religious book, which would soothe me like a spiritual opiate, and take me out of the abyss of misery into which I had sunk. What friend, indeed, had I in the world save the Great Father above us all?

As I opened the door I fancied I heard a stealthy step along the passage. I held my breath to listen, shading the candle with my hand. I was not deceived; there was a step passing furtively over the creaking boards in the direction of Master George's room. I shrank back into the door-way. Not there was nothing to alarm me. A quiet footfall at midnight might be easily accounted for; why should it affect me with mistrust and dread? Why should I feel this overpowering impulse to go toward the sound? I scarcely knew what I expected to find; but something stronger than myself seemed to impel me to the discovery of something horrible; and placing the candle on the floor, I crept noiselessly along the passage, every nerve strung to its utmost tension.

Master George slept in a room at the end of the back-stairs gallery, which ran at right angles to the passage in which my room was situated. My door faced Mr. and Mrs. Brand's; Master George's faced the kitchen stairs, and was properly the servant's room; but she had been moved to a small closet next to me, Mr. Brand not approving of her holding so large a chamber for herself, neither willing to allow the boy any thing of a better class. When I stood by my door I could see Mr. and Mrs. Brand's room; but it was only by going the whole length of the back-stairs gallery that I could get to Master George's. I could see now, however, that his door was open, for a ray of light fell along the staircase wall, and I could hear his heavy snoring breath. And I heard another sound. I heard a man's step in the room; I heard the boards creak and the bed-clothes softly rustle; I heard an impatient kind of moan as of some one disturbed in his sleep, and then a heavy blow, a stifled groan, a man's deep-drawn breath, and the quick, sharp drip of something spilled upon the floor. Dumb from terror, I stood in the door-way of the boy's room. Pale, heavy, motionless on the bed lay the youth, his large limbs carelessly flung abroad in the unconsciousness of sleep, and his face as calm and quiet as if still dreaming. The sheets were wet with blood—red—the light of the candle glittering upon a small red stream that flowed over the side of the bed, on the floor beneath. At a little distance stood Mr. Brand, wiping a knife on a handkerchief. He turned, and our eyes met. He came up to me with an oath, caught me by the throat, and drew the knife across my hands. I remember no more until I awoke in the broad daylight and found myself in the midst of a crowd gathered round my bed.

Curious eyes stared at me; harsh voices mocked me; rough hands were laid upon me; and I heard myself branded with the burning name of Murderess. Red tracks made by a woman's naked feet—made by my feet—led from the boy's room to mine; each track plainly printed on the bare uncarpeted floor—tracks of a woman's feet, and of none other. There was no explaining away these marks as the signs of guilt. Who would believe an, a half-mad lonely stranger with such a family history as mine, and, according to popular belief, at any moment liable to murderous attack against any one offending? Had not this unhappy youth notoriously offended, and had I not, only that very evening, openly defied and threatened him? Escape was impossible. To all the evidence heaped up against me with such art and cunning I had but an unsupported assertion, which would be set down as maniacal raving, and only deepen the case against me.

All day I lay there; all that weary sobbing winter's day; and when the night came they fastened me with cords and left me once more alone. I was so well secured—bound hand and foot, and triply bound—that it was not thought needful to watch me, and they were all too much excited and overwrought to wish to remain through the night with a lunatic murderer, as I was called. So they went, and Mr. Brand locked the door, saying, as he turned away, "We must have no more such dangerous fits of madness, Miss Erfurt!" with a sneer on the word.

I was too hopeless and desolate to think of any plan of escape, too broken or not. The reaction had set in, and I was content to lie there in quiet, and to feel that I had done with life forever. It had not offered me so many joys that I should grieve to leave it, and for what else—what—moves for shame in the grave? No; I was content to have done with all that had weighed upon me so long and heavily. I had no one to mourn for me, no one to love me, with a broken heart and a sorrowed faith: I was alone—alone—and might well die out of once, and sleep tranquilly in my murdered grave. And I was not unhappy, thinking all these things. Perhaps my brain was slightly paralyzed, so that I could not suffer. However it might be, it was a merciful moment of calm.

It was nearly three o'clock when I heard a light hand upon the door. The key was turned softly in the lock, and, pale and terrified, like an avenging ghost, the poor bereaved mother glided into my room. She came up to my bed and silently unfastened the cords. She said no consoling word, she gave me no kind look, no pitying human touch, but in a strange, weak, wan way, she unbound me limb by limb until I was free.

"Go," she then said, below her breath, still not looking at me. "I do not love you, and he did not; but I know that you are innocent, and I do not want your blood on my head. My turn is to come next; but I do not mind, now he has gone. Go at once, that sleep will not last long. I made it come for you."

Without another word she turned from the room, leaving the door open. I got up as she bade me. Without a moment's hope, I mostly dressed myself, and left the house, going forth into the darkness and desolation, more because I had been bidden to do so than to escape a greater peril. I wandered through the fy-rends aimlessly, nervelessly; not shaping my course for any goal, but simply going forward to whatever chance might lead me. A poor woman gave me some milk, and I slept, I believe, once beneath a haystack. I remember lying down there, and finding myself again after many hours. In time—I am not tell you how or when, nor how long I had been out in the fields, but it was evening, and the lamps were lighted—I was in London, reading a description of myself posted up against the walls. I saw myself described as a murderess and a maniac, and a reward offered for my apprehension; my dress, my manners, appearance, gait, voice, all were so minutely noted as to render safety impossible. Seized with terror I fled: I fled like a wild deer hunted and pursued, and I have never rested since.

OUR ANGEL.

MR. SEWARD'S ARABIAN HORSES.

We publish on page 28 five portraits of the two Arabian horses presented to Mr. Seward by Ayoub Bey Tradirky, assistant of the Colonial Court of the Ayalet of Sayda. They are drawn by Mr. T. C. Carpendale, who describes them as follows:

Mianlike is of bay hair color, with black legs and feet, fifteen hands high, and seven years old. His extraordinary power of endurance can not be doubted when we look at the immense size of his chest, and shoulder with which he is furnished. The head is somewhat large, the back perfectly straight; while the neck and wither are so strong as that of the bull. In the whole, he is a remarkable fine beauty. His best point is the immense length from the hip to the tail, which is greater than we have ever seen in a horse of his size; and to this very important point we beg to call the attention of the horseman. For a better idea of his angular formation we would refer to the drawing from life, which is pronounced an excellent likeness.

Sikluy Gidran is a sorrel colt, with face and feet white, blaze white legs, and two years and ten months old. He is a noble specimen of the Arabian horse. Beautiful as a statue, fiery as the sun that tints his native sands, he awakens in the mind of the beholder a sense of admiration and wonder; while a glance at his graceful head and neck is sufficient to confirm all that we have heard or read of the superior beauty of the Arabian horse. If speed be the consequence of symmetry of form and stoutness of limb, we predict for this powerful colt a glorious career on the turf.

We have been permitted to see the official pedigree of these horses, drawn up at Beyrout, and duly certified at the Arabian consulate. Both are said to be of the race called Mianlike Hedgee, one of the most highly esteemed races of Arabian horses.

MY ANGEL'S VISIT.

IF seemed as if our prayers were wasted.

During the six years we had been married every thing else went well with us. Our business, in which my husband was a partner, had prospered so much that two years since he sold his own connection with it for a large sum. This money so obtained, added to what he had previously saved —(he was elderly when I, not an heiress, married him)—formed a very sufficient provision for people of a middling station, who meant to live quietly, and yet have it in our power to be hospitable to friends, and, at the same time, live respected by the poor people near, who might look to us for help when no one else could give it. Since he left the business, too, a certain sleeping interest he retained in it became of increased value, so that, though retired from active work, the fruits of work still ripened on the old tree. Alas, that our tree of life was the one which hung fruitless. That our paradise could attract no little angel from heaven to sport in it.

We had bought Elmbury Hall, and were now resident there. It was not much of a hall indeed, but the park was full of fine old elms, and it had a good garden.

It was a silly notion of mine, which I could not help nursing, that the habit of looking on a vacant home would, in time, make George think it vacant. Oh how I wearied him with these promises, protesting that I would lead to gentle ways my son's earliest feet. As if I would talk over the Life-Giver with fine speeches.

At last love was pitiful.

Oh merciful pity bright after clouds—came Mary, our dawn. She came with the flowers of May—when birds are blithest. But no wild wood-note rang clearer than Mary's cry; no flower-bud revealed dearer charms than the infant blossom that unfolded on my breast. All inflated with the gladness the world rose heavenward, as far as the straining cords that bound it apart would allow. What more could we wish? Our hearts' desire had been given to us. The little child-helplessness, that now and then cast shadows, were but passing clouds. The next breeze of health blew them aside, and the atmosphere was again clear.

We were playing in the garden with Mary on her birthday. She was then a year old. We had a small difference as to whether Mary's husband was to be a great merchant or a man of high rank. Being slightly annoyed because George persisted that the station of a rich merchant's wife was not so much amiss, I walked aside to cool my heat, as I desired to show my husband how much he had offended me.

Just then a shower of feathers fell around us. Immediately a broken-winged pigeon, which a hawk or some other bird had struck, fluttered with loud screams to my feet, and nestled under my dress.

After washing it clean I laid it in the kitchen on some folded flannel. I remarked to George what a graceful providence it was that we had quarreled, because else we might not have noticed this poor creature which had, no doubt, been sent for us to nurse. George, too, thought the quarrel providential, as it saved me from saying a good deal of nonsense, in addition to what I did say, or perhaps it was our dinner providentially sent to us all but cooked.

I thought this cruel, and said so. George defended his proposal, and asked if it was not better to kill a half-dead pigeon than one in full life. When I could not answer for indignation he gave me Mary's wrapper to throw over the "other dove," and recommended feeding it with some of the child's food which the nurse was preparing. To my astonishment it ate well enough.

Next morning we found the poor bird dead. I was shedding some natural tears over it when George observed, as a consolation, that there was another dove on which I could expend ministrations. Perhaps good fortune would favor it also with some kind of broken wing that would keep my hand in. I saw that George was still cross, after yesterday's quarrel, so I said nothing.

I know not how it was, but dating from this incident, a vague uneasiness took possession of me. I, at first, fancied it symptomatic of some illness establishing itself in me; but as no disease broke out, I was fain to laugh myself, as best I could, out of my alarm. Insensibly the fear that was on me somewhat itself with the wonder I had felt when noticing how slow Mary was to repeat words. Always the lightest movement that caught her eye drew it away, and I pounded myself that she was all too young. Day by day, however, the first faint darkness deepened, till the winter tempest came, and the terrible conviction broke on me that Mary was dead. I saw, too, that other people had divined the secret, though no one spoke of it.

My husband was not a musician, but was fond like nearly every body, of hearing good music. I felt an inexpressible pang, as he expatiated, according to his habit, on how he would have Mary's musical skill cultivated. It was some months after I made the discovery I have mentioned before the child's father knew the real state of matters; so that, many a time, with his words cutting me, have I listened smiling for my doom.

He spoke of this so continually that I dreaded more and more the hour when he must know the truth, and though I longed for Mary to tell him, I saw no chance of being able to do it otherwise than abruptly. It was not altogether in jest that he proposed a residence in Italy—for the influences that foster music might affect Mary at her most impressible period of life; and where, as he averred, the capacity to train this kind of aptitude exists in the highest degree.

Mary was a year and a half old, with her father still unaware that for her music must ever be a frozen fountain. The children of the village school had come up to the hall to sing the Christmas hymn. They were well trained in most of their schooling, but unusually so in music, in which Miss Smithers, their teacher, was a proficient. She has since, under another name, obtained celebrity in the music world.

Before they commenced the hymn George made them a small oration. He had not so forgotten his town-councilor habits but that an opportunity like this, to air his rhetoric, came like a true Christmas friend.

George's oratory was decidedly of the fervid cast. He told the school-children that music was the great gift which we held in common with higher intelligences. In fact, deafness to music was a mark upon any one which meant "let not that man be trusted." A taste for music was the sure concomitant of virtue, there could be no doubt of it: and an ear against which sweet sounds beat in vain was a rock that rose from a wicked heart. Let them ever remember that.

The young musicians sang with a will, to show themselves virtuous, and obtain the extra cake and half-pence which form virtue's reward. As the impressive sounds of many well-drilled young voices swelled on our ears, I saw George, with moist eyes (he was partly affected by the singing, and partly by his own eloquence), turning to little Mary, who sat playing at his feet with some toys Miss Smithers had just given her. He lifted the child up, and tried to divert her toward the singing; but after looking vacantly at the group, she struggled to be set down again to her playthings. A sudden restlessness affected her father, and he continued watching her during the remainder of the hymn. When the children sat down he gave her again took up Mary on his knees, and without remarking to me that he meant any thing beyond play, he made sudden noises to her—and sometimes back from Mary's ear, while her eyes were turned from him. She took not the slightest notice. But as soon as the hymn was ended him and smiled, an answering smile at once responded. Having thus caught her eye, he opened his lips and imitated the movements made by a person speaking. The child watched him again. He then went through the same movements in an exaggerated fashion, but this time did really emit his sounds which the same movements properly accompany. The child mimicked the exaggerated movements, but failed to give out voice. He then put the child down with little sensible attention.

Later on in the evening I noticed that he was watching an opportunity of communicating his discovery. He was very cautious, lest any one someone he had been saying to the school-children, and regretted the bad habit he had acquired of speaking without thinking. He could very easily conceive the mischief he might do by sitting around a fire that burns warm and cheery in a locked-up house, whose broken bell-wires have ceased to tell their tale to the outside. He could think also of a fleet of ships sailing in company and obeying one set of signals; but so too a vessel might voyage alone, and not the less safely reach her haven.

So it was he endeavoring to break the news to me. Then I perceived how silly it was to make believe that I did not know what he was trying to tell me gently. I therefore said broadly out that I knew Mary had only four senses; and though at first I felt the information to be cruel, and could not but be always painful, yet when I said to myself that for part in life's battle would be proportioned to her want of faculties, I considered that the heavy sorrow was not without alleviation.

Our plans thenceforth were formed in concert. We determined at every cost to exhaust the possibility of cure, before we considered her deafness as any thing but an accident which admitted of removal. I was then steadily of opinion that it is one of her conditions of existence. For some years our life was little else than waiting upon doctors—for the most part charlatans and nurses. Promises, indeed, we had, for they fell like snowflakes every where; but melted with the same facility. Each new auriat gave us new hope, though not for long. Disappointment after we had not come to him sooner. In some cases we were cruelly victimized, and the health of our darling grievously injured by the time we discovered the truth was told us plainly as perhaps they thought we could bear it—namely, that medical science could do nothing whatever for Mary. One celebrated case in London came before the police magistrate, and at least two others might have gone; but certain difficulties in establishing legal guilt in that kind of swindling, and the fact that the law appropriates the men were callous, if indeed they did not flourish upon it, notoriety standing them in the same stead as delicacy.

At last even hope of cure died in us. What finally dissipated our delusion was the non-success of a painful and dangerous experiment she underwent in Paris. Her ears had been cut and blistered in the course of our wanderings, and all sorts of regimen prescribed and abided by without effecting improvement. In deep despondency we agreed to try this Parisian remedy, which we were assured had proved successful in every case in which it had been undertaken. I was present at the operation, and dared not ask how she bore it, but it consisted in removing with a trepan a piece of the skull bone that would reach the brain through the opening.

To induce Mary to let her ears be examined, her father had bought for her a costly but exquisitely-beautiful work of Parian which I used to call him. It represented an angel standing on a half-globe, and bearing, mouth upward, a cornucopia with flowers. Mary, who was then about five, as a doll, though careful in handling it to keep it clean and uninjured. Accustomed to stipulate for some present before each manipulation, she now desired that the flowers MARY, which were to be her name, might be carved on the vase, and filled in with black. By some culpable awkwardness—for awkwardness I deem it—the operator was criminal—the figure was shattered in the carving, and though put together again with some skill, the fracture was visible. I was present when her reward under its glass-shade in Mary's room at home, Mary herself making no attempts to uncover it.

She recovered from the operation with difficulty, but of course required protection against whatever would communicate even moderate concussion. She had now repose from the torture of being cured. As she recovered from the strength and as she was capable of reaching, we began to think of having her educated; but the dreadful results of the operative process had left her with some legal partial disbelief, or rather, a disinclination to belief, in the benefits of schooling. On this account we suffered her to remain at home till she was twelve years old. She could write from memory some verses of the Bible which Dr. Oneway, the rector, had pointed out to me as important for her to remember. Want of understanding them, the doctor said, should not deter me; for our part was to sow the seed, leaving to other influences its development. This determined, however, that she should not repeat words like a parrot. Accordingly, I began to open her mind to religious truth by explaining to her, as the foundation on which belief must rest, the series of words which form the entire mencement of the sacred book.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

I explained the first word by pouring water into a bottle, and telling her that that was in. The second word, the, I judged to have no meaning worth explaining, and accordingly passed it by. The third word, beginning, puzzled me greatly. I thought of giving up the verse and trying an easier one; but I could not, after search, find one without difficulties. It then struck me that as I got the word in a bottle, I might get beginning out of it as well. I repeated the act of pouring water into the bottle, in order that the beginning of the operation might be seen. I was a little dubious as to the accuracy of her conception of this third word, and slightly alarmed as to whether I might not have confused her previously clear idea of in. For I began to see that words in a sentence are like joined pieces of a water-pipe, the separate pieces are plain enough, but the meaning inside of them is all run together, and forms one idea. How, for instance, would the child pick apart the separate significations of the word beginning? However, I could not afford to dwell longer on this, for if every word were to be drained of its difficulties we should never get forward. Besides, future lessons would unlock what was left locked now.

I saw no trouble in the fourth word; for I had already given her an insight into her relationship toward a Maker. This I had done by spelling slowly the hallowed name, and pointing upward with extreme reverence, pointing also toward the church, which was visible from the windows up stairs. Created seemed to me harder of interpretation. After much thought I drew the figure of a blacksmith at work, and wrote down the word making. I then wrote down the word created, to signify that making and creating were similar acts. I had been told by a friend how an ingenious lady once explained the use of the child by tying a thread between a pen and an inkstand. The piece of thread was and. I therefore, on my system of instructing my pupil, required no new materials, but tied together the bottle and water-jug which I had already used to explain in and beginning. For the word and I pointed to the ground and swept my finger backward and forward to show.

After going over in this careful manner the sentence, whose important meaning I desired to elicit, I resolved to try it on her mind. For after all, it is not the quantity of instruction one gets that benefits, but that part of it which is well digested.

In the evening, when I considered the digestive process might be accomplished, I told her father what I had done. He commended my prudence in not cramming her. Particularly as to how the child would know the difference between in and beginning he shared. He agreed in the propriety of omitting the first word altogether. He seemed to doubt whether I had really imparted an idea of the Supreme Being by pointing upward reverentially, inasmuch as I myself believed in much the same way. Our perplexity was that we could not ascertain what real notion she formed as to meanings of words; for she always imitated with accuracy the action of her mother or us made use of in conveying an explanation.

The more I thought on it the less I was satisfied. Pitiful as the part will be in detailing, especially in her state of weakened health, brought about too by our misjudging care, our duty demanded the sacrifice. I resolved to tell her that what we terribly feared was, mischief befalling her in the course of some school-game. That unhappy opening in the skull-bone was always our most sensitive point.

When, however, we visited the school, and found her among companions like herself, saving that their deafness had been guarded from by them cures; found her, so to speak, in a sheltered nook where the influences of many minds acting on hers could not but be of the intelligence and develop whatever germs of good were in her, we experienced a relief we had not hoped for, and thought instinctively of the wind tempered to the shorn lambs.

When she came to us at the end of the second year, and repeated the few words she had been taught to utter, pronouncing I am happy—it seemed as if so great a stream of happiness could not have flowed to us through any other channel. How true is the saying of Paul!

She had been at school wearing on to five years when a somewhat severe illness attacked her father. Mary, informed of it by letter, begged to be allowed to nurse him. Her father afterward said that he found her mere presence in the room, whether still or in movement, had a soothing effect upon him which all the prescribed opium could exert. Perhaps from being habituated to read thought on the countenances before it took expression in words, she was more than another able to minister relief to hidden suffering. Perhaps it was the microscope of her very strong affection that assisted her eyesight, and rendered visible symptoms that the sufferer himself would have suppressed. Alas! when, in the course of only a few weeks afterward, she herself required doses for her daughter, little to those she was now performing, much as we loved her and would with thankfulness have taken her great agony on ourselves, if there had been any means, the microscope revealed little to our eyes that availed her in way of relief.

Originally not of a strong constitution, and cruelly shattered by the cures she had undergone, the most we had hoped for was, by excess of care, to wrap her from rough contact with life, and enable her sweetness of disposition to mature, as it were, within a conservatory, instead of exposed to open storms.

She seemed in an excellent state of health, as good, that is, as she ever enjoyed, when she went back to school after nursing her father through his illness. She had spoken of nursing us both when we were old and tottering, and herself an erect woman; so that those justified premonitions of early death, which are sometimes known to have occurred to the mind of a child, had not affected her.

As a proof that the tone of her mind was healthy, I give here her reply to the Rev. Bernard Oldtrack, Dr. Oneway's young curate, who was generously attempting to show her that, as faith entered by hearing, a padlock on this door caused the goods to be taken away again. She repeated the beautiful story of how divine love, walking in flesh and doing good, had bidden deaf ears be opened, and a bound tongue be unloosed. There were some additions in her version of the story that were not uninteresting, considering who she was that told it, and among whom it was current.

She conceived that we, her father and mother, had spent much money and taken her to many places, in the hope that some one would speak to her sealed ears the command—"Ephphatha;" but the proper way to speak this word was known to no man. At last, however, when all that had ever lived stood before Him—by whom blessed lips that word had been spoken—He would speak it again. They, whose tongues had through life remained unused and free from stains, like the sword in a cutler's shop that are carefully kept in sheaths, would now begin to flourish them in hymns; while the rest of the innocent crowd, having endured the power of speech when on earth, would find their tongues thereby grown rusty, and would, with difficulty, rive them out like bloody swords glued in scabbards.

This was her illustration.

Her description of the process of cleansing the rusty tongues was, though ingenuity, and could at least, to have satisfied those expounders of the compensation-laws of nature, who insist upon it that all our senses are not of good and ill-regard, however widely the items in our accounts may vary. In this unexpected and bold manner Mr. Oldtrack, seeking wool, had the scissors applied to his own back.

After remaining five weeks at home, Mary had returned to school. We were not to see her again till after Christmas, as she and her schoolmistress generally would be busy rehearsing the pantomime, which their custom was to enact at this holiday-time, for the edification of themselves and such kind-hearted school-friends as would lend their assistance in capacity of applauding spectators. We were pleased to hear this with the rest, as fragile barks have reached land while strong-built vessels have gone down, perhaps the great Shipowner above, seeing in His mysterious ways, would wait dear Mary over into the land that she would thus sail onward after we put into port.

Our dreams were scattered by a letter from the matron. It announced that Mary's health was suddenly low, and added, that the doctor was urgent she should have the benefit of home. In the greatest alarm, and without delay, we went by this time the smouldering disease of her brain had burst into flame, and they feared she could not bear removal—we conveyed her to Elmbury with as much speed as was consistent with extreme care.

She never rallied. All night she lay in stupor, from which the alteration was to spasms of pain. She muttered various of the expressions she had been taught to articulate. "Going home," she said; "going home." In particular that the word "Ephphatha," which had manifestly taken strong hold of her imagination. Early in the morning she sat up in bed, and made signs to some imaginary companions, for she took no notice of us. When I gave her the spoonfuls of wine-and-water ordered, she turned on me her dull heavy eye on which no change passed to indicate that she recognized me.

It had been a wild night, but with daylight the storm ceased. Even the wind that gnarled the old trees in the park, and beat with fury against the window of her sick-room where we were watching, left but a subdued relief from other sounds, as our thoughts were thereby diverted from a too concentrated fixedness on the desolation that was being wrought inside of the house. Poor Mary sank lower and lower. A terrific attack of convulsions that lasted some minutes, and made us hold our breath in awe, her strength seemed all but drained away. Unable to sit still, she was assisted by the nurse, and if impelled by an instinct to find, in bodily activity, some alleviating resources, would have struck me that she had fallen into playthings—the vase she had once been so fond of—would recall her mind. I had heard of inanimate things being recognized when familiar faces were forgotten. But I was agitated, and threw it down. As I stooped to pick up the fragments a sudden roaring blast shook the house, and the grash of an elm-branch driven with force against the window, the thick sash-bars of which gave way like lucifer-matches, startled us to some purpose. We were busy forcing the shutters back sufficiently to let out the wind, till we could remove our beloved to another room, but the violence of the tempest was too great. It rushed inside the shutters with ruin again as they slapped upon the wall, and sweeping like an eddy round the room, stripped the clothes from the sick bed with a vindictiveness of fury that seemed to have gathered force in the calm. We ran to cover her, another wild blast drove in, through the smashed window, a poor unhappy dove which it had caught in its fury, and flung it against the wall right above where the child lay, but happily with a spent impetus. Recovering itself the bird fluttered about to avoid being handled, and, by-and-by, reaching the open window—when a lull in the storm occurred—flew out again.

What little life had been in Mary was by this time quite shaken out. We did not see the breath go from her, and were only sensible that the clay-mask was separate from the spirit which had worn it when we remarked the growing coldness of the form we continued to watch.

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

WE publish on the twentieth page a picture of the Battle of New Orleans, which, as every school-boy knows, was fought on January 8, 1815, just forty-six years ago. Our artist has been greatly assisted in making his drawing by an old print of the battle kindly furnished us by the Rev. Richard O. Curry, of Tennessee.

It was on 23d December, 1814, that the British fleet, carrying 12,000 well-disciplined troops, commanded by some of Wellington's most experienced generals, anchored off the entrance to Lake Borgne, Louisiana. Jackson was at New Orleans, which place was soon in a state of terror and confusion. The population of the place was only 20,000, one half of whom were whites, and many of the latter were not implicitly trusted. There were no arms in the city, and a supply of muskets made at Pittsburgh, and daily expected, had not arrived. A body of militia from Tennessee and Kentucky were also behind time. Jackson, however, made the best arrangements he could for defence; organized all the troops at his disposal, even calling upon free men of color to join in the conflict; and proclaimed martial law, in order to provide against treachery in the city. By December 22 the English army had advanced to the head of Lake Borgne, and there to a point on the Mississippi about fifteen miles below New Orleans. There Jackson first attacked them, coming upon them with a fierce shout one-fourth as large as theirs, on the night of 23d. The action was indecisive; the British are said to have lost more men than the Americans; but neither party lost ground. Next morning the British received reinforcements. But instead of renewing the attack, they sent down for more artillery. This delay was of essential service to Jackson, who raised a rampart with cotton bales, mounted some pieces of heavy artillery taken out of the schooners in the Mississippi, and sent for and received reinforcements from New Orleans.

A week or more was spent in these preparations, diversified by some cannonading from the batteries opposed to each other; at length, on the night of 7th-8th January, General Packenham sent Colonel Thornton across the river to attack General Morgan, who had thrown up works on the west bank, and was defending them with some 1500 men. Early on the morning of 8th Packenham himself advanced to the attack of Jackson's position, under cover of a battery erected in the night. It has always been understood in this country that the British General was "Booty and Beauty;" this is denied by the British historians of the war, and it is to be hoped that their denial is well founded. The British column advanced straight at the American line, in the teeth of a hot fire from its large guns, and in front of the Tennessee riflemen. In the course of a very few minutes the advancing column began to waver. Officers and men fell thickly. Packenham was killed, and the other two generals wounded, one of them mortally; and after a brief, desperate attempt to rally the troops, Lambert, who succeeded to the command, gave the order to retire. Colonel Thornton had taken Morgan's position on the west side of the river, but on witnessing the defeat of the main body he too withdrew. There were some officers in the British army who were for renewing the attack; but 2000 men had fallen, and General Lambert did not care to risk any more. He fell back to Lake Borgne, and re-embarked his army, unmolested, on January 27.

Thus New Orleans was saved. Jackson's total loss was only 71 men on both sides the river. Considering the difficulties he had to contend with, the smallness of his force, his scanty supply of arms and ammunition, and the well-won prestige of the troops against whom he fought, the victory deserves to be ranked among the most glorious in the annals of war. May Americans never cease to celebrate it; and may the Union, in whose history it is a bright a page, never know any battles save against a foreign enemy!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Toilet Articles.

Among the many compounds now offering to our lady friends, there are few that we can so readily recommend as those emanating from the celebrated house of JOSEPH BURNETT & Co. They possess two qualities to which we would especially call attention; viz., the entire absence of all deleterious compounds, and the certainty that they will perform all they are said to do. The unpleasant and oftentimes painful results upon the skin attending exposure to our most changeable climate, may be entirely obviated by the use of Burnett's Kalliston, which has now become so useful a requisite in the toilet, that no lady considers her dressing table complete without it.—Galveston News.

MR. THACKERAY'S New Story is commenced in this Number of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. It is here printed simultaneously with its publication in England, from advance sheets furnished to the Publishers by the Author. The admirers of "Pendennis" and "The Newcomes" will be glad to renew, in the opening chapters, their acquaintance with their old friends, Arthur Pendennis, Laura, and the Major; and the circle will doubtless be enlarged in the succeeding portions of the story.

The Publishers have also made arrangements with the Author of "Adam Bede" and "The Mill on the Floss" for a New Story for the Magazine.

A Series of Illustrated Papers, describing Life, Character, and Scenery in every part of the American Continent, from Labrador to Oregon, prepared from personal experience by favorite Authors and Artists, is in preparation, and will appear from time to time.

A complete Set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE will be a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. Besides the Tales, Poems, and Essays which form the leading features of Periodical Literature, each Number of the Magazine has contained articles of permanent value. Nearly Two Hundred Papers, illustrated by more than Two Thousand Engravings, have been devoted to American History, Biography, Industry, Character, and Scenery. Many of the great Agricultural Staples has been made the subject of elaborate articles. The results of the explorations of travellers in regions heretofore unscribed have been carefully epitomized. The "LITERARY NOTICES" embody impartial estimates of more than two thousand books, comprising almost every work of any value which has been issued from the American press during the last ten years. The "Monthly Record of Current Events," though filling a small space in each Number, contains matter sufficient to fill several volumes. Every great of historical importance is here noted; it furnishes a more complete history of the last few years than can be found in any other accessible shape.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, aware of its permanent value, have electrotyped every page. They can, therefore, supply any Number from the beginning upon the following terms:

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States (not exceeding 300 miles of New York), post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-one Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1860, are now ready.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. V.—No. 212.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1861. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

HON. FRANCIS W. PICKENS, GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

GOVERNOR PICKENS, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

We publish herewith a portrait of Governor Pickens, the newly-elected Governor of the State of South Carolina.

Governor Pickens comes of good revolutionary stock. His grandfather, General Pickens, commanded the American forces at the Battle of the Cowpens. His father, Colonel Pickens, held a military command in the war of 1812, though it is not known that he was ever engaged in active service. The present Governor, Francis W. Pickens, was born in South Carolina about fifty years ago, and has been some twenty years in public life.

He took an active part in the nullification movement in 1832, and was one of the most ardent champions of actual resistance by arms. In 1835 he was sent to Congress, where he represented one of the South Carolina districts for ten years. He was offered the mission to England by President Polk, and the mission to France by President Tyler: he declined these, but accepted from President Buchanan the mission to Russia, which he filled until recently. On his return home he was elected, as the world knows, first Governor of the Independent State of South Carolina.

REV. DR. BACHMAN, WHO ASKED A BLESSING ON THE SECESSION ORDINANCE.

HON. JUDGE MAGRATH, SECRETARY OF STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Herald publishes the following anecdotes about the Governor:

"During the nullification times, the remark was made that the occasion was one that might excite fears and apprehension, when Colonel Pickens is alleged to have replied as follows:

"'Fear! fear! Mr. President, I was born insensible to fear!'

"His servant man, Tom, an old negro about sixty-five years of age, stands in the relation to him of a confidant and a friend more than that of a slave. When Colonel Pickens received his appointment to Russia he said to his faithful old servant:

"'Now, Tom, I have been appointed as Minister to Russia. It is a very cold, a very bad climate for you. On my way there I'll have to pass through the State of New York, and also through England, where you'll be a free man, and if you have a desire to leave me you will have an opportunity to do so. If you would rather go to Russia, Tom, you can go; but it appears to me you would enjoy yourself better if you stay at home. But you can do as you please.'

"'Master Colonel Pickens,' said the faithful old fellow—'Master Colonel Pickens, your father and my old master died in my arms on the banks of the Mississippi: I took from his pocket thirteen hundred dollars in money and his gold watch, and I let nobody know it, and I came on foot through the woods and brought it safely to you in Carolina—you know, master; and if you die in Russia, you shall die in my arms, like your father.'

"So Tom went to St. Petersburg, and he was the head

man at the door on all state occasions, and acquitted himself with all the dignity due to the position. When Colonel Pickens was about leaving St. Petersburg he said to his old servant, "Tom, I am going through Germany, and I want to send a courier with very important dispatches to our Minister, Mr. Dallas, in London. Now, Tom, I shall make you courier; you shall go with my dispatches to Mr. Dallas."

"Tom accepted the mission, and we do him but justice when we say that he discharged his duty with promptness, correctness, and fidelity to his master."

JUDGE MAGRATH.

We publish on page 33, from a photograph sent us from Charleston, South Carolina, a portrait of Judge Magrath, late Judge of the United States District Court at Charleston. Judge Magrath is a lawyer of high standing at the South Carolina bar, and enjoys the respect of the public. He has hitherto taken no leading part in politics outside of his State; but in the Convention he was reckoned one of the strongest men, and is now one of the Executive Council of the new nation of South Carolina. The first act which directed public attention to him was his resignation of his office on 7th November last. On that day, when the Grand Jury reported that there was no more business before them, Judge Magrath said:

"The business of the term has been disposed of. And under ordinary circumstances, it would be our duty to dismiss you to your several avocations, with my thanks for your presence and aid. But now I have something more to do; the omission of which would not be consistent with propriety. In the political history of the United States an event has happened of eminent import to fifteen States holding the Union. The State of which we are citizens has been always understood to have deliberately fixed its purpose, whenever that event should happen, by calling an assurance of what will be the action of the State, I consider it my duty, without delay, to prepare to obey its wishes. That preparation is made by the resignation of the office I have held. For the last time I have, as a Judge of the United States, administered the laws of the United States within the limits of the State of South Carolina. While thus acting in obedience to a sense of duty, I can not be indifferent to the emotions it may produce. That department of government which, I believe, has best maintained its integrity and preserved its purity, has been suspended. So far as I am concerned, the Temple of Justice, raised under the Constitution of the United States, is now closed. If it shall be ever again opened, I thank God that its doors have been closed before its altar has been decorated with sacrifices to tyranny. May I close my eye to you that in the future which we are about to penetrate, next to the reliance we should place in the goodness of that God, who will guide us in the right way, should be our confidence in our State, and our obedience to its laws. We are about to sever our relations with others, between whom we have broken their covenant with us. Let us not break the covenant we have made with each other. Let us not forget that what the laws of our State require is the measure of duties. And that he who acts against the wish or without the command of his State usurps that sovereign authority which we must maintain inviolate. To you, gentlemen of the jury, I may speak as the representative of the juries with whom I have been connected: and to you I now give expression to that conviction I have always had, of the fidelity with which the responsible duties of juries have been discharged. To my brethren of the bar, whose uniform courtesy and aid have made my official intercourse and duties those of pleasure and not labor, I tender the assurances of my kind and grateful recollection. To the officers of this court, with whom I have been so long and pleasantly associated; to the attorney of the United States for this State, whose ability and fidelity in the discharge of his duties merit the highest commendation; to the Marshal whose zeal has ever kept pace with the obligations of his office; to the Clerk, whose experience has ever been generously exercised in the business of the Court; to all other officers, who have invariably been exact in all they were required to do; with all of whom my official relations have been productive of the highest gratification: I now tender, as the last official act which I shall here discharge, my kindest wishes for their happiness and prosperity."

At the conclusion of these remarks his Honor laid aside his gown and retired.

REV. DR. BACHMAN, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

We publish on page 33 the portrait of the Rev. Dr. Bachman, of South Carolina, the minister who was selected by the Secession Convention to ask a prayer on the ratification of the Ordinance of Secession. Dr. Bachman is distinguished as a naturalist, but has made himself more conspicuous, latterly, by his strong political leanings to the side of disunion. The Charleston Mercury thus describes the scene which attended the signing of the Ordinances of Secession:

"The scene was one profoundly grand and impressive. There were a people assembled through their highest representatives, some most of them gray, upon whom the snow of sixty winters had been shed—patriarchs in age—the dignitaries of the land—the High Priests of the Church of Christ—to invoke His benediction—and the very Judge of the law. In the midst of deep silence an old man, with bowed form and hair as white as snow, the Rev. Dr. Bachman, advanced forward, with upraised hands, in prayer to Almighty God. His blessing and favor in this great act of the people about to be consummated. The whole assembly at once rose to its feet, and, with hats off, listened to the touching and eloquent appeal to the All-Wise Dispenser of events.

"At the close of the prayer the President advanced with the ominously parchment upon which was inscribed the decision of the State, with the great seal attached. Slowly and solemnly it was read unto the last word—distinctly! when men could contain themselves no longer, and a shout that shook the very building, reverberating long continued, rose to heaven, and could only subside in the loss of breath. In proud, grave silence the Convention itself waited the end with beating hearts."

CHARLESTON ZOUAVES.

We have given pictures of the Chicago Zouaves, whose admirable discipline has rendered them an object of general envy among our military folks. We now publish on the preceding page a picture of the Charleston Zouaves, a corps less generally known, but one which may become pretty conspicuous in the course of the next few weeks. The uniform, it can not be denied, is very handsome; and the men who wear it are gallant and brave.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1861.

THE TRADE AND PROSPECTS OF NEW YORK CITY.

THE exports of produce, goods, and merchandise from the port of New York during the year 1860 were valued at the Custom-house at the sum of $103,492,280, about thirty per cent. more than the heaviest previous export on record. Adding specie to produce, goods, and merchandise, New York exported in 1860 $145,683,451, against $137,696,187 in 1859, $85,039,643 in 1858, and $117,724,209 in 1857. The peculiarity of the commercial movement of 1860 was that our specie export was comparatively small, while our aggregate exports were notwithstanding largely in excess of previous years.

To explain this more fully: the Atlantic States receive from California some forty millions of gold annually. The amount is uncertain, because a portion of the gold which comes here is not manifested. Taking an average of five years, we export the whole of this gold to Great Britain and France. In 1858 the year after the panic, when the importations were light, exchange ruled low, and we only exported $26,001,431 in specie. This was less than we received, and left a gain in the country. But the year following (the imports being heavy) we exported $69,715,866 in specie —nearly seventy-five per cent. more than we received. Last year we exported $77,711,711 —say about as much as we received from California, Pike's Peak, and the Southern gold mines. But as during the year 1860 we imported $8,822,859 in specie from Europe and elsewhere, it results that the close of the year leaves the United States nearly nine millions richer in specie than they were at New Year, 1860.

During the same year, 1860, New York received $238,260,460 in foreign goods—not quite as much as it received in 1859, but considerably more than any other year. It is probably safe to say that, in 1860, New York received three-fourths of the exports of the United States, and exported one-third of their exports.

The commercial statistics have directed attention to the commerce of this port, and alarm has been created by threats of raising up commercial rivals to New York. It does not appear that there is any room on a commercial basis. Before the Revolution Charleston imported more foreign goods than any Northern city. After the Revolution, and previous to 1800, Philadelphia was the principal emporium of foreign goods on this sea-board. New York has now superseded both. It has done so without the least favors from Government, but simply by the force of natural advantages and the energy of its people. Philadelphia urges that the availability of New York harbor in winter is the cause of our supremacy. But Charleston harbor is freer of ice than ours. Charleston is always at the depth of water over the bar at Sandy Hook explains the mystery. But Portland has no bar, and vessels of very heavy draught can enter at Philadelphia. The simple fact is that a variety of concurrent circumstances—an excellent harbor, a central position, an energetic commercial community, an unequaled system of internal communications, a liberal commercial code, and a uniformly healthy climate—have combined to render this city the metropolis of commercial America. Our taxes are heavier than those of any other city on the continent; our Municipal Government indisputably worse than any. Last year we raised $11,000,000 for Municipal purposes; in a year or two the Common Council will demand $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. Yet in thirty notwithstanding, and two-thirds of the business of the country are done here.

Those who fear that the sceptre is passing away from New York will do well to bear these facts in mind. It is very easy to open a port, and to expect a great trade, but it is very hard to create a rival to New York. This city is the product of a variety of concurring influences such as may never be united again on this continent. Until equally powerful influences are combined in favor of some other sea-port, New York will maintain its supremacy undisputed.

THE GROWTH OF THE WEST.

THE returns of the census of 1860 which have been made public reveal a growth of population in our Western States that is unexampled in history. In ten years six States—to wit, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, and Wisconsin—have increased from less than four millions to nearly eight. They have, besides this, peopled Minnesota, an entirely new State, and thrown a few hundred thousand people into the Pike's Peak Region, Washington Territory, and Oregon. They have built more miles of railway than there are in all the rest of the Union; and, if New York and Pennsylvania be omitted from the comparison, we will venture to say that they have more cities, better hotels, schoolhouses, and churches, than all the rest of the country together. The men still live who remember to have walked over the bare prairie where Chicago now rears her splendid face; unless present appearances are very deceptive indeed, many of us who read these lines will live to see Chicago the most populous city on the continent.

For eight millions of working people are a mighty few. Much has been said and written about the delinquency of the West in the matter of debts. No doubt Wisconsin has something to answer for in the way of stay-laws and repudiation; but the people of these States, too, will need, by-and-by, to clear their record of certain laws and legal proceedings of the hard times. But it must be remembered that the West relies solely for subsistence on its crops, and that they really had not a good crop there between 1856 and 1860. Two good crops in the West enable a man to pay for his land. Two bad crops make a man a bankrupt. The creditors of the West will get good news from there this spring.

Eight millions of free, intelligent, reading people are a force which overrides a legion of minor drawbacks and temporary checks.

THE SOUTHERN FORTS.

EVERY thing relating to the United States property in the Southern States is now of interest, and we shall be able to subjoin the following accurate list of the United States Forts in those States. The list begins with the forts in Louisiana, and follows the coast line to Maryland:

FORT JACKSON AND FORT ST. PHILIP, on the Mississippi River, 75 miles below New Orleans.

FORT MORGAN,

Mobile Point, at the entrance of Mobile Bay, 40 miles below Mobile.

FORT GAINES

(unfinished), on Dauphin Island, opposite Fort Morgan and three miles distant.

(These two Works defend the entrance to Mobile Bay—of which Fort Morgan is the key. It immediately adjoins the ship channel, and for the most important. This has been taken possession of by Alabama troops.)

FORT PICKENS,

Santa Rosa Island, entrance to Pensacola harbor. One of the largest works on the Gulf. Finished.

FORT M'REE,

on Foster's Island, opposite Fort Pickens, and 1¼ miles distant. A powerful casemated water-battery.

FORT BARRANCAS,

near the Navy Yard, Pensacola, and facing the entrance to the harbor. Key West is the key to the Navy Yard from a land attack. Much smaller than the other two.

FORT JEFFERSON,

a very important work—not quite finished—intended to protect the Tortugas Harbor. The Tortugas, as a naval depôt and station for guarding the immense commerce which follows the mouth of the Gulf Stream, and for controlling the navigation of the Gulf.

FORT TAYLOR,

Key West—an important work, nearly finished—protects the harbor of Key West, and (with Fort Jefferson) protects the commerce of the Gulf.

FORT PULASKI,

Cockspur Island, a few miles below Savannah, protects the entrance to the river and harbor of Savannah. A very important work—now taken possession of by Georgia troops.

FORT MOULTRIE AND FORT SUMTER

protect the entrance to Charleston harbor. "The former is on Sullivan Island, about 3 miles below the city—an old work repaired. The latter is a new and powerful work, 1 mile distant from Fort Moultrie, and 1 mile from the nearest land.

CASTLE PINCKNEY,

a small work on the approach to, and near the city of Charleston. This as well as Fort Moultrie is now held by South Carolina troops. Major Anderson holds Fort Sumter.

FORT MONROE AND FORT CALHOUN, entrance to Hampton Roads, protect these Roads and the approach to Norfolk, James River, etc. The former is the largest work in the United States. The latter is but recently commenced, and not in available condition.

FORT M'HENRY,

an old work, protecting the harbor of Baltimore.

FORT CARROLL,

a few miles below Baltimore. A very important work, now in progress of construction.

THE LOUNGER.

OLD FASHIONED.

DID you ever hear of a good old-fashioned snowstorm? Did you ever Know a satisfactory fall of snow any where that somebody was not sure to call it a good old-fashioned snow-storm? If people want you to be very sure of enjoying yourself, and wish to give an irresistible point to their invitation, have you observed that they infallibly promise you a good old-fashioned time? And the orators who mourn every thing that exists will not end without an eloquent invocation of the good old-fashioned ways.

And yet in our secret souls, we lucky fellows, who have water hot and cold all over the house, can not have a very profound admiration for the good old-fashioned inconveniences of a pump in the kitchen or a well in the yard, as the sole resources and supply. We who, by a dexterous twist of the valve in the air-box, shed a soft summer heat through our houses—so that while it may be the fiercest January outside it is the temperate June within—can not regret very deeply the great barns of halls and the little barns of passages, and the freezing on one side and roasting on the other before the great open fire in the parlor. There were good old-fashioned fires, wood fires, but we have compromised to them again, and a hundred-fold more comfortable than they were. The days of anthracite coal grates, the dark and dreary days of the thin, black, air-light stove, are gone, and we have the low open ranges of soft coal, Cannel best of all, which crackles and sparkles and flames, and restores the luxury of the old fire, with a comfort it never knew.

Then you have not forgotten the good old-fashioned times of stone-cold chambers? Leigh Hunt, in the Indicator, has a most judicious paper upon early rising, under the good old-fashioned circumstances. How one did dally with bed! How heavy the air which crept over hands and face moved it visibly and defiantly in your face, by way of impressing you with the terrible fact of cold! How doubly warm and comfortable your position, as you lay close upon your back, hating to stir! The very demon of cold seemed waiting for you. He had planted his window with frost. Even the snowmans came chilled and white through that impertinent crust. And oh! in the pitcher and the pail, you could not see but you knew. It was ice, unmitigated ice.

Do you think these good old-fashioned conditions of getting up were favorable to good health and good habits? Do you think that the fear of dawdling blue and numb was likely to do justice to his ablutions, for instance? And was he not sure to sit his chair to breakfast? Is it all very fine to sleep with your window open or your head out of the window, but dressing is another matter. Why should you select an hour or two in the morning to expose your body to a pinching extreme of temperature? If you afterward dressed in muslin and dropped out in the snow, à la Jessie Brown. But you do nothing of the kind; furs, mufflers, woolens, are your only wear. No, no. Habits of general cleanliness, the universal morning bath, come in with the new-fashioned times, when they don't use ice for soup.

The world would have been in a bad way if it had listened more credulously to this incessant siren song of the good old-fashioned times. The old-fashion was new-fashion once, and if it is a poor thing to be a new thing, there are many who are already self-condemned. Do you suppose Harry, who was betrothed under the clear moon last night to Sally, would have had the good old-fashioned times of old lovers see so splendid as the new times of the new lovers? Will you renounce your Erard for the open old-fashioned harpsichord? Will your orchestra of the Philharmonic for the limited bands for which Mozart wrote? Will you exchange your space-annihilating and time-saving rail, which laughs the winter to scorn as it turns the snow from its track, for the good old-fashioned covered sleigh in which you packed and froze and dozed, accomplishing forty miles a day, or wrecked in a snow-drift?

The good old-fashioned sunshine we have as our fathers had it. The good old-fashioned beauty of all the world is ours unimpaired. The good old-fashioned traits of character that make them honored and loved by old and old die with them. There were no more honest, generous, religious people than we are. The world is not set back. Let who will begin the New Year with a groan. The good, new-fashioned times shall be the best times of all.

A SHORT SPEECH UPON SPEECHES.

AT last the Egyptian collection of Dr. Abbott is established in its permanent position at the Historical Society's rooms. It has been fitted to us, and we have it; but the feeling of satisfaction is allayed a little by the thought that the collector can not share in the pleasure. His portrait, however is to be hung in the rooms, and so his visible memory be perpetuated. There was a pleasant meeting to commemorate the final lodgment in the new home. There was plenty of good talking, of Egyptian reminiscence and scholarship, and some speech-making. We, as lookers, were not bored enough to dispense with the speeches, we may have reasons as agreeable as the soirées of the Royal Society at the Marquis of Northampton's a few years ago.

But we must exercise the demon of speech-making before we can hope for millennial meeting. There are many of the pleasantest and most pleasing people in the country who will not go to meetings because they may be obliged to speak; and it is not left to your discretion. If you are invited for any thing you must make a speech. Now you may be the most charming novelist, or essayist, or poet, or historian, or inventor, or discoverer, or mechanic, but it does not follow that you can turn an oratorical period. And then, unhappily, per contra, you may reel off the most fluent and felicitous harangue, and yet not be so very great a man after all. Washington Irving would not go to public meetings. Your blind eagle upon the express understanding, not only that he was not to speak, but that he was not to be called upon, and so have to speak in declining. Thackeray, at a dinner in Liverpool, when he rose to speak was suddenly deserted by the mass of eloquence, and after saying, good-humorously, "Really I thought I had something to say, but I don't," sat down. In general that remark should be put in the form of statement and rejoinder—

ORATOR. "Really I thought I had something to say."

AUDIENCE. "Yes, but we see that you haven't."

The secret of the evil enjoyment of club meetings and social dinners is, that nobody can spring the trap of a speech upon you. May an humble inquirer reverentially ask why the Historical Society can't have meetings without speeches—not the papers which are read, but the ceremonious harangues?

HUMOR AND HEROISM.

WHEN Thackeray was first in this country he wrote a lecture, at the invitation of a charitable society, upon Charity and Humor. It was a charming, simple, and touching performance, and is included in the volume of lectures upon the English humorists.

But there is another text of the same kind from which the sermon has not yet been preached, and that is, heroism and humor. The illustrations in recent history should be Charles Lamb and Thomas Hood—faithful soldiers both, and true heroes. Tommy Moore, whose power of perceiving a humane character was not so remarkable as his skill in writing sentimental songs, thought Charles Lamb a poor person, a kind of parlor clown. But when the "Final Memorials" appeared, and Talfourd reverently lifted the veil from the holy mystery of his life, it was seen that Nelson and of Wellington did not seem greater. In fact, the test of heroism is, that it is purely private. Even small men can behave like heroes, if they know that the world is looking at them and admiring.

The Memorials of Thomas Hood, recently published by his son and daughter, curiously enough tell very little about his life, but a great deal about his death. A few letters describing the discomforts of life upon the Rhine, but overflowing with satisfactory, give a very inadequate idea of the man or the life he led. Of course, there was not a great deal of event or variety in his life; but neither was there in Lamb's: that all the difference of the impression in the story of the two is very striking. We have no account whatever of the circumstances of the writing and printing of the "Bridge of Sighs;" yet such things are the events in the life of a literary man.

But every thing is forgiven for the sake of the picture of the calm and heroic end of the poet, who seems always to have been content to consider himself a guest, and to be used slowly, with considerably, day by day. He took leave of his friends—still in the prime of his manhood and of his power, looking death sweetly in the face, and unawering the conqueror. The gayety of his spirit was not quenched. It was cheerful, manly, hearty, to the last. The common humanity of his genius was more universal as the clear light of death showed life more truly. Two months before he died, as he lay expectant in his house, he wrote to thank Sir Robert Peel for the pension granted to his wife, and to say that they should not meet in the flesh. It was his last letter.

"Thank you," the mind is composed and my reason undisturbed; but my nice as an author is run. My physical debility robs me toxic virtue in a single sentence. Were I well enough to write a more paper—a forewarning one—against an evil, or the danger of it, arising from a literary movement in which I have had some influence—and humanity, opposite to that cathetic Shakespearian sympathy, which felt with King as well as Possum, and duly estimated the mortal temptations of both situations, I should then cleanse at the poles of society are already too far asunder; it should be the duty of our writers to draw them nearer by kindly attractions, or else generate the explosive elements and place a wider moral gulf between Rich and Poor, with Hate on the one side and Fear on the other. But I am too weak for this task, the last I had set myself; it is death that stops my pen, you see, and not the pension."

They are the words of a "humorist;" but how they transfigure the word!

"Poor comfort still for honest grief to cherish!
Poor bliss which memory alone supplies!
Death took away all earthly affections perish—
Though in this world of woe the good man dies."

SKATING PARKS.

WE all thought of the Central Park as a summer resort—a retreat in July—a country made easy for the city—a place in which every citizen should be his own gentleman. But, as we have urged on a week or two ago, it is more than that. It is questionable whether it is not visited as much, and even more assiduously, in the winter than in the summer. For we stroll about in shady walks with shady minds: but who does not skate with ardor?

Six years ago skating was an amusement poor liar to other lands in the country; it is now an amusement universal and of every age. Do you remember, Dr. M——, that pond near New Haven, how it was always glittered with the gliding girls and youths a short year ago? If we should pass it now, I do not doubt it would show us the same scene. It was a great resort then, for there have not forgotten, M——, the beautiful Jamaica Pond near Boston—that shining ball-room floor, upon which the lovely and the gallant were seen to sweep and darted in myriad bewildering mazes, in motion that made its own music—over which the keen bright air whirled with a smile, and around which the pretty villas upon the shore and the solemn, stately evergreens gathered with sympathy and admiration? Why did you not detain the Prince to see this hall of joy? Surely with the walls and a good rider, might he not have crowned his glory and his conquests by chasing you, fan-darting and agile fair, upon his shining steel, through the parting and emulous throng?

The Ami noblesse of the metropolis are a little slower to give the goddess to the new and exhilarating pursuit than those of other cities not so large. Boston, for instance—and the Lounger does not mean to institute a comparison—has a right to be a city "not so large"—Boston goes all together. Not some girls, but all the girls, skate, or go to the Rehearsals, or collect photographs, or read Charles Auchester, or dream of Boolh, or ride sitting in the saddle, under the Polish régime. They are unanimous. You take the street car on a sunny winter afternoon, and sylph after sylph leaps from with her skates hanging to her arm. To her cater Gustavus and Randolphus. They are going to skate. Young Boston, of either sex, will amuse itself this afternoon by gyrations upon frozen water. Now in New York, if you would skate, you go to the Central Park, and look go with you! In other places you go to the ocean, or river, or canal. So in Boston, it used to be Jamaica Pond or the "Back Bay"—(the front bay yet remains to be heard of); but the circumstances have certainly a clever way of managing matters—a different way, at least, as they had in France. For they have instituted skating parks. They have improvised theatres for the new amusement.

For instance: in Roxbury a little stream was dammed in a hollow of hills or ridges, and in a bit of wood upon the rising shore. This overflow makes a pond of an average depth of four feet, and covering perhaps two acres or more. This is carefully inclosed with a fence, a large quantity is set for the skaters to put on the skates in comfort, warmed and furnished with seats, and serving for the office of the Superintendent. He is a responsible man, and takes care of every thing. The admission is by tickets—two dollars for the entire skating season. At night the place is lighted either by gas-burners or scores of lanterns; and all day long it is filled with skaters of all ages and both sexes. In the morning is held and the ice is rolled, steal-carefully along, and little children come to learn quite unaccompanied: and in the afternoon and evening the science and skill comes pouring in, and it is high carnival.

The expense of such a park is considerable—not less, probably, than two thousand dollars for the season. It is overflowed at proper times, and carefully scraped after a snow-storm, so that it may be always in order. Doubtless we shall yet see new and brilliant developments of such a new amusement. Feasts of colored lanterns—games for two or three hundred players—what not? It is an ice Boston season, and will come to perfection.

In the intervals of skating, if the skaters want to laugh, let them refresh their remembrance of the Christmas doings at Dingley Dell, in Pickwick.

OLD HOUSES.

SOMEHOW we seem resolved in this country that we will have no visible relics of the older epochs of our history. A few months since the most interesting building in the city of New York, which was also only the third upon its site since the settlement of the island, was quietly demolished without raising the least dust. It was a dingy, shabby edifice, emitting so much as a dying speech and confession to let the passer-by know that it was in any manner different from the rest of the dingy, and without a guilty of being more than twenty years old, and therefore justly suffer demolition.

At this moment the only buildings of historic interest actually survive in New York! Even the few that remain are so changed that the association is necessarily lost. Take, for instance, the most venerable neighbor, of whom we have chatted before with high respect, is a sailors' boarding-house; yet it is not externally altered, and is still a Mason in rough cast, with projecting gables, and outquarters, at the corner of Battery Place and Broadway, is entirely changed. It is not the house in which Washington bade farewell to his officers, and Baron Burr and then John André were lungers. The old tavern at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets, in which Hamilton "drank deep draughts of love and gratitude," drank farewell to his officers, still preserves something of its quaint respectability of aspect.

But when you saunter up the busy street, where you can not find a footing upon the sidewalks, they are so crowded with carts and barrels and bales, and remember the quiet dwellings of wealthy and broad stoops that lined the street a hundred and fifty years ago, long before we had our Government and a President, and the only residence of the first President was inaugurated in the balcony of the old City Hall that fronted the head of Broad street, and where he solemnly swore to the people of the chief, the chancellor, the famous group, and you raise your eyes to see the very spot and to burn in the glorious scene, you are saddened to think how your patriotism anew. Alack! alack! what is that foolish imitation of a white Greek temple that stares at you from the same memorable spot?

Buildings of historic renown are the most impressive public monuments. They are parts of what they commemorate. They are the contemporary witnesses of events with us. They look at them, we see the times of which they were contemporaries; touching them, we touch the great men who moved among them.

Now and then, in quiet country-places, you come upon the untouched remains of the old magnificence, or, it may be, of the old simplicity. For instance, I lately stopped at a hotel in a retired town, which outwardly looked like a private mansion, and found the old-fashioned house was established. The oft ceilings—the old-fashioned sweep of the staircase, with a balustrade of white painted posts surmounted by a mahogany railing—the ample doors and broad hall indicated that the private residence of wealth and respectability now declined to public purposes. I followed the waiter up stairs to my room. He opened the door of massive wood door with the old-fashioned knobs, and ushered me into a lofty and spacious apartment, which would have made half a dozen of the small rooms of an ordinary "first-class" hotel. A bright fire burned upon the hearth, the window curtains were drawn, the old-fashioned easy chairs were standing temptingly before the fire, and the gas was turned down over the table. Another square heavy door opened into the bedroom, and I saw at a glance the same comfortable and domestic aspect.

It was clear that the house was some handsome home of the past day which had become a hotel. The room in which I sat was evidently almost unchanged. I felt myself an intruder. I awaited the coming of some stately host to freeze me with haughty politeness of rebuke. As the night deepened I heard the faint rustle of ghostly robes. I was aware of the unseen presence of the gay company of another generation. I was an unbidden guest at the feast. I arose and tried to steal away. But the measured music of the minute paused. The company turned upon me reproachful and resentful eyes. I was the occasion of many voices died away, and, overwhelmed with mortification, I began to explain how the coachman had brought me thither, when the sound of my voice awoke me. I was sitting in the spacious room by the kindly fire; but the music, the murmuring throng, the rustling robes, the high polite society, were only what might have been.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LATIN UNDER THE LOSH.—A schoolmaster, in giving a boy a flogging, remarked about a minute between the cuts of the rod. Tres dat qui cito dat, cried the victim to the commentor.

CONUNDRUMS.

Why is a chimney-sweep like clothes a pot of beer like a church-proficating vegetable?—Because he is a pot-tater.

What animal must needs have been a bad Frenchman?—A cellon-rat (scelerat).

If an egg were questioned about its parentage, what person would it most likely name?—Mother-land.

What cat is like a large abbey?—A gray tabby (a great abbey).

Why is a hatter like a valuer of goods?—Because he's a hatter-viser (appraiser).

Why is a stoker on a railway-engine like another progressive breakfast?—Because he gets his steam ald (aid) ing hand by hot water.

Can you name the greatest corn-growers in Europe and America?—Yes; tight boots.

Why should a cigar-smoker always smoke?—Because tobacco-smoke is generally a coughing-maker.

Why is a lawyer's office like a bird?—Because it's a bit of ges (a bit of gese).

In trying to make a contract, what do you mean by a "sealed tender"?—A love-letter.

TELLING YOUR FORTUNE.—A witness in the Court of Queen's Bench being cross-examined by Mr. Garrow, that gentleman pertinaciously asked him if he was not a fortune-teller?—"I am not," answered the witness; "but if every one had his due I should be entirely in telling your fortune."—"Well, fellow," says Mr. Garrow, "pray what is to be my fortune?"—"Why, sir," replied the witness, "if I understand you made your first speech at the old Bailey, and I think it is possible that you will there make your last speech."

A Frenchman thinks the English language is very tough. "I have been to the theatre," he says, "and took a pit on your head and see; and look out, which is to haud your hand and not for to see—just contrarie."

A TIGHT boy state what were the dark ages of the world?—Why Jemima, I suppose, you think you will me, what the dark ages were?"—The ages before gas was invented.

Sergeant Cockle, a rough, blustering fellow, and well known on the northern circuit, once got from a witness more than he bargained for. "Pray, sir, right of fishery, he asked the witness, "Don't you love fish?"—"Ah," replied the witness, with a grin; "not I unless like Cockle sauce with it."

A CHOICE OF A JURY.—A certain sea-captain who had been accustomed to sail in vessels with officers and the cook aboard his vessel, were once to be tried for an offense committed on board his own vessel; a nature as put their lives in some jeopardy. The cook displayed every mark of fear and apprehension for his safety. The captain, on the contrary, stood in very good spirits, and said, "I, sure up, mate; why should you be cast down? I fear nothing, and why should you? Why, I'll tell you what, I'll get rejected the fellow, "I should be as courageous as you are if we were to be tried by a jury of cooks."

HORSE TOOK having challenged Wilkes, who was then sheriff, received the following laconic reply: "Sir, I do not think it my duty to risk the existence of every despicable that may be tired of his life; but as I am at present the sheriff of the city of London, it may happen that I shall shortly have an opportunity of attending you in my official capacity at the place of execution, where if it that you shall have no ground left to complain of my endeavors to serve you."

VEILED BEAUTIES.—The King of Dayrels is much averse to ladies wearing veils in the streets, and frequently stops those who have their veils down to adjust them strictly to it. The other day there was a great assemblage with three ladies in the street which heavy his name, and in which he had a lady very much in love with, but of each one, and hying it on the top of her bonnet in a way suitable to the artistic fancies of the days of Schwantzhaber and the friend of Thorwaldsen. He then let them proceed, and, of course, all the veils were down as soon as he was out of sight. It seems King Ludwig once exposed himself in the midst of a crowd Mexican veils. He lifted the veil of an old lady, looked at her face, and dropped it instantly, saying, "Ah, pardon, I thought it was Egypt."

In a certain English parish, a Quaker barber received the other day a note for church-rates, five shillings and sixpence at your service," and upon the clergyman of the parish, and said,

"Pray, friend, what does this mean by this note?"

"Mean! Why, it is for the church-rate; don't you see?"

"Yes, friend; but what is that for?"

"Why, for the repair of the church, and for the maintenance of the clergyman, to be sure."

"Well, friend, but what have I to do with that? I don't attend the church."

"Oh, that can't signify; the church is always open, and you may go when you please; and, besides, you go to the law, and you must pay."

"Well, friend, I am willing to tell thee that I think that a very unjust law that obliges me to pay a ministry and a church which I never attend. Therefore I will not pay."

A few days afterward the barber, by way of straightening accounts with the person, sent his reverence a note: "Mr. Barber to Timothy Shears, for shaving and hair-cutting, five shillings and six-pence." The receipt of this note by the person very quickly brought him to the shop, in no good humor either.

"What do you mean by sending me this bill? You never cut my hair nor shaved me in your life!"

"Nay, friend, but I assure you my shop is always open, and it's thine own fault if thou dost not come to be shaved."

SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH declared that the next thing ever said of physics was a physician. One day, when asked by a lady if he believed in them, replied, "No, madam, I believe too many for believers in them."

THE GHOST OF THE WORK.—Said a man to a little boy, strutting up Broadway with his dinner-basket, "Boy, what's your name?"—"My name is Bill Jones, sir."—"My boy, you would look better with bread-and-butter in your mouth than with that cigar."—"I know it," said the urchin, "but it would not be half so glorious."

TWO passengers were conversing in a railway carriage said of physics was a physician. One, when asked by a lady if he believed in them, replied, "No, madam, I believe too many for believers in them."

WHAT HURTS THE MOST.—It is not the tanning that "gets the 'ores," said a philosophic hostler; "it's the tanning 'ginger;' it's the 'hamering,' 'sawing,' 'hammering over a nail 'ighway;' it 'urts 'is 'ooves. When you're not go-ing to 'ard, 'ire a 'ack and 'amper along with 'im."

"Madam, a good many persons were very much disturbed at the concert last night by the crying of your baby."

"Well, I do wonder such people will go to concerts."

THE STORM LIKES.—"Coachman," said an outside passenger to the master of the Dover Mail, on the cover one of the most mountainous roads in the country, "I suppose you have no consideration for our lives and limbs?" "What are your lives and limbs to me?" was the reply. "I am behind my time."

WOULDN'T TELL A LIE FOR THE SAKE OF A PUDDY.—The following dialogue is reported between two boys: "What do you think? my father, the other day, shot nine hundred and nine-ty-nine pigeons with one barrel of his gun." "Oh, why didn't he say a thousand at once?" (Reply puzzled.) "Do you suppose my father would tell a lie just for the sake of one pigeon?"

THE MAYOR'S NEST.—There is a good anecdote told of Bobbie Johnson, who, in the year 1703, was Provost of Dundee. His services being required on a certain occasion, a messenger was dispatched to his house, upon asking for the Provost, was told by the goodwife that he was "awa' to the wine hill for a bottle o' white." Off scampered the gallant to the "white hill," not over the Provost appeared, his charming eyes like lynx, pulled off his bonnet, and wiping the sweat from his bald pate, said, "Mayor, your servant, I am sent to tell ye that the guse hasna' laid an egg since ye left the house." "Is it, indeed?" quoth the Mayor, "then I'll be home in a minute. Depend upon it, you may rest unconcerned."

What piece of carpentry becomes a goss as soon as it is finished?—A-gate.

A bachelor good-girl is acquainted with all rocks except rock the cradle.

"Matchless misery" has been defined to be having a cigar and nothing to light it with.

Artists may not be guilty of direct falsehoods, but they frequently give false colors.

THE WELSH PARSON.—A friend was staying with a Welsh parson, and heard him preach in the afternoon.

"By Jove," said he, "there was good in your sermon. I didn't think you—there was good in your sermon.

"Is it would be old if there was not," said the preacher. "It was one of my father's."

"Bishop Bull'ck, was it?" Well, now, you surprise me. I have read Bull'ck, and I have read Tillotson, but I never agree it.

"Oh," says the other, "you don't know how I manage. I have two services—one in Welsh, one in English. Well, I translate the Welsh sermon into English on Sunday, and then I am safe; my Welsh flock don't read Butler. Then I make my Welsh sermon translate it into Latin after that the old boy himself would not know them again."

A Frenchman who had learned English wished to be particularly polite, and never neglected an opportunity of saying something pretty. One evening he observed to a lady, whose dress was of the colored, and that of her daughter pink, "Madam," said he, "your daughter is the pink of beauty."

"Ah, Monsieur, you Frenchmen always flatter," said the lady.

"No, Madame, I only do speak the truth," said he, "and what all the world will allow, that your daughter is the pink, and you, madame, are the dried pink."

It was with great difficulty the Frenchman could be made to comprehend this mistake.

A young, quiet, sensible, good-looking country lass was asked what she thought of "smiling and smoking." "Well," was the reply, "smiling is pleasant enough; but I would like no man to be a smoker."—"Why?" was immediately asked. "Because," was the reply, "my father comes home every see cross, as same as he gets the pipe lights and begins a blast he's a pleased again."

TWO PHILOSOPHICAL RIDDLES.—How is it possible to proceed in the direction of the sun without the sun? By walking from the forward to the aft part of a vessel while steaming.—What is the center of gravity? The letter V.

An epigram should never be extended to eight lines. Four lines ought to be the ne plus ultra; if only two or three the better. Of the following extract from a gentleman, whose daughter Arabella importuned him for music:

"Dear Bob, to gain money, sure silence is best,
For about as much music as Arabella's a jest."

INTELLIGENCE ON THE ROAD.—A gentleman on a stage-coach, passing through the city of Bristol, and observing a handsome edifice, inquired what the new building it was. The driver replied.—"It is the Unitarian Church."—"Unitarian!" exclaimed the gentleman, "and what is that?"—"I don't know," said John, "but I believe it is in the opposition line."

Stammering, says Coleridge, is sometimes the cause of a pun. Some one was mentioning in Lamb's presence the odd-sweetness of the Duke of Cumberland in preventing the duchess from going to the window to see the sun, whom she had not seen for a considerable time, and insisting on her seeing the Duke.

"How horribly cold it was!" said the narrator.

"Yes," said Lamb, in his stuttering way, "but you know he is the Duke of Cu-cum-ber-land."

An old gentleman went out to shoot partridges accompanied by his son. The latter was charged with the duty of up the muzzle, and when at last the old gentleman started some birds, he was very much surprised on attempting to see some fun, of course; but not so did it happen, for the gun recoiled with such force as to knock him over. The old man got up, and while rubbing the sparks out of his eyes, inquired of his son, "Dick, did I point the right end of the gun to the birds?"

OLD SNARLE.—"Look here, old fellow, how's this? That strawberries were out of season? Make licker taste good, don't they?"

BAD TIMERS.—Strawberries, why there ain't any strawberries in yet plenty. It's only the reflection of pye-nose pye-sea in yer licker!"

Etiquette requires that in Chinese conversation each should compliment the other, and every thing belonging to him, in the most laudatory style, and depreciate himself, with all that belongs to him, to the lowest possible a pitch. The following is no exaggeration, though not the profuse style in which it would be rendered: "What is your magnificent appellation in Wenge." "Where is your magnificent residence?" "Your most contemptible hut is called?" "How many are your illustrious children?" "My vile, worthless little dog is called Fido." "I know it," said the unenlightened pagan. "My mean, good-for-nothing old woman is well."

WHO ARE WE TO-DAY?—Two old ladies, known to be of the same age, had the same desire to keep the real number concealed; one therefore used always upon a New Year's Day to go to the other, and say, "Madam, I am come to know how old we are to be this year."

A WARNING TO SHOPKEEPERS.—It is said that in some parts of Turkey whenever a shopkeeper is convicted selling a falsehood his house is at once pulled bleeds to remain on for one month. If there was such a law in force in this country, what a noble and gloomy appearance some people's houses would present!

No man can avoid his own company—so he had best make it as good as possible.

MR. RAREY, THE HORSE-TAMER, IN NEW YORK.

EVERY one has heard of MR. RAREY, the horse-tamer, whose exploits in Europe created such a sensation. We have on several occasions illustrated MR. RAREY's performances, and in No. 84, published August 7, 1858, we gave a full account of his method. MR. RAREY is now in New York giving exhibitions. His first exhibition took place on January 8th at Niblo's.

The stage at Niblo's was converted for the time into a sort of stable-yard, strongly walled with boards on three sides, and with ropes toward the audience. Before MR. RAREY made his appearance the famous horse CRUISER, who was trained in England by him, was introduced into this inclosure. MR. RAREY then came forward and said:

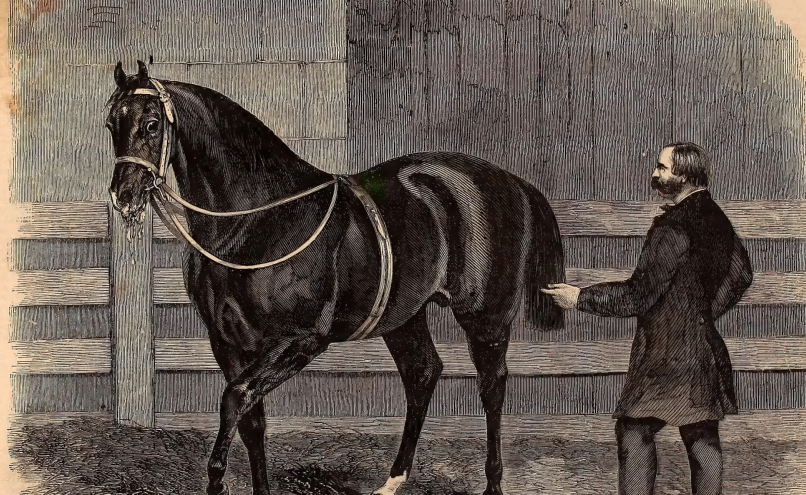
"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I have here to-day several subjects upon which I will endeavor to explain my system. I placed them upon him by letting a rope down through the roof of his stall, fastening it under his neck, and raising him off his fore feet. This is the first time he has been on the stage in this country. We have had no rehearsal; but instead of kicking, as he used, he will now (as you see) give me his foot like a gentleman."

MR. RAREY and his subject walked several times round the inclosure, and finally came to a standstill, when, taking a couple of leather straps from his pocket, RAREY said,

"These two straps are all that I used to tame this horse."

A moment, and one of the straps, dexterously placed upon the fore leg, reduced the quadruped to a tripod. The second strap was as quickly looped around the other fore foot, and drawn through the belly-band. Cruiser took a step forward, MR. RAREY pulled the second strap, and the animal was on his knees to his master, who fell beside him, and, rising, began pulling his head backward and forward. Up jumped Cruiser like mad, and quickly with his head between the horse's heels. As he did this he said:

"I am just as sure that he will not kick me as that a stone will not of itself fly up and strike me. Why should he? He will not unless he gets angry, and I shall not that immediately. At my first exhibition before the Queen and Prince Albert, after experimenting with an unbroken colt and a very vicious horse, the riding-master asked if I would try a very nervous horse. I said certainly, but that I had already detained them over two hours. They asked me how long I should take. I said fifteen minutes. The Queen said she would give me half an hour, and the party would walk about till then. None of them then knew my system; so I went into the box where the horse was, and in less than fifteen minutes had the animal under control. When I showed it to the party all were astonished. Prince Albert, thinking that I used some powerful drug, asked if the horse had the use of its legs. I replied that no means had been used to deprive the animal of its faculties, and made the horse get up. Subsequently I performed before them four times. See, I place this horse's foot upon me. There is no danger. He would no more tread heavily upon me than a mare upon her foal."



MR. RAREY AND CRUISER—"CRUISER, SHAKE HANDS!"

When I went to England and exhibited there the papers all said, 'This is very well, but try Cruiser.' I immediately wrote to Lord Dorchester about the horse, and he replied that the horse could not be brought to me, but that I must come to him. I did go to him. The horse had not been out of his box for three years; a brick stable had to be built for him, and he would have been shot but he was the last of a race of splendid blood-horses, and his owner was anxious to preserve him if possible. I found that by his biting and kicking he had so injured himself that he could not be taken out of his box, and so I had to wait for his recovery. I went down to see him quietly and unknown, but somehow the papers got hold of it, and every body said that I dared not go near Cruiser. Under this I had to remain three weeks, and then I was able to take him to London. I will now show you Cruiser."

Cruiser is a large, bony horse, over sixteen hands high, and of immense bone and muscle. His color is a very dark bay, with white spots on the head and feet; he looks the English thoroughbred all over, and, with kind treatment, may prove a great acquisition in this country.

"There," said MR. RAREY, exhibiting them, "are the reins and straps which Cruiser used to wear. They as a flash MR. RAREY crawled out of danger. Before the frightened stable boys could run away RAREY had his horse again at the footlights, and, pointing to a graze upon Cruiser's hip, said:

"In coming over the horse injured his hip, and is unusually restive and ill at ease. You see he will not allow himself to be dragged about. I have not laid hands on him before, except when I took him from his box, since we left the Crystal Palace, London. I will not detain you longer with him, as I have several other untamed horses ready."

The next horse introduced was a "hard and nervous puller"—an animal of the Messenger blood. By gently fondling his head and caressing him, MR. RAREY succeeded in making him follow him round the arena. He led him by a straw. He then, fastened a strap round his fore leg so as to make him limp on three legs, and finally kneel. When the second strap was attached, a struggle ensued, which ended in the horse lying down. MR. RAREY sat on him, took off the straps, knocked the horse's feet together, rubbed them against his face, and lay down upon him.

The next subject was a wild horse from South America, which threw MR. RAREY several times, plunging, rearing, and biting with every sign of rage and fury. On his leg, too, MR. RAREY attached the fatal strap, and after a struggle of prolonged duration, he, too, was thrown, and MR. RAREY was upon him. After rising up and sitting down again on the horse's back several times, in order to accustom the horse to the sensation, MR. RAREY raised him up, and concluded his remarks on the animal's back. He said:

"It is entirely wrong to leap upon a horse's back and hold fast, no matter how frightened he may be. There is now a perfect understanding between us. All beasts like me after this process. They all come to me gladly. This is the test of breaking: if they fly away from you, then know you have treated them badly; if they come to you, they know you as a friend."

The last horse tested was a vicious stallion owned by MR. LUFF of Harlem Lane, and named "Jo Anderson." The struggle with this horse was brief but fierce, and he was down, and MR. RAREY was on his back. He rose again after a few moments, and was again forced down. As he had the reputation of biting, MR. RAREY struck his jaws together until the horse seemed to realize that they did not belong to him; then he put his arm in his mouth without accident. In closing the lecture MR. RAREY said:

"I have never had an accident since I became perfect in my system, and I don't fear any. I have been among horses since I was twelve years old, and at first had a great many accidents. Every limb has been broken except my right arm; but being young when these accidents happened, the bones fortunately healed strongly. Now I know horses' every thought, and can break any animal, of whatever age and habits, in the world. I can make any animal sensible of my power—make them gentle and even affectionate."

On Tuesday MR. RAREY gave another exhibition, and introduced Cruiser to the audience. He said:

"Cruiser was about as celebrated for his viciousness as I have been for taming him. Noblemen used to go and throw articles into his brick box in order to see him fight. I was asked to explain the other evening how I approached Cruiser, and with your permission I will do so. I think a horse have a reason for every thing they do. I know if I approached Cruiser with a stick he would fight me, as he had fought others who came to whip him. In the box was a double door, so that I could open the upper half. I went quietly; opened the door accidentally. Cruiser turned round, saw me, started back frightfully, but did not attempt to come at me. Cruiser came slowly up to smell of me after a while, and, in spite of Lord Dorchester's entreaties, I stood still. Presently, when I saw that he stood naturally, I began to fondle him. Lord Dorchester begged me to tie his head, and I did so, but you never saw such fighting. Finding that he would either kill himself or tear down the box I released him, and began all over again. After he allowed me to fondle him, I took him into the straw-yard, and proceeded as with any other horse, until at last he would let me take any liberty with him, and Lord Dorchester mounted him with impunity."

Cruiser then gave MR. RAREY his foot, like a gentleman, and was then withdrawn; MR. RAREY stating that he had had a little private conversation with the horse, and that it had begged him not to drag it about till its side was healed.

One of the horses of the Second Avenue Railroad was then sent in, with the following note:

"NEW YORK, Jan. 7, 1861.

"MR. J. S. RAREY.—The mare I send you is a very bad kicker, and strikes with her fore feet. No one is able to go into her stable. She is very treacherous, and gives no warning. If you can tame her your system is good for any horse."

The Herald reporter thus describes how she was tamed:

"When the horse appeared upon the stage it was a tough-looking customer enough. A regular car-horse—thin, wiry, dirty, stubborn, vicious, evil-eyed. It has not been shod except with all its feet tied, and then with difficulty. Every time Rarey touched it the horse kicked most savagely. First one little strap was tied on, however, and then another. The horse fell easily, as it had been used to be thrown thus to be shod. But when the straps were taken off, and Rarey began his familiarities, however, then came the tug of war. It was kick and bite, scathe and fardle, get up and fall down, until at last the poor car-horse succumbed to kindness. Rarey's head lay between those formidable hoofs; Rarey's hand unbossed the bridle which had not been removed for months; Rarey played blacksmith, and hammered at the shoe without any difficulty, and curing the last bit of restlessness by turning the horse round and round a while. Rarey led off the subdued old equine hog with as much complacency as if biting and kicking had never been known. The owner sat beside our reporter, and his surprise—he knew the horse so well—only outran that of the audience."

On Thursday, 10th, Mr. Rarey experimented on Peacock, a very savage brute, which seems to possess every vice. The New York Times says of the experiment:

"The collar which he had round his neck had not been removed for a great length of time. He was a dangerous horse to look at, with a switch tail that seemed to bid defiance to the world. Mr. Rarey placed his hands upon him. The contest occupied some time, for Peacock possessed pluck as well as endurance, but at length he had to succumb."

LADY SEAMER'S ESCAPE.

A LOVE STORY.

MISS DULCY DIGBY had at last won what she had been begging and praying for all the days of her life—that is to say, all the days of her life since she was wise enough to realize her mother's theory—that it is the first duty of a poor, well-born, highly-educated young lady to marry a man of good family, of good fortune, and of any other good which nature might have made incidental to the bargain.

Sir John Seamer had proposed to her, and she had accepted him.

It was in the drawing-room, after a state dinner party; and, when the momentous transaction was accomplished, the gentleman went over and talked to her mother. Dulcy stood leaning against the piano, turning over her music. Mr. George Milner approached her and spoke; she answered him confusedly, and with the tears in her eyes. Dulcy was not a lachrymose person, and what had occurred flashed upon him immediately.

Dulcy Digby and he had been great friends once upon a time (once upon a time was about four years ago), but George was even poorer then than now, and she was ambitious and did not use him well. He remembered the miserable pain she had made him suffer, and though he was radically cured of that wound, which had not even left a cicatrice, he had not forgiven her. He did not address her a second time, but turned away with a remorseful generosity. He had first loved and then hated her. When she would have aroused her leisure with him again, he mortified her. Now he was indifferent; she had lost her power of fascinating him. If he had seen the man in the moon courting her he would not have cared.

The same can not be said for Dulcy. George was a generous, sensible, affectionate, lovable man—if he only could have gratified her grand desire. Mere's the pity, George could not. He could only give her a genuine love and admiration, a share of his younger son's moderate allowance, and a venture in his Bank of Hope. Dulcy preferred certainties and securities, and she refused him at her peril—refused him with much misgiving and reluctance, and a pain, the permanence of which she had yet to learn. She had a certain tenderness for George which his persistence might have blown up into a flame of devotion; but her suitor lacked patience and humility, and withdrew altogether. So her chance was lost—her best chance, as I view it. And now, season after season had slipped away, until she was turned of four-and-twenty, until, possibly in the just fulfillment of her destiny, Sir John Seamer, whom she neither loved nor respected, was talking confidentially to mamma, and Dulcy was answering George Milner with the tears in her eyes. There was no pin for those tears—but she had got what she craved most. It behooved her to look triumphant and to feel triumphant, but somehow the mood would not come. Perhaps, in the moment of elation, her heart was sorer than it had ever been since she refused George, and by-and-by found out that he had quite ceased to love her. As he came ever away from her she perceived that he had understood her dignified position, and that he despised her for having attained to it. But it was too late to care for that now—Sir John finished his brief colloquy with her mother, and returned to her side with the assured, jubilant air of an accepted lover. Then George was tempted to watch her. He saw her smooth her brow and summon reluctant smiles; but finding the problem above all, rather dismal, he took leave of his hostess and walked away house, smoking a cigar. All sentimental reminiscences of Dulcy disappeared with the vapor, and when he reached his chambers he was his own man again completely.

After the great event of the evening Mrs. Digby could not be sorry to see her guests depart, and, by eleven o'clock, the house in Curzon Street was cleared of them all—even of Sir John Seamer himself—and Dulcy was shut up with her mamma in that pretty retirement called the boudoir. With a softness quite unusual to her, Dulcy had stolen one arm round her mother's waist, and was resting her brow against her shoulder. The confession had been made, the successful daughter had been kissed and blessed abundantly, and still Dulcy kept that firm yet caressing hold upon her mother, as if she had yet more to say. Presently it came.

"Mamma, I do not want it to be talked about until quite the time; I am not proud of it, you know."

"My love, half the world will envy you."

"Let them envy. But remember, I will not hear it talked about. You are not even to tell Lady Milner."

"But, sweet, it must be known. Sir John will speak of it himself. Lady Milner is one of the oldest friends of his family."

"I tell him to say nothing, and he promised me he would not—not, at least, until we got down home again, and then I shall take care. There is nobody at Wexham to make this sad worry."

"You look at it in a very strange light, Dulcy. There is nothing to be ashamed of in Sir John, or in being mistress of Netherlop—such a beautiful romantic place! I am sure it will be one of the proudest days of my life when I give you to him."

Dulcy shuddered from head to foot. "I was sure you would wish it," said she bitterly.

"My dearest, I have always your good at heart. But come, you are feverish and excited; I shall see you and bed to-night myself, and to-morrow all will look gay and promising."

So Mrs. Digby led her daughter to her room, and performed for her tender nursing offices, such as she had never put her hand to since poor Dulcy was ill of the scarlet fever, and would let no one else touch her. She understood, in part, the girl's sudden revulsion of feeling; but she knew that it would wear off, and believed that it had better not be expressed. When Dulcy's head was on her pillow she received her maternal benediction, and left her. As Dulcy was quite alone, and no spy peered into her chamber, we have no actual evidence that she passed half the night in miserable tears; but this is very probable, for she was unit to appear at breakfast the next morning, and for two days nobody called at the house saw her, not even Sir John Seamer.

When she reappeared, it was to find that her urgent plea for secrecy had not been respected, and to receive the congratulations of friends, envious, surprised, curious, and compassionate, with a serenity which struck nobody with so much wonder as it struck herself. Any light or frivolity which she had tried to retain about her fate was completely dissipated, and she saw her future very distinctly when her Lady Seamer of Netherlop, wife of Sir John Seamer, the wealthiest landowner in the county, a man passionately fond of her, likely to command her with a devotion and indulgence her heart could desire, mentally and morally her inferior, but not evil-spoken of by his class, though not much looked up to either; a position many young women would have embraced with triumphant delight—which had often, in fact, been secretly coveted by herself. That was, when it was seen through the illusion of distance and improbability; nearer at hand, its colors were far more sombre than attractive.

She knew a good deal about Sir John Seamer, and she knew all the particulars of his disastrous family history, which people spoke low about when they spoke at all. Netherlop was but about four miles from Avenham, where she had been brought up by her mother, and in a country neighborhood, gossip—especially romantic gossip—is the current coin of domestic society. Dulcy liked to hear her nurse tell of the curse of the Seamers, who had driven the sons from Netherlop centuries ago, and got wrongful possession of their estates, which had never brought them luck, but only murder, disgrace in battle, early death at home, or a driveling old age; and then the whispered stories which her words by asking, with awful solemnity, who lives in the high-walled garden on the edge of the park, where nobody ever passed by from year's end to year's end?—who but Sir Reginald Seamer, who had been Bedlam-mad since his marriage almost—nay, some folks said before it? His one son had been cashiered from the army for cowardice, and was living obscurely somewhere abroad, and his grandson reigned with his frigid mother in the old hall alone. All this was happening when Dulcy Digby was a girl, and she heard whispers of it, as children do; and when John came to Avenham to play with her brothers she used to watch him timidly from a distance with a suspicious fear, lest the curse of his people might also have fallen on him, and that he might suddenly spring at her and strangle her.

But all this nonsense faded from her mind as she grew up to womanhood. The high-walled garden lost its mysterious interest, and the mysterious tablet to his memory appeared on the chancel wall of Netherlop Church; then the disgraced son died in a drunken gambling-house brawl at Hamburg, and John became Sir John, a young man of importance in his county by reason of his large landed property, if for nothing else. He was about three-and-twenty then, and not ill-looking—far from it. He had a frame of vast muscular power, and a bronzed, bold face, rather unusually good-tured in its ordinary expression, but with certain indications, nevertheless, that he did, now and then, give himself up to a fit of passion, and suffer himself to be carried away by paroxysms of brutal rage. The servants, when he was a boy, used to give awful accounts of him, but as he grew up open-handed and generous to a proverb, they forgave him rough words, and contented themselves with shaking their heads when alluding to him, and saying he would be very bad a Netherlop master."

Sir John was just out of mourning for his mother when he made his proposal to Dulcy Digby. He had been living at Netherlop, and Lady Seamer detested Mrs. Digby as a scheming woman on the look-out to entrap an unwary heir for her numerous family, and had forbidden her mamma in that pretty retirement called the boudoir. With a softness quite unusual to her, Dulcy had stolen one arm round her mother's waist, and was resting her brow against her shoulder. The confession had been made, the successful daughter had been kissed and blessed abundantly, and still Dulcy kept that firm yet caressing hold upon her mother, as if she had yet more to say. His one son had been cashiered from the army for cowardice, and was living obscurely somewhere abroad, and his grandson reigned with his frigid mother in the old hall alone. All this was happening when Dulcy arranged that when the London season in town closed they should go abroad for a few months, and Lady Seamer had expressed great pathos at meeting with other wandering friends, when Sir John one night suddenly informed her that on the morrow she must prepare to go down to Netherlop; he was tired of London, and he was not in the humor for traveling.

Lady Seamer ventured to ask why? He told her (this it was like will), and that was enough. She acquiesced with a beautiful meekness, and it must have been a terrible fear that had brought Dulcy Digby to that pass of submission: but she said afterward, in confidence to her mother, "I dare not oppose him; it would be more than my life is worth even to plead with him; when he is in one of his passions he is capable of killing me, and I believe he would be no more responsible for it than a savage would be. Those days and nights of horrible, sickening terrors I went through last winter I can never tell you! I have wished myself dead many and many a morning."

This was what she had exchanged the chance of love and happiness with George Milner for! She had fine houses and fine equipages, costly jewels and many friends; but a husband whom she could only compare to a savage animal, and with whom she existed in terror of her life. Fear had rendered her very tractable; observing persons noticed how she deferred to Sir John's wishes, consulted his opinions, and watched his eye if it might be possible for her to divine his desire before it was expressed; and thoughtful persons said she was much to be pitied, and her mother was much to be blamed, and that Sir John Seamer would come of it, but that really they should not at all like to be in Lady Seamer's place, even for twice the pomp and splendor for which she had sacrificed herself.

During the third week in June Sir John and Lady Seamer went down thus unexpectedly to Netherlop, and there was a dreadful time returning to her house at Avenham. It was a country neighborhood, where the gentry had for the most part only carriages and horses, and therefore lived at home nearly all the year round. The arrival of the Seamers at Netherlop was therefore a gratification, and while the summer lasted they were made the object of numerous dinner-parties, picnics, and water-parties without end. Lady Seamer thankfully encouraged these moderate dissipations as a relief from the misery of her life, and keeping Sir John in good humor; the last depending now on a continuous effort which it was most strenuous and painful for her to have to make alone. People began to whisper that Lady Seamer led a life far from enviable with "that surly brute" her husband; but Sir John Seamer was known home again in October, his mother had twenty ugly stories to tell him of what was said to be going on at Netherlop.

But it was no concern of George's any more; Dulcy had chosen her own lot, and must abide by it. He was a barrister, and, perhaps, the wrongs and miseries which he saw done to him; he was very sorry, of course, but he had nothing more to say. Dulcy's brothers were angry with their mother for having encouraged the match, but obviously that could do no good; and as for a separation (which was suggested), there was no absolute cruelty to allege, and the law would have come forward to claim protection, which she would not; in fact, when questioned by any one except her mother, she systematically and intimately denied that she had any ground of complaint against Sir John; but the servants' tongues were free to wag, and they wagged to a very different tune.

During the autumn months Netherlop was filled with constant relays of guests; and when the shooting season was over and the hunting began, Sir John's house was kept unceasingly busy, and less time to annoy his wife, which was fortunate; for during the month of December Lady Seamer paid a visit to one of her friends, during which there were all the ordinary rejoicings.

The winter months passed away to the middle of March without any outbreak from Sir John of more than average ferocity; but about that time George Milner came down into the country on a visit to his friends in company with whom he called at Netherlop. Sir John was out; but the visitors saw Lady Seamer looking handsomer than ever, in great spirits, and with a color quite capable of being an ill-used wife. Lady Milner said it was all put on. She half seen Dulcy frantically clutch at the corner of her to keep a veil over her wretchedness with the world in general; it did not mend matters to make them the gossip of the neighborhood.

For three weeks past there had been dry weather and a parching east wind, which was blowing keenly over the hills as Lady Milner and her son drove away from Netherlop. Its carriage stood at the fine old mansion perched above the Nethercliff, below which roared and boiled the Loup, tumbling from ridge to ridge of its rock, all white with foam and spray. Seen from the road, the house appeared in some parts almost to overhang the precipice, but there was really a terrace of some twenty feet in width between the walls and the cliff above the Loup; a very agile and surefooted man could even descend to the bed of the torrent by clinging to the bushes and springing to projecting ledges on the face of the rock, but it was a very hazardous feat, and not one that was often attempted. The situation was picturesque in the highest degree, with its mingling of wood and water, gray cliff and green turf; but whether it was worth having the price Dulcy had paid for it, George could not determine. That night, when Mrs. Digby was about to retire to bed, less at ease in her mind now than she used to be on those maxims of worldly wisdom in which she had trained her daughter, she put aside the curtain from the window to look out, as her custom was, toward Netherlop. It was full moon, and the bare outline of the hills was distinct, even the Netherlop hills, three miles away: and with a high, still tempered by a lurking hope that matters would grow more harmonious there by-and-by, she dropped the drapery and betook herself to her bed.

In the dead of the night she was awakened by a cry below her window, "Mamma, mamma!" and then the house-bell rang as if pulled by a terrified tremulous hand, and the agonized voice rose again, "Mamma, mamma!" Mrs. Digby thought for a moment that she was the victim of a horrible nightmare, but that was simply because she had heard a scurry of feet, and by the time she had got out upon the landing the door was being hastily opened below, and her old servant, who had lived with her ever since her own marriage, exclaimed, in accents of awe and amazement,

"Lord bless my heart upon us, Miss Dulcy! but you must be stark staring mad to ha' run across the country a night like this, and nothing on but your night-clothes and the blessed light o' Goodness grant you ha' not both gotten your deaths!" And trembling as if she had the palsy, Mrs. Digby tottered down the stairs and received in her arms the form of her daughter, who hugged her vehemently, exclaiming,

"Oh, mamma, we are safe, we are safe!" in hysterical sobs of terror and thankfulness.

By this time all the household was assembled, and the women, in sympathetic sorrow, got the poor young creature and her child into a warm room and bathed her bleeding feet. The old nurse and Mrs. Digby listened to her spasmodic complaints and exclamations, and heard the case as well as they could. Dreadful shivers ran through and through her frame, and sometimes her words were lost in wild thirst for water. She was seized with sudden frenzy; but they were true enough.

"He swore he would kill me," was one of these revelations; "he has said so often before; but tonight I know he meant he would, and I waited until the house was still, and then I thought I would get away; but he had fastened my door on the outside, and there was only the window, and while I was listening and thinking, I heard a crackling in the corridor, and I knew he had begun to curl in at the crevices, and there was a smell of fire. So I took up baby and put a blanket over him; he screamed, poor mite, as I let down over by the great old ivy bushes on the tower. Oh, mother! and I got down by the Loup and over the water."

"Eh, Lady Seamer, but that was a long step, but the angels helped you, surely!" cried her nurse. But Lady Seamer had to have to make alone. People began to whisper that Lady Seamer led a life far from enviable with "that surly brute" her husband; but Sir John Seamer was known home again in October, his mother had twenty ugly stories to tell him of what was said to be going on at Netherlop.

But it was no concern of George's any more; Dulcy had chosen her own lot, and must abide by it. He was a barrister, and, perhaps, the wrongs and miseries which he saw done to him; he was very sorry, of course, but he had nothing more to say. Dulcy's brothers were angry with their mother for having encouraged the match, but obviously that could do no good; and as for a separation (which was suggested), there was no absolute cruelty to allege, and the law would have come forward to claim protection, which she would not; in fact, when questioned by any one except her mother, she systematically and intimately denied that she had any ground of complaint against Sir John; but the servants' tongues were free to wag, and they wagged to a very different tune.

During the autumn months Netherlop was filled with constant relays of guests; and when the shooting season was over and the hunting began, Sir John's house was kept unceasingly busy, less time to annoy his wife, which was fortunate; for during the month of December Lady Seamer paid a visit to one of her friends, during which there were all the ordinary rejoicings.

The winter months passed away to the middle of March without any outbreak from Sir John of more than average ferocity; but about that time George Milner came down into the country on a visit to his friends in company with whom he called at Netherlop. Sir John was out; but the visitors saw Lady Seamer looking handsomer than ever, in great spirits, and with a color quite capable of being an ill-used wife. Lady Milner said it was all put on. She half seen Dulcy frantically clutch at the corner of her to keep a veil over her wretchedness with the world in general; it did not mend matters to make them the gossip of the neighborhood.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, January 7, in the Senate, a petition was presented for a National Convention to meet in Philadelphia on 4th March, to consider the present state of affairs, or submitting the Crittenden resolutions to the people. Senator Crittenden spoke at length in compromising vein, followed by Senator Toombs, who made a war speech.——In the House, after some preliminary business, Mr. Curry, Cobb of Alabama and Etheridge of Tennessee, the General Appropriation Bill was passed with an amendment appropriating $135,000 for a national post-office. Mr. Adrain, of New Jersey, spoke at length in favor of the resolution to thank the bold and patriotic act of Major Anderson in evacuating Fort Moultrie and occupying Fort Sumter, and pledging the House to adopt such measures as may be recommended measures to enforce the laws and preserve the Union. After an interchange of views by Mr. Clingman, Mr. Barr, Mr. Pryor, of Kentucky, for a withdrawal of the resolution, a vote was carried on a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, and resulted 124 for and only 62 against suspension. The resolution was then put upon its passage, and carried by 134 votes, while only 55 were cast against it.

On Wednesday, in the Senate, the President's Message on the agitated condition of the country was read, and Senator Crittenden obtained leave to introduce to Senator Davis, who made some remarks on the South Carolina Commissioners' correspondence, and leave of absence. After the bold and patriotic act of Major Anderson in evacuating Fort Moultrie and occupying Fort Sumter, and pledging the House to adopt such measures as may be recommended measures to enforce the laws and preserve the Union. The resolution was then put upon its passage, and carried by 134 votes, while only 55 were cast against it.

On Wednesday, in the Senate, the President's Message on the agitated condition of the country was read, and Senator Crittenden obtained leave to introduce to Senator Davis, who made some remarks on the South Carolina Commissioners' correspondence, and leave of absence. On motion of Senator Bigler, of Pennsylvania, the Message was referred to a special committee of five, with power to investigate every thing pertaining to the present difficulties, and with liberty to send for persons and papers. There was strenuous opposition to the appointment of a committee, but it was thrown by a vote of 123 against 62. The House subsequently went into the Committee of the Whole on the Civil and Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, but rose without debate, and adjourned over to Monday next.

On Thursday, 10th, Senator Slidell, of Louisiana, called up a resolution offered by him on Wednesday, encouraging the President for appointing a Secretary of War at once, to give confidence to the people. After debate, a vote was taken on its passage, and the result was 25 for and 17 against. Senator Davis, of Mississippi, then proceeded to make a speech on the state of the Union. When he had concluded, a resolution was offered by Senator Crittenden with the Special Committee of Thirty-three, and declared his disappointment with the action of that committee. He despaired of any good being effected through their deliberations, but seemed the House that if another week was allowed to elapse it would be too late for the introduction of any measure to save the Union. Various memorials and other papers relating to the national troubles were presented and laid on the table for the present, among them the resolutions of the New York Common Council, approving the conduct of Major Anderson and the determination of the President to enforce the laws. The House then proceeded to the consideration of District of Columbia business, but transacted without any thing.

On Friday, 11th, in the Senate, Senator Hunter, of Virginia, on the present condition of affairs in the country. He was followed by Senator Durkee, of Iowa.——In the House, Mr. Looney, of Illinois, asked leave to offer a resolution recommending the President to confer temporarily upon General Scott the power of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, with a charge to see that the Republic receives no detriment. Objection was made, and no action was taken on it. The House, then, after the consideration of private bills, passed the Civil and Miscellaneous Appropriation bill, and adjourned.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

The Special Message of President Buchanan in reference to the present agitated condition of the country, and particularly regarding the recent action of South Carolina, was on 9th sent to Congress. The Message was prepared immediately on the departure of the South Carolina Commissioners from Washington, and the President has endeavor to induce the Administration to surrender the Forts in Charleston Harbor to the new State. But the most important feature of the document is in reference to the exercise of the federal power in the execution of the Federal property. The President says there is no alternative but to Coercion, the reverse of which is, that the subject the public property so far as practicable under existing laws. The right and duty to use the military and naval forces against those who illegally annul the Government are clear and indisputable; but he says that the present state of things revolutionary, and beyond Executive control, and hence he asks for wide popularity of action by the sovereign upon Congress, which alone has the power to declare war, or to recover a property lost by a defective title or war. He therefore appeals to Congress to take some measures to quiet the public mind, by the passage or retention of the 34 36' 30' Compromise line as calculated to produce a real result. He alleges, as a reason for the Executive not having recommended to Major Anderson, that such an action would have furnished the pretext, if not the provocation, for assault upon the forts, and that Congress and at the same time admits that Fort Moultrie has been attacked which Anderson could not prevent, and possibly more than sixty hours.

THE HOUSE PEORIAN COMMITTEE.

The House Special Committee of Thirty-three have closed their deliberations, and will probably soon be ready to report. The two propositions submitted by Mr. Davis, of Indiana—that have been posted to the States from armed invasion, and for the relief of citizens of the several States while traveling or sojourning in other States—were the two principal points. The proposition was not formally previously adopted, provided for the admission of New Mexico by the amendment of the Constitution. Mr. Lee, giving a brief by jury at the place of escape, and requesting Northern States to repeal the Personal Liberty Laws, and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will make it impossible ever hereafter to amend it so as to interfere with Slavery in the States.

THE TEXAS COMMITTEE.

The select treason committee of the House has been named by the Speaker, as follows:—Alabama, Mr. Curry, Republican; Hickman, of Pennsylvania, Republican; Dawes, of Massachusetts, Republican; John Cochran, of New York, Democrat; Branch, of North Carolina, Democrat.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE SOUTH CAROLINA COMMISSIONERS AND THE PRESIDENT.

The correspondence between the South Carolina Commissioners and President Buchanan appears in the papers. It consists of three letters, the first dated December 28, from the Commissioners to the President, in which they demand, as a preliminary to all negotiation, a disapproval by the President of the act of Congress, and that Sumter, Fort Sumter, the second, dated December 30, from the President, in which, while admitting that the Commissioners acted without express orders, he yet refuses to repudiate the act; and the third, dated January 1, in which the Commissioners attempt to refute the allegations of the President's letter, in which he justifies his own official conduct. This last letter the President returned to the Commissioners with the following indorsement on its back: "This paper, just presented to the President, is of such a character that he declines to receive it."

CABINET CHANGES.

Since our last several changes have been made in the Cabinet. Secretary Thompson, of the Interior, resigned on 8th; he has not been replaced. Secretary Howard Thomas resigned, and was succeeded by John A. Dix, of New York. Mr. Holt continues to act as Secretary of War.

WHY MR. THOMPSON RESIGNED.

The following correspondence has been published:

"WASHINGTON, January 3, 1861.

"SIR,—It is with extreme regret I have just learned that additional troops have been ordered to Charleston. This subject has been frequently discussed in Cabinet Council; and when, on Monday night, 31st December last, the order for reinforcements to Fort Sumter were unanimously and distinctly understood that no such order of the kind would be made without being previously reconsidered in Cabinet Council. At less than on Wednesday, January 2, this subject was again discussed in Cabinet, but previously to the meeting of Council, and the War Department was not justified in ordering reinforcements to Charleston. Under these circumstances I have left my resignation with the President, this morning, for the first time, that the steamer Star of the West sailed from New York on Saturday night with two hundred and fifty men, under Lieutenant Brooke, destined for Fort Sumter. Under these circumstances I feel myself bound to resign my commission, as one of your Constitutional advisers, into your hands. With high respect, your obedient servant,

"J. THOMPSON.

MR. BUCHANAN READILY ACCEPTS IT.

"WASHINGTON, January 7, 1861.

"SIR,—I have received and accepted your resignation, as you have left the office of Secretary of the Interior.

"On Monday evening, 31st December, 1860, I suspended the order which had been issued on the 29th by the War Department to send the Brooklyn with reinforcements to Fort Sumter, and the Star of the West with the same troops. I stated to you my reason for this suspension, which you have, from its nature, would be kept confidential in consequence of your request, however, I promised that this order should not be executed without being previously considered and decided in Cabinet.' This promise was faithfully observed on my part. In order to carry it into effect I called a special Cabinet meeting on Wednesday, Dec. 26, January, 1861, in which the question of sending reinforcements to Fort Sumter was amply discussed by yourself and others. The decided majority of opinions was against the policy of reinforcing the garrison of the South Carolina 'Commissioners' to my communication to them of 31 in January we received and read, the moment of my decision much indignation among the members of the Cabinet. After this had been read, I proposed to read the following language: 'It is now all over, and reinforcements must be sent.' Before I had time to utter another word, however, that after this letter the Cabinet would be unanimous, and I would not have had time to read it. The next and issue of the letter left no doubt on my mind that Fort Sumter would be immediately attacked, and under the necessity of sending reinforcements there without delay.

"While your views on Wednesday, January 2, this subject was again discussed in Cabinet, you say, 'but every mind on conclusion was reached, and the War Department was not justified in ordering reinforcements without something more than was then said.' You are certainly mistaken in alleging this 'no conclusion was reached.' In this your recollection is entirely different from that of your four oldest colleagues in the Cabinet. Indeed, my language was so unmistakable that the Secretaries of War and the Navy proceeded to act upon it without any further intercourse with myself than what you heard or might have heard me say. You had been so emphatic in opposing these reinforcements that I thought you would resign in consequence of my decision. I deeply regret that you have been unwilling to act with me in this matter. I believe honestly mistaken. Still it is certain you have not the time been mistaken.

"Yours, very respectfully, JAMES BUCHANAN.

"Hon. JACOB THOMPSON."

SECESSION OF MISSISSIPPI, FLORIDA, AND ALABAMA.

The Mississippi State Convention on 9th adopted an ordinance providing for immediate secession from the Union. Reports from Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, confirm this. The ordinance was seceded by 62 to 7. On 11th, Alabama seceded by 61 to 39.

UNION ADDRESS OF THE GOVERNOR OF MARYLAND.

Governor Hicks has published an address to the citizens of Maryland, giving his reasons for refusing to convene the Legislature. It indicates alarm of the American, and abounds in the most emphatic Union sentiments. The following are extracts:

"I firmly believe that a division of this Government would inevitably produce civil war. The secession leaders in South Carolina, and the fanatical demagogues of the North, have aided and abetted each other in the work of evil and no man of reason, in my opinion, can question it. Shall could the Legislature do this end? Is this evil, which will move the present troubles which beset the Union? We have been deprived, by the action of the South Carolina Convention, that neither the election of Mr. Lincoln nor the non-execution of the fugitive slave law by any State could be pleaded, constitute their grievances. They declare that the real cause of difficulty dates back as far back as 1850. Maryland, and every other State in the Union, with united voice, then declared the cure insufficient to justify the course of South Carolina. Even the Union men, who then unanimously supported the cause of General Jackson, will not justify secession for the causes now so modern Secessionists. I have been told that the position of Maryland should be defined. I think her position can understand it. Do any really understand her position? Who's that which I have already said in my letter of 11? Action of the Legislature would be simply to declare that Maryland is still in favor of the Union as it was, that the demands from the North the repeal of offensive, unconstitutional statutes, which she has not, is conscientious; that she will wait reasonable time for the North to change her statute laws, and for justice to her Southern brethren, and if her appeals are vain, will make common cause with the South. I believe that the Legislature would, if need be, it would only be saying what the whole country well knows, and which may be said much more effectually by the people themselves in their elections. But if the Legislature should eighteen months since, when none of the present complications existed, declared that the Personal Liberty Law is a conservative Southern State still know who know any thing of her people or her position. Her Legislature is of cultured citizens—planters, merchants, mechanics, and laboring men—there is not a class in the State which is represented who would be forced to pay the taxes and do the fighting. Are they more than those who stand by the Government to extend politicians, many of whom, having nothing to lose from the destruction of the Government, are ever to receive some gain from the ruin of the State. Such men will unjustly denounce the Legislature the editors of this 'secured Union,' which their allies at the South have nominated a 'covenant with hell.'

"The people of Maryland, if left to themselves, would decide, with scarcely an exception, that there is nothing in the present cause to justify a dissolution of the Union, secession; and yet, against our judgments and solemn protestations of the people of the Southern States in this revolution, because South Carolina thinks differently. Are we prepared to go with her in consequence of her decision? After we have solemnly declared for ourselves, as every man must do, that there is no cause for secession, besides to those of another State, and the effect, may be to inaugurate a civil war between the States, are we prepared to go with her in consequence of her decision? After we have solemnly declared for ourselves, as every man must do, that there is no cause for secession, besides to those of another State, and the effect, may be to inaugurate a civil war between the States, are we prepared to go with her in consequence of her decision? Are we bound to obey her commands?

"The people of Maryland are not implicated in this scheme to overthrow the Legislature will spare no pains to carry their point. The whole plan of operations in the event of the assembling of the Legislature is laid out. Their emissaries already marked out, the list of Embassadors who are to visit the other States, and the list of the Commissioners which they hope will be passed by the Legislature, fully empowered to act in the emergency which is to be already prepared.

"In the course of nature I can not have long to live, and I fervently trust to be allowed to end my days a citizen of a free State. But how should I be able to submit to witness the downfall of that Government inherited from our fathers, established by the valor and wisdom of the old God, I will at least have the consolation, at my dying hour, that I withdraw by word or deed assisted in hastening its disruption.

THOMAS H. HICKS."

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

Governor Letcher's Message, alluding to the condition of the country, says that the State of Virginia is prepared if imminent, and all true patriots are exerting themselves to save us from threatened danger. He says the only question in his last Message for a convention of all the states, and says: "It is unnecessary for me to say that I have not destroyed merely because men can not agree about a definite limitation. Disruption is inevitable, and of confederations are to be formed we must have the best guarantees for security. Virginia will not secede, but, if she does, she denies the unity action of South Carolina, which has taken her destinies entirely into her own hands. She has no official reference to her course and he not been invited to do so by her late Commissioners, who have gone home to Carolina. The non-invalidating States are chargeable for the present condition of affairs by their course. Under these circumstances I feel myself bound to resign my commission, as one of your Constitutional advisers, into your hands. With high respect, your obedient servant,

The Mississippi State Convention on 9th adopted an ordinance providing for immediate secession from the Union. Reports from Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, confirm this. The ordinance was seceded by 62 to 7. On 11th, Alabama seceded by 61 to 39.

UNION ADDRESS OF THE GOVERNOR OF MARYLAND.

Governor Hicks has published an address to the citizens of Maryland, giving his reasons for refusing to convene the Legislature. It indicates alarm of the American, and abounds in the most emphatic Union sentiments. The following are extracts:

"I firmly believe that a division of this Government would inevitably produce civil war. The secession leaders in South Carolina, and the fanatical demagogues of the North, have aided and abetted each other in the work of evil and no man of reason, in my opinion, can question it. Shall could the Legislature do this end? Is this evil, which will move the present troubles which beset the Union? We have been deprived, by the action of the South Carolina Convention, that neither the election of Mr. Lincoln nor the non-execution of the fugitive slave law by any State could be pleaded, constitute their grievances. They declare that the real cause of difficulty dates back as far back as 1850. Maryland, and every other State in the Union, with united voice, then declared the cure insufficient to justify the course of South Carolina. Even the Union men, who then unanimously supported the cause of General Jackson, will not justify secession for the causes now so modern Secessionists. I have been told that the position of Maryland should be defined. I think her position can understand it. Do any really understand her position? Who's that which I have already said in my letter of 11? Action of the Legislature would be simply to declare that Maryland is still in favor of the Union as it was, that the demands from the North the repeal of offensive, unconstitutional statutes, which she has not, is conscientious; that she will wait reasonable time for the North to change her statute laws, and for justice to her Southern brethren, and if her appeals are vain, will make common cause with the South. I believe that the Legislature would, if need be, it would only be saying what the whole country well knows, and which may be said much more effectually by the people themselves in their elections. But if the Legislature should eighteen months since, when none of the present complications existed, declared that the Personal Liberty Law is a conservative Southern State still know who know any thing of her people or her position. Her Legislature is of cultured citizens—planters, merchants, mechanics, and laboring men—there is not a class in the State which is represented who would be forced to pay the taxes and do the fighting. Are they more than those who stand by the Government to extend politicians, many of whom, having nothing to lose from the destruction of the Government, are ever to receive some gain from the ruin of the State. Such men will unjustly denounce the Legislature the editors of this 'secured Union,' which their allies at the South have nominated a 'covenant with hell.'

"The people of Maryland, if left to themselves, would decide, with scarcely an exception, that there is nothing in the present cause to justify a dissolution of the Union, secession; and yet, against our judgments and solemn protestations of the people of the Southern States in this revolution, because South Carolina thinks differently. Are we prepared to go with her in consequence of her decision? After we have solemnly declared for ourselves, as every man must do, that there is no cause for secession, besides to those of another State, and the effect, may be to inaugurate a civil war between the States, are we prepared to go with her in consequence of her decision? After we have solemnly declared for ourselves, as every man must do, that there is no cause for secession, besides to those of another State, and the effect, may be to inaugurate a civil war between the States, are we prepared to go with her in consequence of her decision? Are we bound to obey her commands?

"The people of Maryland are not implicated in this scheme to overthrow the Legislature will spare no pains to carry their point. The whole plan of operations in the event of the assembling of the Legislature is laid out. Their emissaries already marked out, the list of Embassadors who are to visit the other States, and the list of the Commissioners which they hope will be passed by the Legislature, fully empowered to act in the emergency which is to be already prepared.

"In the course of nature I can not have long to live, and I fervently trust to be allowed to end my days a citizen of a free State. But how should I be able to submit to witness the downfall of that Government inherited from our fathers, established by the valor and wisdom of the old God, I will at least have the consolation, at my dying hour, that I withdraw by word or deed assisted in hastening its disruption.

THOMAS H. HICKS."

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

Governor Letcher's Message, alluding to the condition of the country, says that the State of Virginia is prepared if imminent, and all true patriots are exerting themselves to save us from threatened danger. He says the only question in his last Message for a convention of all the states, and says: "It is unnecessary for me to say that I have not destroyed merely because men can not agree about a definite limitation. Disruption is inevitable, and of confederations are to be formed we must have the best guarantees for security. Virginia will not secede, but, if she does, she denies the unity action of South Carolina, which has taken her destinies entirely into her own hands. She has no official reference to her course and he not been invited to do so by her late Commissioners, who have gone home to Carolina. The non-invalidating States are chargeable for the present condition of affairs by their course. Under these circumstances I feel myself bound to resign my commission, as one of your Constitutional advisers, into your hands. With high respect, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON.

This promise was faithfully observed on my part. In order to carry it into effect I called a special Cabinet meeting on Wednesday, Dec. 26, January, 1861, in which the question of sending reinforcements to Fort Sumter was amply discussed by yourself and others. The decided majority of opinions was against the policy of reinforcing the garrison of the South Carolina 'Commissioners' to my communication to them of 31 in January we received and read, the moment of my decision much indignation among the members of the Cabinet. After this had been read, I proposed to read the following language: 'It is now all over, and reinforcements must be sent.' Before I had time to utter another word, however, that after this letter the Cabinet would be unanimous, and I would not have had time to read it. The next and issue of the letter left no doubt on my mind that Fort Sumter would be immediately attacked, and under the necessity of sending reinforcements there without delay.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

The Special Message of President Buchanan in reference to the present agitated condition of the country, and particularly regarding the recent action of South Carolina, was on 9th sent to Congress. The Message was prepared immediately on the departure of the South Carolina Commissioners from Washington, and the President has endeavor to induce the Administration to surrender the Forts in Charleston Harbor to the new State. But the most important feature of the document is in reference to the exercise of the federal power in the execution of the Federal property. The President says there is no alternative but to Coercion, the reverse of which is, that the subject the public property so far as practicable under existing laws. The right and duty to use the military and naval forces against those who illegally annul the Government are clear and indisputable; but he says that the present state of things revolutionary, and beyond Executive control, and hence he asks for wide popularity of action by the sovereign upon Congress, which alone has the power to declare war, or to recover a property lost by a defective title or war. He therefore appeals to Congress to take some measures to quiet the public mind, by the passage or retention of the 34 36' 30' Compromise line as calculated to produce a real result. He alleges, as a reason for the Executive not having recommended to Major Anderson, that such an action would have furnished the pretext, if not the provocation, for assault upon the forts, and that Congress and at the same time admits that Fort Moultrie has been attacked which Anderson could not prevent, and possibly more than sixty hours.

THE HOUSE PEORIAN COMMITTEE.

The House Special Committee of Thirty-three have closed their deliberations, and will probably soon be ready to report. The two propositions submitted by Mr. Davis, of Indiana—that have been posted to the States from armed invasion, and for the relief of citizens of the several States while traveling or sojourning in other States—were the two principal points. The proposition was not formally previously adopted, provided for the admission of New Mexico by the amendment of the Constitution. CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE SOUTH CAROLINA COMMISSIONERS AND THE PRESIDENT.

The correspondence between the South Carolina Commissioners and President Buchanan appears in the papers. It consists of three letters, the first dated December 28, from the Commissioners to the President, in which they demand, as a preliminary to all negotiation, a disapproval by the President of the act of Congress, and that Sumter, the second, dated December 30, from the President, in which, while admitting that the Commissioners acted without express orders, he yet refuses to repudiate the act; and the third, dated January 1, in which the Commissioners attempt to refute the allegations of the President's letter, in which he justifies his own official conduct. This last letter the President returned to the Commissioners with the following indorsement on its back: "This paper, just presented to the President, is of such a character that he declines to receive it."

CABINET CHANGES.

Since our last several changes have been made in the Cabinet. Secretary Thompson, of the Interior, resigned on 8th; he has not been replaced. Secretary Howard Thomas resigned, and was succeeded by John A. Dix, of New York. Mr. Holt continues to act as Secretary of War.

WHY MR. THOMPSON RESIGNED.

THE STEAMSHIP "STAR OF THE WEST."

THE FIRST OF THE WAR.

WE publish herewith pictures of the United States steam-sloop Brooklyn, of the steamship Star of the West, and of the steamship Marion, which three vessels figured so prominently in the movements of last week; and on page 37 we give a large plan of Charleston harbor, showing the forts, etc., together with a view of Fort Johnson. These pictures will enable our readers to realize what is going on in this most memorable contest of the present age.

On Wednesday morning, January 9, 1861, the first shots were fired. At daybreak on that morning the steamship Star of the West, with 250 United States troops on board, attempted to enter the harbor of Charleston for the purpose of communicating with Fort Sumter. The people of Charleston had been warned of her coming and of her errand by telegraph. They determined to prevent her reaching Fort Sumter. Accordingly, as soon as she came within range, batteries on Morris Island and at Fort Moultrie opened on her. The first shot was fired across her bows; whereupon she increased her speed, and hoisted the stars and stripes. Other shots were then fired in rapid succession from Morris Island, two or more of which hulled the steamer, and compelled her to put about and go to sea. The accompanying picture shows the Star of the West as she entered Charleston harbor; the plan will explain the situation of the forts, and the position of the steamer when she was fired upon. The channel through which she passed runs close by Morris Island for some distance.

Fort Sumter made no demonstration, except at the port-holes, where guns were run out bearing on Morris Island.

About eleven o'clock A.M. on 9th a boat from Fort Sumter, bearing Lieutenant Hall with a white flag, approached the city. Lieutenant Hall had an interview with Governor Pickens, and was afterward escorted to his boat and re-embarked for Fort Sumter. The communication from Major Anderson was as follows:

MAJOR ANDERSON TO GOVERNOR PICKENS.

"To His Excellency the Governor of South Carolina:

"SIR,—Two of your batteries fired this morning on an unarmed vessel bearing the flag of my government. As I have not been notified that war has been declared by South Carolina against the United States, I can not but think this a hostile act, committed without your sanction

THE STEAMSHIP "MARION," SEIZED BY THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA TO BE CONVERTED INTO A MAN-OF-WAR.

THE UNITED STATES SLOOP OF WAR "BROOKLYN."

ce authority. Under that hope I refrain from opening fire on your batteries. I have the honor, therefore, respectfully to ask whether the above-mentioned supplies, which I believe without parallel in the history of our country or any other civilized government—are committed in obedience to your instructions, and notify you, if it is not disclaimed, that I regard it as an act of war, and I shall not, after reasonable time for the return of my messenger, permit any vessel to pass within the range of the guns of my fort.

"In order to save, as far as it is in my power, the shedding of blood, I beg you will take due notification of my decision for the good of all concerned. Hoping, however, your answer may justify a further continuance of forbearance on my part, I remain, respectfully,

"ROBERT ANDERSON."

"Governor Pickens, after stating the position of South Carolina to the United States, says that any attempt of United States troops into Charleston harbor to reinforce the forts would be regarded as an act of hostility, and in accordance with that any attempt to reinforce the troops at Fort Sumter, or to retake and resume possession of the forts within the waters of South Carolina, Major Anderson abandoned after spiking the cannon and doing other damages, can not be regarded by the authorities of the State as indicative of any intention but that coercion of the State by the armed force of the Government.

"Special agents, therefore, have been off the bar to warn approaching vessels, armed and unarmed, having troops to reinforce Fort Sumter of the fact, and to order the harbor. Special orders have been given the commanders at the forts not to fire on such vessels until a second arrives their hero should warn them of the prohibition of the State. Under these circumstances the Star of the West, it is understood, this morning attempted to enter the harbor with troops, after having been notified she could not enter, and consequently she was fired into. The act is perfectly justified by law.

"In regard to your threat about vessels in the harbor, it is only necessary for me to say you must be the judge of your responsibility. Your position in the harbor has been tolerated by the authorities of the State, and from the act of which you complain is in perfect consistency with the rights and duties of the State, it is no perceived how far the conduct you propose to do can find a parallel in the history of any country, or be reconciled with any other purpose than that of your government imposing on the State the condition of a conquered province.

"I. W. PICKENS."

To His Excellency Governor Pickens:

"SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, and say that, under the circumstances, I have deemed it proper to refer the whole matter to my Government, and intend deferring the course I indicated in my note this morning until the arrival from Washington of such instructions as they receive.

"I have the honor also to express the hope that no obstructions will be placed in the way, and that you will permit the ferry of giving facility for the departure and return of the bearer, Lieutenant T. Talbot, who is directed to make the journey.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant, ROBERT ANDERSON."

Lieut. Talbot left Charleston accordingly for Washington, without hinderance by the authorities.

The picture on page 37 will convey to the beholder some idea of the work going on at Fort Johnson, on the nearest extremity of James Island to Fort Sumter. In the event of an attack upon that Fort from the shore, Fort Johnson would most naturally be the principle point from which the attack would be made. At present it is hardly a fortified point, there being nothing but a few barracks and a few store-houses to certify to its military character. But the Charleston papers state that men are busily engaged in throwing up earth-works and batteries there.

STEAMSHIP "MARION."

The steamship Marion, 800 tons burden, of the New York and Charleston line, was seized by the State authorities of South Carolina on 10th, to be converted into a vessel of war. She was built here by Jacob Bell, and was launched on February 3, 1851. At the time of her capture she was commanded by Captain Sam Whiting.

STEAMSHIP SLOOP OF WAR "BROOKLYN."

The Brooklyn is at present hourly expected at Charleston, and may take an active part in any future contest at that point. She was launched at New York on the 27th of July, 1858, and took her place on the navy list of the 4th of August, 1860. She is by far the largest sloop of war in our navy, or in the world, and carries the heaviest battery ever placed on the deck of any vessel of her class; yet she only draws 16 feet water. Her length on deck is 247 feet, breadth of beam 43 feet, depth of hold 24½ feet, being 2000 tons government measurement; and is rated at 14 guns on the navy register, although pierced for 24 9-inch shell guns and two 10-inch pivot guns, the weight of each being nearly six tons. Her 9-inch and most combings on this deck are of mahogany—a wood never before used for such a purpose in our navy. All the spare spars required, together with three boats, are carried upon a bridge amidships, elevated above the deck sufficiently high to walk under, which is an entirely new arrangement. By this improvement the space upon deck is kept clear and unobstructed for working the guns. Her entire complement is about 1000 men. The captain's cabin occupies the space of 25 feet in length at the after end of this deck. The boilers are Martin's patent, now generally adopted in the naval service. Her propeller is of composition, 14 feet 6 inches in diameter, and weighing 13,500 pounds. It is arranged for hoisting on deck when not needed, and can be taken out of water by means of a capstan, arranged for the purpose, in less than two minutes. She is spurred precisely like sailing vessels of similar tonnage in the merchant service, her screw being merely an auxiliary affair. Her speed is estimated at ten knots under steam.

A BRANCH FOR A CHRISTMAS-TREE.

THE mean stairs of the tenement-house rattled and creaked with the steps of late risters; all the foot-worn boards sprang again with the tread of loutish men that stumbled through the damp, ill-lighted halls of the house No. 600 and odd Fourth Street.

With the cap of Fortunatus on I saw what I relate.

In one meagre, garret room of the house aforesaid sat, on a Christmas-Eve, a lady and a child. I knew she was such by her voice, manner, and gesture, in spite of the mean garb which covered her. She worked upon a sewing-machine. All the fittings of the room said poverty: for they were the remnants of a once fine suit of furniture. A handsome bureau and a cheap chair eyed each other askance; the chair with ill-concealed plebeian contempt frowned upon the bureau, and it with lofty indifference held itself high above its neighbor. Will only? The child sat upon the floor, carried in its case. The child sat upon the floor, with its tiny legs crossed outside its dress; in its hand it held a stocking.

"Shall I hang it up, mamma?" she asked.

I thought from where I stood that mamma had not heard her; for she kept on working until a long, and the machine stopped its clicking. The little Yankee clock on the mantle, interpreting the lady's thoughts, struck every second, "Be quick!" "Be quick!" "Be quick!"

"Shall you hang it up, my child? Yes, indeed you shall, though Heaven alone knows who will fill it. What indeed is left to us in the world?"

She fell into a reverie, and thoughts of other Christmas-Eves, past and gone, were running in her head. She saw the gay parlor of her father, and stirred upon the floor; its red lips moved convulsively, which the mother seeing, caught the baby up and hushed it to her bosom until it fell asleep. When she saw this was accomplished she put the child upon the bed, hung the red stocking by the mantle, and filling her shawl on went out.

With the cap on I followed.

When the close air of the corridors was passed we came to the open air among the lights and the throng of dirt, but riotous by reason of the anniversary of the dear Christ's birth. I thought, and the lady thought, that even the gas-lamps burned brighter and the stars shone. I know that the snow shining more brilliantly than ever, and that the white beams they scintillated through the cold air were only the rays of the Star of the East which rose near upon that night. Carefully threading our way, we went toward the Bowery. All the living tide of people was setting in that direction; and rows of humanity upon the walk; all their pockets were plethoric; all their baskets ran over; all the sweet-voiced bells of Christmas chimed vividly in the faces of the populace: for, as I knew, and the people knew, they had forgotten care, and were careless. Lights, lights, lights! Lights burning in each window where toys were for sale, where all the wondrous people of fairy-land had their abiding places. In some shops there were great trees with such wealth of gifts about upon them of every kind that I looked about to see the trap-door, and the ring with the magician above; for surely we were in Aladdin's cave. Some were already upon the counter and entered one of these little stores. The lady, after looking all about, purchased a doll and some sweetmeats, and, with a heavy heart, drew her purse to a dollar. She put it down with a sigh, and was going away. There were many people in the store, and among them a handsome woman with a fur collar to his cloak. He saw the look and action of my companion, and motioned the shopkeeper to give it her. She took it with a surprised look of gratitude, and left the store. I followed behind.

I should have known it was Christmas-Eve by this gentleman's action.

As we wended our way with swift steps homeward I heard the sound of feet pursuing us. The lady looked back and I also. We saw a man in a fur collar coming down the street after us: when we stopped, he also stopped; as we loitered, he also loitered: his acts were the counterpart of ours. I had thought to doff my cap and render assistance if need be; but he never came any nearer, and we walked on. As we turned the last corner but seven up and the place where the child lay quietly sleeping we both looked back: in the bright starlight the Fur Collar was coming down the street at a swinging pace: intelligent, he also landed in the door, just to see the Fur Collar turn the corner and discover her retreat. What evil thoughts had he masked under that fur collar?

Then I pondered; can this be Christmas-Eve?

Panting and breathless the lady gained her room; she looked at the child, and laid her head on her shoulder; it lay so softly in its rest, with one idle arm of ivory over its face to ward off the world and life, that I wished I too were a baby asleep upon Christmas-Eve. Afterward the lady took the sewing-machine and put it away in a corner; then the doll and sweetmeats were placed in the stocking and hung over the mantle; then she undid first all upon them on waking; then going to the bureau she took from thence a miniature, and gone were and faded her tears.

If I had been visible to mortal eyes then I should have been seen in a corner with folded arms and gathered brow closely watching. This was what the lady said:

"It is no harm to look upon your face now, dear Walter; it is no sin, since my husband is gone. Oh, why did you not come before I was sold, and take me to your heart as you promised?"

Why, indeed? I said to myself, and peeped over her shoulder. A sweet, young man's face, full of kind light in the eyes and altogether most noble-featured.

The lady reached and took up the letters with tender care—how old and how silent the room and the world were then! I thought I heard the beatings of her heart as she read the love-words of ivory breast. I surely saw her bodice vibrate. All the fluttering leaves of the sacred epistles fell apart, and with their white lips told me her tale.

I saw there the record of a sorrowful, disappointed life; I saw the accomplishment of an unequal and unhappy marriage, because without love; I saw the long, long days she watched and waited for the tarrying bridegroom; and, finally, the reluctant assent to the sacrifice of all hopes. Then I saw a gap in the volume and the burial of the husband, the surrendering of house and home to pay debts; and, finally, the cap of Fortunatus, which I wore, brought me back to the room where we were and the daily tenor of this lady's life.

"Twelve long years (she spoke again)—twelve long years, and no sign of him ever yet gladdened my heart." Then looked to where the child lay, and said, "This is not his."

The wells in her heart afforded such bounteous store of sensibility that they ran over after eyes.

"What a change it is, and what a life I lead!" she spoke once more. "Who could have thought that in twelve short years these things could have come to pass?" I went to the window and looked out: the cap was not water-proof and betrayed my eyes. As I live I saw the Fur Collar in the street, pacing up and down, and glancing occasionally at the window. Still the woman sat in thought.

It was late in the night when the streets were silent, and the city dead and dumb. Alone in the wide world, we two kept watch and communion; then my companion suddenly put away the letters and picture, and drew out the machine to work upon, but by the aid of the cap the task was completed. She bent over it unmindful. "I must have done it in a dream," she said, and would not be satisfied until it had been thoroughly pulled.

I looked out at the window again, but the streets were silent and deserted. The man with the Fur Collar has given it up and gone away," I said. The lady kneeled and made her devotions. In the firmament, which I saw through the pane for a little while the cap. As she arose I heard footsteps on the stair; they came nearer and nearer, and I thought my heart stopped. A hand knocked at the door for admittance. The lady started in fear—looks were at hand to save from danger: she trembled, but, with the courage of a child, mustered courage to approach the door and say,

"Who is there?"

There came the answer back, "A friend."

"I am alone, friend, and can not let you in. What do you wish?"

"To come in," said the friend.

At the sound of the voice she gave a start and made an effort to breathe: she unlocked the door instantly, her face as white as stone.

It was the Fur Collar and a domino on.

If the lady had had any vitality left she would have shrieked out, but all manner of contending emotions left her powerless to do so. I prepared to take off the cap, but the Fur Collar had taken off his domino, and I saw the face of the patriarch who had married the lady. She still sat fainting when he disclosed his face: he bent tenderly over and kissed her into animation. When she was alive he told her that the reason of his not coming years ago to fulfill his word. He said that he had been cast away, and unable to reach his home until the present time; that he had escaped to California, and there made his fortune, all but that he knew of her marriage, and but for her situation would never have seen her again, and might have searched for her in vain. She was overcome again in the toy-shop. Then the lady fell to upbraiding herself for her faithlessness in not keeping her vow; but he told her she could have none of it. He told her she was forgiven, if she would now fulfill it.

The lady said she would.

The lady and the Fur Collar sat long in quiet talk afterward: they sat so long that I heard a cock crow, and saw the eye of day unclose in the east. I was about to awake and catch at its treasure with a ringing laugh.

Then I knew for a surety that Christmas had indeed come.

A CHAPTER ON THE PHRENIE.

A BEAUTIFUL morning; a delicious breeze tempered by touches of the mild-summer sun; a boundless wilderness of prairie afforded a rich feast for the eye—which did not, however, satisfy the earnest protest of our lank and famished stomachs. Yet, like the accumulating rays of brilliant-colored verdure lay concealed the treacherous sloughs.

"These sloughs," said Lanky, "make me think of a girl I once lived and wanted to marry, but didn't. You see she was handsome, and knew it; had any quantity of lovers, but somehow allowed me to make love to her, and by giving me to understand that I was the one. All at once she up and married another fellow, leaving me in a slough as I, ha, ha! I wonder how I ever got out! Since that I never see a pretty woman without thinking of the poor devils she has left floundering in the slough of gilded lovers, and hoping that after I've had eaten the apple the old Serpent had ended the trouble by swallowing her. Whoa! whoa!"

Rip! splash! bang! A shower of mud and water. The shafts broke into splinters; down went the whiffle-trees. The horse rearing and plunging, sinking deeper and deeper into the soft, oozy, black mire. My hat had not landed to the right, and had thoughtlessly driven into the Big Slough!

"Gee! gee!" cried Lanky. "Turn around and drive back."

Easier said than done. The struggling horse was down, and both thills broken short off. Lanky jumped, caught the bit in the reins, and finally got his face in the soft mud. I was more successful. Seizing the horse by the bits, I have a very indistinct recollection of going through a series of gymnastic and equestrian performances never equaled by the champions of the saw-dust arena. I turned impossible somersaults, made unknown leaps, stood upon my head one moment, lay upon my back the next, rolled over the horse, rolled under the horse, swung round his head like a whip-lash, my feet cutting down the tall grass in swaths equal to those made by a first-rate mower, and all this upon a carpet of mire wherein the horse at times sank almost out of sight.

At last I somehow reached dry land, still clinging to the bits, where I was joined by Lanky, who, as he scraped the mud from his face, hair, and whiskers, said,

"What the devil am I going to do? Mud from head to foot, and not a clean rag to put on! I'm in a pretty pickle! Look here! I've torn the seat clean out of my pants!"

"Never mind that now," said I. "Mount the horse, ride back to the cabin where we staid last night, and tell the old man to come here with his oxen and help us get out the wagon!"

Lanky galloped off instanter.

I waded back to the wagon, and sat down. I was too cross, wet, muddy, and hungry to think or care about my thing in particular. I only desired the speedy return of Lanky.

Sitting thus, and broiling, broiling in the hot, red-hot rays of the sun, a century (so it seemed) must have passed, when, greatly to my relief, a man, with horse and wagon, came in sight, leaving off toward the north upon the ridge we should have followed. That, too, trotting along so nicely, I was envious of the team and driver, and —down went the fore wheels of his wagon, snap went the axle, the horse sprang clear of the harness and ran off like the wind, the traveler turned a somersault over the dash-board, landing upon his head.

That traveler was undoubtedly astonished—I am sure I was; but no opportunity was given to express my feelings or go to his assistance. As I turned to jump from the wagon I saw two men, with a team, at a stand-still about a quarter of a mile to the south, shouting and gesticulating as though addressing an assemblage of politicians upon the political issues of the day. They were in a bad predicament, in the middle of the Big Slough.

I shouted and waved my hat. They shouted and waved their hats. But alas! I could not understand them; they could not understand me. At length one of the men left the wagon and panuloons, and commenced wading toward me. That man will ever have a distinct recollection of that quarter-mile hour. It was a weary while. I sank sinking nearly to his waist, slipping here and falling there, he staggered up to the wagon, panting and blowing, and looking as though in a state of perspiration—as most dismal-looking specimen of a man.

"I say, friend," gasped he, "I'm a hard-looking customer just now, but I never said the odds and lock too! We have had a sweet old time, t'other side of this slough. Had to leave our wagon—axle broke, by the way—and a team a-top spot, and there we are! Can you help us any?"

I explained my situation to the man, and advised that we should be the reinforcements came up. He assented; and we stood ourselves watching the other traveler, who had recovered from his astonishment, and was now "pegging" away toward the shore after the runaway team.

Soon came Lanky with the old man and his oxen. We immediately commenced work—and such work! In three hours we were on terra firma of the slough. As it was then late in the afternoon, we reluctantly concluded to favor the old man with our company for another night.

We were a sorry-looking assemblage. The poorest rag-picker would have turned up his nose at our old clothing. Our faces, our hands were incrusted in black mud, which, having dried and cracked, gave us the appearance of a damaged lot of Congo negroes.

During the remainder of the day torn clothes, broken harnesses, fractured wagons, and mud furnished plenty of employment. We expatiated in glowing terms and vigorous language upon the beauties of a prairie country, especially in a wet season. At supper our potatoes were boiled in a kettle in which Lanky was wont to wash the old lady wash her feet, the night before. We ate them, however, with a keen relish. We were too hungry to be over-fastidious about trifles.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC.

By CHARLES LEVER.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

RESPECTABLE reader, there is no use in asking you if you have ever been in the Hotel of the "Balance," at Constance. Of course you have not. This is rather presumptuous. Look of John, nor otherwise known to fame. It is an obscure hostel, only visited by the very humblest wayfarers, and such poor objects of wretchedness as are fain to pick up a trickle-bed and sup meanly. Vaterchen, however, spoke of it in generous terms. There was a certain onion soup he had tasted there which the mere flavor had not yet left his memory. He had seen, besides, the most delicious schweine fleisch hanging up from the rafters, which he would have been revealed to him in a dream that a solvent traveler might have rashers on demand.

Poor Lanky! he had not the most idea of the eloquence he possessed till he came to talk on these matters. From modest and distrustful, he grew bold and confident, and the hesitation of speech was replaced by fluent utterance and a rich vocabulary; and he repeatedly declared that though the exterior was unprepossessing, and the service generally homely, there were substantial comforts obtainable which far surpassed the resources of more pretentious houses. "I can see served on newer, it is true," said he; "but newer is a rare material to impart relish to a savory mess." Though we should dine in the kitchen, he gave me to understand that even in this there were advantages, and that the polite guest of the salon never knew what it was to taste that rich odor of the "roast," or that fragrant incense that stemmed up from the luscious stew, and which were to cookery what bouquet was to wine.

"I will not say to you, honored Sir," continued he, "that in the mixed company which frequent such humble hearths there would be matter of interest or amusement; but to a man like myself these chance companionships are delightful. Here all are strangers, all adventurers. Not a man that deposits his pack in the corner and draws in his chair to the circle but is a wanderer and a pilgrim of one sort or other." He drew me an amusing picture of one of these groups, wherein, even without telling his story, each gave such insight into his life and travels as to present a sort of drama.

Whether it was that my companion had drawn too freely on his imagination, or that he had fallen on an unfortunate moment, I can not say; but though we found the company at the Bad once numerous and varied, there was none of the sociality I looked for, still less of that generous warmth and good greeting which he assured me was the courtesy of such places. The men were chiefly couriers, with their portmanteaux and heavy wagons, bound for the Bavarian Tyrol. There was a sprinkling of Jew peddlers, on their way to the Vorarlberg; a deserter from the Austrian army, trying to get back to Hesse Cassel; and an Italian image carrier, with a green parrot and a well-filled purse, going back to finish his days at Lucca.

Now none of these were elements of a very exalted or exclusive rank; they were motley and all of them taken from the very base of the social pyramid; and yet, would it be believed that they regarded our entrance among them as an act of rare impudence.

A more polished company might have been satisfied with several heads or cold looks; these were less equivocal. They called out to the landlord to know if he expected any gipsies; another, affecting to treat us as solicitors for their patronage, said he had no license to have on buffoonery; a third suggested we should get up our theatricals under the cart-shed outside, and beat the drum when we were over; and the deserter, a poor, weak-looking, mangy wretch, with a ragged fustian-jacket and broken boots, put his arm on Caterina's waist, and drew her on his knee, for the which she dealt him such a slap on the face as fairly sent him on the floor, in which upside position the Vaterchen kicked him again and again. In an instant all were upon us. Carters, peddlers, and image men rushed furiously. I suppose I beat somebody; I know that several beat me. The impression left upon me when all was over was of a sort of human kaleidoscope, where the people turned and grew without ceasing. Now we seemed all on our feet, now on our heads, now on the floor, now in the air, Vaterchen flying about like a demon, while Caterina stood in a corner with a gleaming stiletto in her hand, saying something in Calabrian, which sounded like an invitation to come and be killed.

The police came at last; and after a noisy scene of accusation and denial, the weight of evidence was against us, and we were marched off to prison, poor old Vaterchen crying like a child for all the disgrace and misery he had brought on his benefactor; and while he kissed my hand, swearing that a whole life's devotion would not be enough to recompense me for what he had been the means of inflicting on me, Caterina, who is more cruel, her chief regret apparently being that nobody came near enough to give her a chance with her knife, which she assured us she wielded with a notable skill, and could, with a jerk, send flying through a door, like a javelin, at full six paces' distance; nor, indeed, was it without considerable compunction she could be induced to restore it to its sheath, which truth obliges me to own was inside her garter, and, in fact, all lower adjoining the lake, had been once the dungeon of Jodi Hiss, and the torture chamber, as it was still called, continued to be used for mild transgressors, such as we were. A small hole indeed in the jailer's wife to take poor Tintenfleck for the night into her own quarters, and Vaterchen and I were sole possessors of the gloomy old hall, which opened by a balcony, railed like a sort of cage, over the lake.

If the torture chamber had been denuded of its flesh pincers and thumb-screws, and the other ingenious devices of human cruelty, I am bound to own that its traditions as a place of suffering had not died out, as the fleas left nothing to be desired on the score of misery. Whether it was that they had been pinched by a long fast, or that we were more tender, commonly, than the aborigines, I know not, but I can safely aver that I never passed such a night, and sincerely trust that I may never endure such another. Though the air from the lake was cold and chilly, we preferred to crouch on the balcony to remaining within the walls, but even here our persecutors followed us.

Vaterchen slept through it all; an occasional convulsive groan, and shout, at times, when one of the enemy had chanced upon some nervous fibre; but, on the whole, he bore up like one used to such proceedings, and did not brave it. As for me, when morning broke, I looked like a strong case of confluent small-pox, with the addition that my heavy eyelids nearly closed over my eyes, and my lips swelled out like a Caffre's. How that young miss Catiaka laughed at me! All the old man's signs, warnings, menaces, were in vain; she screamed aloud with laughter, and never ceased, even as we were led into the tribunal and before the dread presence of the judge.

The judgment-seat was not imposing. It was a long, low, ill-lighted chamber, with a sort of raised counter at one end, behind which sat three elderly men, dressed like master sweepers—that is, of the old days of climbing-boys. The prisoners were confined in a thing like a fold, and there leaned against one end of the same pen as ourselves a square-built, thick-set man of about eight-and-forty, or fifty, dressed in a suit of coarse drab, and whose red whiskers and bluff face proclaimed to be English. He was being interrogated as we entered, but from his total ignorance of German the examination was not proceeding very glibly.

"You're an Englishman, ain't you?" cried he, as I came in. "You can speak High Dutch, perhaps?"

"I can speak German well enough to be intelligible, Sir."

"All right," said he, in the same free-and-easy tone. "Will you explain to those old beggars there that they're making fools of themselves, and me too, for that matter? My report was made out for two; for Thomas Harper, that's me, and Sam Reggis. Now, because Sam Reggis ain't here, they tell me I can't be suffered to proceed. And is that stupid? Did you ever hear the like of that for downright absurdity before?"

"But where is he?"

"Well, I don't mind telling you, because you're a countryman, but I don't like blackening an Englishman to one of those confounded foreigners. Sam has run."

"What do you mean by 'run?'"

"I mean, cut his stick; gone clean away; and what's worse, too, carried off a stout bag of dollars with him that we had for our journey."

"Whither were you going?"

"That's no matter just now there, and don't concern you in any respect. What you've to do is, explain to the old cove under the table there in the middle of the roast of them,—tell him it's all right, that I'm Harper, and that the other ain't here; or look here, I'll tell you what's better, do you be Reggis, and it's all right."

I declined to take this arrangement, but undertook to plead his cause on its true merits.

"And who are you, Sir, that presume to play the advocate here?" said the President, angrily. "I fancied that you stood there to answer a charge against yourself."

"That charge may be very speedily disposed of, Sir," said I, as proudly; "and you will be very fortunate if you succeed as readily in exclaiming against the outrage to a citizen of the higher court of your country."

With the eloquence which we are told essentially belongs to Irishmen, I narrated how I had witnessed, as a mere passing traveler, the outrageous insult offered to these poor wanderers as they entered the inn. With the warm enthusiasm I had inspired by my theme, I painted the whole incidents with really scarcely a touch of embellishment, reserving the only decoration I added to a description of myself, whom I mentioned as an agent of the British government, especially employed on a peculiar service, the nature of which I proudly established by my passport setting forth that I was a certain "Ponto, Charge des Dépêches."

Now, if there be one thing more sentimental life fixed and immutable, it is this, that wherever the German language be spoken, the reverence for official documentary is supreme. If you can only show on document of authority that you are grandson of the man who made the broom that swept out a government office, it is enough. Now, Vaterchen had represented as one of the younger children of Bareaucracy. You are under the protection of the state, and though you be the smallest cog in the machinery, there is no saying what mischief might not ensue if you were either lost or mislaid.

"Let him go!" cried the President, when I had ceased, and I said, in a voice of careless insolence, "Go on, I beg of you; and send me back to prison; chain me; perhaps you would like to torture me. The supreme court I represent is especially slow in vindicating the rights of its injured officials. It has a European reputation for deliberation, and for its unbecoming ease. Yes, Englishmen can be impaled, burned, flayed alive, disemboweled. By all means, avail yourself of the opportunity, and instruct me led out instantly to the scaffold, unless you prefer to have me broken on the wheel!"

"Will nobody stop him?" cried the president, almost choking with wrath.

"Stop me: I suspect not, Sir. It is by these declamations and appeals to law openly, that my country will found that demand for reparation which will one day cost you so dearly. Lead on, I am ready for the block." And as I said this, I drew myself erect, and appeared to prepare for the headsman.

"If he will not cease, the court shall be dismissed," said the President, angrily.

"Never, Sir. Never, so long as I live, shall I surrender the glorious privilege of that freeborn by which I assert my birth-right as a Britton."

"Well, you are as impudent a chap as ever I listened to," muttered my countryman at my side.

"The prisoners are dismissed, the court is adjourned," said the president, rising; and amidst a very general cry from crowd, not entirely enthusiastic in our favor, we were all hurried into the street.

"Come along down here," said Mr. Harpar.

"I'm in a very tidy sort of place they call the Golden Pig. Come along, and bring the vagabonds, and let's have breakfast together."

I was hurt at the speech, but as my companions could not understand its coarseness, I accepted the invitation, and we followed him.

"A great deal. I am a sort of citizen of the world," said I, with a jaunty easiness.

"For a citizen of the world you appear to have strange tastes in your companionship. How did you come to foregather with these creatures?"

I tried the time-worn cant about seeing life in all its gradations—exploring the cabin as well as visiting the palace, and so on; but there was a rugged sort of incredulity in his manner that checked me, and I could not muster the glib readiness which usually stood by me on such occasions.

"You've not a man of fortune," said he, dryly, as I ended; "no one sees that pillainly enough. You're a fellow that should be earning his bread somehow; and the question is—Is this the kind of life you'd like to be leading? What humbug it is to talk about knowing the world, and such like! The thing is, to know a trade, to understand some art, to be able to produce something, to manufacture something, and have something to a useful purpose. When you've done, the knowledge of men will come later on, never be afraid of that. It's a school that we never miss one single day of our lives. But here we are; this is the Pig. Now, what will you have for breakfast? Eggs and bacon, too, and tell them there's a wide choice here; they have every thing you can mention in this little inn."

An excellent breakfast was soon spread out before us, and though my humble companions did it the most ample justice, I sat there, thoughtful and amused. The words of that stranger rang in my ears like a reproach and a warning. I knew how truly he had said that I was not a man of fortune, and it grieved me sorely to think how poor a one he saw it. In my heart of hearts I knew it was the delusion I loved best. To appear to the world at large as eccentric men of good means, free to do what he liked and go where he would, was the highest enjoyment I had ever prepared for myself; and yet there was in the commonplace sort of man—at least his manners were unpolished and his tone underbred—and he saw through it all at once.

I took the first opportunity to step away unobserved from the company, and retired to the little garden in front, to commune with myself and be alone. But ere I had been many minutes there, Harpar joined me. He came up smoking his pipe, quite the lounging lazy air of a man at perfect leisure, and consequently quite free to be as disagreeable as he pleased.

"You went off without eating your breakfast," said he, "and that's bad for you. You didn't like my freedom with you. You fancied that I ought to have taken all that nonsense of yours for gospel, and that your way of life for gospel; or, at least, that I ought to have pretended to do so. That ain't my way. I take things as they are.

It was not very easy to reply good-humoredly to such a speech as this. Indeed, I saw no particular reason why this man's freedom with any indulgence, and drawing myself haughtily up, I prepared a very dry but caustic rejoinder.

"Now, if you mean to be offended, you are welcome to, and welcome two points," said I, "on which you can inform me, I may be better able to answer what you have said. The first is: By what possible right do you take to task a person whom you have met but for the life till now? and, secondly, What benefit on earth could it be to me to impose upon a man from whom I neither want nor expect any thing?"

"Easily met, both," said he, quickly. "I'm a practical sort of fellow, who never wastes time on useless matters. That's your first proposition. Number two: you're a dreamer, and you hate being awakened."

"Well, Sir," said I, coldly, "to a gentleman so remarkable for perspicuity, and who reads character at sight, ordinary intercourse must be wearisome. Will you excuse me if I take my leave of you for the present?"

"Of course, make no ceremony about it; go or stay, just as you like. I never cross any one's humors."

I muttered something that sounded like a dissent to that doctrine, and he quickly added, "I mean, fortunately, in that same mind, that's all; nothing more. If you had been a man of good means, and for a frolic thought it might be good fun to consort for a few days with rapscallions of a traveling circus, all one could say was, it wasn't very good taste; but being evidently a fellow of another stamp, a young man who ought to be in his father's shop or his uncle's counting-house, following some honest craft or calling—for you, I say, it was perfect madness."

"Indeed!" said I, with an accent of intense scorn.

"Yes," continued he, seriously, "downright ruin. There's a poison in the lazy, good-for-nothing life of these devils, that never leaves a man's blood pure. 'Tis a notion that it wouldn't hurt a man's nature so much were he to consort with house-breakers; there's at least something real about these fellows."

"You talk admirably, with knowledge, Sir," said I, glad to say something that might offend him.

"I do," said he, seriously, and not taking the smallest account of the impertinent allusion. "I know that if a man hasn't a fixed calling, that is always leading him to this, that, and the t'other, he will very soon cease to have any character whatsoever; he'll just become as shifty in his nature as he has been in his course. I've seen scores of fellows wrecked on that rock, and I hadn't looked at you twice till I saw you were one of them."

"I must say, Sir," said I, summoning to my aid what I felt to be a most cutting sarcasm of manner—"I must say, Sir, that, considering how short has been the acquaintance which has subsisted between us, it would be extremely difficult for me to show how gratefully I feel the interest you have taken in me."

"Well, I'm not so sure of that!" said he, thoughtfully.

"May I ask, then, how?"

"Are you sure, first of all, that you wish to show this gratitude you speak of?"

"Oh, Sir, can you possibly doubt it?"

"I don't want to doubt it, I want to profit by it."

I made a bland bow that might mean any thing, but did not speak.

"There's the way of it," said he, boldly. "Reggis has run off with all my loose cash, and though there's money waiting for me at certain places, I shall find it very difficult to reach them. I have come down here on foot from Wildsad, and I can make my way, in the same fashion, to Lindau or Genoa; but then comes the difficulty, and I shall need about ten pounds to get to Malta. Could you lend me ten pounds?"

"Really, Sir," said I, coolly, "I am amazed at the innocence with which you can make such a demand on the man whom you have, only a few minutes back, so acutely depicted as an adventurer."

"It was for that very reason I thought of applying to you. Had you been a young fellow of a certain fortune, you'd have naturally been a stranger to the accidents which now and then leave men penniless in out-of-the way places, and it's just as likely that the first thought in your head would be, 'Oh, he's a swindler. Why hasn't he his letters of credit or his circular notes?' But, being exactly what I take you for, the chances are you'll say: 'What has befallen him to-day may chance to me to-morrow. Who can tell the day and the hour some mishap may not overtake him? and so I'll just help him through it.'"

"And that is your calculation?"

"That was my calculation."

"How sorry I feel to wound the marvelous gifts you possess to conceive of interpreting character! I am really shocked to think that for the time, at least, your acuteness is at fault."

"Which means that you'll not do it?"

I smiled a cordial assent.

He looked at me for a minute or more with a sort of blank incredulity, and then, crossing his arms on his breast, moved slowly down the walk without speaking.

I can not say how I detested this man; he had offended me in the very acutest point of all my nature; he had wounded the nicest susceptibility I possessed; of the pleasant fancies wherewith I delighted to clothe myself he would not leave me enough to cover my nakedness, and yet, now that I had resented his cool impertinence, I hated myself far more than I hated him. Dignity and reason, forsooth! What a fine opportunity to display them, truly! The man might be rude and underbred; he was rude and underbred; and was that any justification for my conduct toward him? Why had I not had the candor to say, "Here's all I possess in the world, and see yourself that I can not lend you ten pounds." How I wished I had said that; and how I wished, even more ardently still, that I had not met him, never interchanged speech with him!

"And why is it that I am offended with him —seemingly the one who discovered that I am Potts?" Now, these reflections were all the more bitter, since it was only twenty-four hours before that I had resolved to throw off delusion either of myself or others; that I would take my place in the ranks, and fight out my battle of life, a mere soldier. For this it was that I made common cause with Vaterchen, seeking the high road with that poor old man of motley, and actually speculating—in a sort of artistic way—whether I could not make friends with Tintenfleck! And if I were sincere in all this, how should I feel wounded by the honest candor of that plain-spoken fellow? He extended a hand at my hands: he owned ths; and yet, instead of approaching me with flattery, he at once assails my weakness, proud of my self-esteem, and says, "No humbug, Potts; at least, not with me!" He opens acquaintance with me on that masonic principle by which the brotherhood of Poverty is universal throughout the civilized and all peoples, and whose great maxim is, "He who lends to the poor man borrows from the rugged man."

"I'll go after him at once," said I, aloud. "I'll have more talk with him. I'm much mistaken if there's not great stuff in that rugged fellow."

When I re-entered the little inn I found Vaterchen fast asleep, and had divested of my decanter on the table, and lay breathing stertorously, and giving a long-drawn whistle in his nares, that smacked almost of apoplexy. Tintenfleck was standing to her guitar before a select audience of the inn servants, and Harpar was gone!

I gave the girl a glance of rebuke and displeasure. I aroused the old man with a kick, and imperiously demanded my bill.

"The bill has been paid by the other stranger," said the landlord; "he has settled every thing, and left a 'trenkgeld' for the servants, so that you have nothing to pay."

I could have almost cried with spite as I heard these words. It would have been a rare solace to my feelings if I could have kicked the man down for a rogue, and then been able to say to myself how cleverly I had escaped the snares of a swindler. As it was, I know now that he was not only honest but liberal, and to think, besides, that I had been his guest—eaten of his salt—it was more than I well could endure.

"Which way did he ride?" asked I.

"Round the head of the lake for Lindau. I told him that the steamer would take him there to-morrow morning, but he would not wait."

"Ah me!" sighed Vaterchen, but half awake, and with one eye still closed, "and we are going to St. Gallen."

"Who said so?" cried I, imperiously. "We are going to Lindau; at least, if I be the person who gives orders here. Follow!" And as I spoke I marched proudly on, while a slipshod, shuffling noise of feet, and a low, half-smothered sob, told me that they were coming after me.

PART I.

IN A LITTLE boy strayed away from home on a bright morning in December, and wandered down by the sea-shore. This happened in California, where many other wonderful things happen; though people are not generally aware that little boys stray from home and wander by the sea-shore in so new a country. It must be admitted, however, that this was a very remarkable little boy. He was about six years of age, and had a very large head and a very small pair of legs. The corners of his mouth, and the corners of his eyes, and the end of his nose all turned up at the same time, except when he cried, which sometimes happened, and then they all turned down at the same time. The toes of his shoes were always kicked out against little pebbles and stumps, on account of a propensity this little boy had for trying what every thing was made of; and the knees of his trowsers and elbows of his jacket seemed always to be burst wide open laughing at his bare toes, because they looked so much like little new potatoes just dug out of the ground. What was still more remarkable, no matter how many new hats were put on his head, his hair grew so straight up in the middle that it generally found out a way of getting through the crown, and looking about in every direction as if in search of another hat. All of which resulted, no doubt, from the wonderful genius of this little boy.

As he was walking by the sea-shore on a very pleasant morning when he strayed away from home, he observed that the sun was bright and warm, and the sea looked as smooth as glass. Said he to himself, smiling pleasantly at the idea,

"Oh, if I had every thing I wish for, how happy I would be!" A very unreasonable wish, as you must admit; for our little friend had kind parents, and brothers and sisters, and every thing in the world that any reasonable boy of his age ought to have. Just as he repeated this indiscreet wish a voice, apparently from under the rocks, called out to him, "Hallo! my little friend, tell me your name, and I will give you whatever you wish for."

It was the old King of the Sea that spoke. The little boy was startled, and no wonder, for at the same moment he heard a splashing in the water, and up rose the oddest figure imaginable. It was that of a very old man, all covered with seaweeds, and the salt brine dripping from his beard, arms, and legs. On his head was a crown made of a large conch-shell. All the rest of his costume consisted of variegated sea-weeds, which seemed to grow on him naturally, just as they grow upon the rocks along the sea-shore. The face of the old Sea-King was wrinkled, partly by age and partly by exposure to bad weather. His nose was very long, and he had only one eye, which seemed to be made of an oyster-shell with a shining pebble fastened in the middle of it. I am unable to say what happened to the other eye, but imagine he must have struck it against a sharp rock one dark night when he was diving down in search of a starfish.

Although the little boy was naturally startled when he saw this odd figure standing before him on the rocks, he promptly answered, "My name, Sir, is Mitché!"

"Oho!" said the old Sea-King. "I thought so. You look like a boy of that name; and a very pretty name it is, too — derived from the French, perhaps. Now, Mitché, you shall have every thing you wish for, on one condition."

"And pray, Sir, what is the condition?" Mitché asked.

"Nothing more than this," replied the old Sea-King,—"you must only wish for one thing at a time. The moment you wish for any thing else what you first wished for will vanish. In this, you perceive, I go farther than any of the great Genii of which you read in the Story-books. They only give THREE WISHES, but I give as many as you please — only, one at a time. The reason of this is, because I am the great-grandfather of Neptune, and have much more experience in the world than any of the Genii at present known to mankind."

The little boy reflected a while over the many thousand things that he was in want of — including kites, marbles, tops, wooden soldiers, pop-guns, and bows and arrows—but could think of nothing so desirable that something else still more attractive did not present itself to his mind. Puzzled by the variety of beautiful things to be had merely by expressing a wish, he gazed out upon the sea in search of an idea on the subject.

"I have it!" cried Little Mitché, joyfully; "the sea is as smooth as glass! I will go skating on the water! Since you are so kind, Sir," said he, turning to the Sea-King, "as to promise me whatever I desire, I will thank you to furnish me with a pair of skates that will bear me over the beautiful sea!"

No sooner had he uttered these words than the skates were on his feet, and away he went skating over the bright blue sea, a thousand times faster than ever a boy skated upon ice.

So delighted was he with the sport that he chased the sea-gulls and flying-fish from island to island, and never stopped skating till he began to grow hungry with the exercise. "This is glorious fun!" said Little Mitché, "I could not have a better toy any thing better. I can now follow all the great ships that sail upon the sea, and find out where they are going. However, I am getting rather hungry. I wish I had a piece of bread-and-butter." In an instant a piece of bread-and-butter was in his hand, but before he could raise it to his mouth down he went in the water; for, as the old Sea-King had told him, the second wish had caused what he had first wished for to vanish. Poor Little Mitché floundered about in the sea, crying for help and almost choking for breath. It was certainly quite natural for him to wish for bread-and-butter when he was hungry; but he should first have made sure of an island or something else to stand upon. Just as he was about to go to the bottom he cried out, "O great Sea-King! please, Sir, send me a boat!" As if by magic a beautiful little boat appeared close by him, with a rope-ladder hanging over the side. Of course he lost no time in climbing into it. "Dear me," said he, all dripping with salt-water, "how wet I am! I never thought of it! Next time I'll take good care not to wish for one thing till I can do without the other. It was very careless of me to forget what the old Sea-King told me so soon. I won't do so again in a hurry, for it is certainly very unpleasant sitting here in wet clothes—I wish I had some dry ones!" No sooner had he said this than his clothes were perfectly dry; but at the same time the boat sank from under him, and he was soon floundering about again in the sea. What an absurd Little Mitché! to do the very same thing he had just done before, and determined not to do again! As he was about to sink for the third and last time he cried out, at the top of his voice, "Oh dear me! oh dear! I shall certainly be drowned! Oh, if I were only on dry land!" Sure enough, at the very same moment he was standing on a great desert of land, so dry that not a blade of grass grew upon it. Even the earth had popped out of the holes in the ground to look at him, and not keep their eyes open, so intensely hot was the sun; and a horned frog, that incautiously exposed his head to the heat, was immediately rendered insensible, and had to be dragged back into his hole by the other horned frogs that lived with him. Little Mitché began to burn up with thirst. "What a horrible country this is!" said he, looking all around; "not a tree or shrub to shield one's head from the sun, and not a drop of water to drink. I wish I had a glass of water!" Instantly he found himself hanging to a glass filled with water; but there was neither earth nor sea around him—nothing but thin air. He imagined that he was falling down through the sky, and would presently strike something—a very natural thing for a little boy to imagine under the circumstances. So he cried out in despair, "Dear me! I shall certainly be killed falling from such a height!" Almost any boy, with a very large head and a very small pair of legs to balance it, would have come to the same conclusion at the same height. "Oh dear! oh dear!" cried Mitché, "I can see the great big rocks! I wish I had a pair of wings!" As he said the words he found himself flapping about in the air with a pair of big wings, just like a crow. A portion of his shirt conveniently answered the purpose of a tail. As he was flying over a corn-field he spied a man with a gun, who was apparently a dead shot at crows. "Now," said Mitché, "this fellow will certainly shoot me if I come within range of his gun. He has a very bad expression of countenance, as well as I can perceive at this distance. But in fact, as I am so tired I must light on the fence. I do wish I had a bow-and-arrow, and I would give him a pop on the head as I pass over, merely to teach him how he would like to be shot at if he were a crow!" Exactly as he wished, the bow-and-arrow were instantly in his hands; but at the same moment, as he might have known would be taken time for reflection, his wings vanished, and down he tumbled plump on the top of the man's head! This broke his fall, and frightened the man very seriously. "A demon! A fiend!" cried the man, clapping his hand on the top of his head, and running away as fast as his legs would carry him. "A demon with wings! Get out of the way, every body!" And he ran so fast that the people thought he was a madman, and all began running in every direction to get out of his way.

Little Mitché sat upon the ground for some time thinking what he would do next, when a furious wild bull came bellowing at him. There was a tree close by, and Mitché knew very well that all he had to do was to climb himself in the top of it, in order to be perfectly safe. This made him very brave. Indeed, it would make any person brave, who was assailed by an attack from a mad bull, to know that there was a place of security close by. Mitché thought he would enjoy a little satisfaction for the repeated frights that he had suffered from imaginary attacks of mad bulls; so, doubling up his fists, he stood out in the middle of the lane in a defiant attitude, and called upon the old bull to come on.

"You are an ugly brute!" cried he, bravely; "the ugliest brute I ever saw. No doubt you flatter yourself very strong, with that great big neck, and those sharp horns; but you don't frighten me! When I was a small boy you might have done so, with your horrible red tongue and fiery nostrils. Now, you see, the case is different. I am big, and can whip you with one hand. So, you may bellow with rage! I dare you to come on, you ugly old scamp!" Of course the bull couldn't stand this. No bull in existence could be insulted in that way with impunity. The enraged animal flashed fire out of his eyes, tore up the ground, put out his great red tongue, and rushed full tilt at our brave little hero. Just then Mitché wished himself up in the top of the tree, and there he immediately was, quite safe from every animal of the bull species. Now this made his adversary very furious. "Oh, you cowardly rascal!" cried Mitché, as the bull bellowed all around the tree, tearing up the earth and casting it over his back with rage. "Why don't you come on? I'm waiting for you! I only wish I had a big stone in my hand; I'd soon spoil your beauty!" Upon which he immediately found himself armed with a stone so big that he could hardly carry it with both hands. But alas! the tree had vanished from under him, and the furious bull was coming at him full tilt. The position was certainly very awkward, and afforded no time for reflection. Mitché took to his heels and ran away a great deal faster than the man with the gun did from the demon, shouting "Help! help! Oh gracious! I'll be gored to death! The mad bull is after me! Help! Oh, I wish—" But before he could wish any thing the bull had inserted one of his horns in the ragged part of his trowsers and tossed him over the fence into the corn-field. It was a very fortunate but inglorious termination of the battle.

After all these strange adventures Mitché, as soon as the way was clear, walked very soberly home. When he arrived there, and related what had occurred, he was soundly corrected by his judicious Mamma for escaping so many dangers, and put to bed, where he quickly forgot his troubles and fell fast asleep. And thus ends the first part of the Christmas Story.

MITCHÉ IS TOSSED OVER THE FENCE.

PART II.

THE next morning was Christmas. Bright and early all the children were awake. Now it happened that they began talking about Christmas gifts—a very remarkable thing for children to talk about on a Christmas morning. Spenser, the eldest, said, "If I had only one wish, what do you think I would wish for?" All the children said they didn't know. "I would wish," said he, "for the purse of Fortunatus', which can never be emptied, though you may money out of it every day in the year." Indiscreet Spenser! when you might have wished for a mustache that would have made a man of you for life! Then every body asked May what she would wish for. What do you think May said? "I would wish for a beautiful bonnet, made of figured velvet, with a border of blue flowers." Oh, foolish little May! when you had only one wish in the world, and might have wished for a splendid pink-satin dress! Then the sleepy little Bruder woke up, and said, "I'd like to have another." "What! another bonnet?" all the children cried out, laughing. "No," said Bruder, rubbing his eyes; "another new top. I thought you were talking of tops." Oh, sleepy little Bruder, to wish for a new top, when you had but one wish, and might have wished for a whole box of paints! Then they all asked little Nina what she would wish for. "I'd wish for a new bonnet, just like May's," said Nina. Silly little Nina, to throw away your wish on a trifling bonnet, when you might have had a brass-new set of silver tea-things! All this time Little Mitché was laughing to himself, because he knew he was the only one who really could get what he wished for. Now, he thought, he would astonish all the children. "What do you think I'd wish for?" said he, pompously. Every body said nobody knew. "Well, guess," said Mitché. Spenser guessed a brass trumpet; May, a humming-top; Bruder, a wheel-barrow; and Nina, a whirligig. "None of these," said Mitché, disdainfully. "Bang! don't you hear the guns? I'm a soldier! I'd wish to be dressed in a beautiful suit of soldier-clothes!" And to the delight and astonishment of all the children, including the baby, up jumped Mitché out of bed dressed off splendidly in a red suit of soldier-clothes, with epaulets and brass buttons on the coat, stripes on the pantaloons, a pair of boots that reached half-way up his legs, and a tremendous shaggy hat, with a feather sticking out of the top of it. Such a formidable-looking boy of his size never was seen before. He strutted around the room exactly like a little bantam cock, and, indeed, put on such a fierce expression of countenance that May and Nina were dreadfully frightened. Mitché laughed at their groundless fears, and said, chivalrously, "Don't be afraid of me, ladies! A soldier never hurts the ladies. He only kills men."

Now, all in the house hearing the cries of admiration occasioned by the splendid appearance of our little gentleman in regimentals, got up and called him out on the front porch, where all the neighbors knew he began to assemble to see the wonderful sight. Mitché was prouder than any peacock, and strutted up and down, shouting, "Bang! bang! boom-a-laddie! boom!" And from proud he began to grow very vainglorious, as some military heroes do now and then. He thought he would look still more formidable if he had a beautiful little live pony to ride upon. And as he expressed the wish, as sure as every word of this story is true, he was astride of the prettiest little pony that mortal eye ever saw! But alas! alas! with shame I tell it! At the very same moment his suit of soldier clothes disappeared, and he was stark naked! Now about before all the people! To make matters worse, the pony was a very stubborn little animal, and took a notion to stand stock-still. With the fore-legs braced out to keep himself from moving an inch, Mitché, bursting with rage and shame, cried out, "Go! wo! get up!" It was no use—not an inch would the animal go. "Oh, you little brat! I had a whip I'll make you go! I do wish I had one!" At that identical moment he felt a whip in his hand, but the pony had disappeared from under him, and he went hopping about on his bare shanks before all the people, flourishing his whip and wondering where the pony was. So loud was the laughter caused by his odd appearance that he soon roared out crying, and then every body laughed louder still, which so mortified this little soldier that he started off as fast as his legs could carry him to bed, where he covered up his head in the clothes, and never stopped crying till Sally, the servant girl, dressed him. Oh, valiant Little Mitché! to make such an inglorious end of your military career! "It is all owing to that abominable old King of the Sea," he said, after he was dressed. "I have had nothing but trouble ever since he gave me what I wished for. I don't intend to wish for any thing more this blessed Christmas-day!"

Mitché was as good as his word, and never wished for a single thing till dinner-time, when all the family were gathered around the table to eat the smoking-hot turkey, the nice mince-pies, and the great big plum-pudding. It happened that there was no chair in his place, and he was very much afraid if he went in search of a chair somebody would take possession of the vacant place. "Oh, I do wish I had a chair!" said he, dancing with impatience. "I do wish— Hallo! Jim-crickey! what a beautiful chair!" for as sure as I am telling the exact truth he beheld at that moment conveniently fixed at his place, the prettiest little blue arm-chair, with long legs, that ever was seen. In a trice he hopped into it, flourishing his knife and fork with joy. Every thing went on splendidly till the plum-pudding was brought on the table. It looked so nice, all speckled with raisins and covered with sugar-sauce, and the smell was so perfectly enchanting, that Little Mitché could no longer control his impatience. Indeed, it was enough to make any body impatient—such a bewitching plum-pudding as that! "Oh dear!" cried Mitché, "I will nobody ever cut it up? I do wish I had a piece of that glorious plum-pudding on my plate!" And lo! there it was, all cut and buttered, exactly on the middle of his plate. Ri-and he lay sprawling on the floor. In the mean time, while every body was laughing at his misfortune, the cat jumped upon the table and ran off with his plum-pudding! Now did you ever hear of such an unfortunate little boy? He was continually forgetting what the old Sea-King had told him. I have no doubt that there have been a great deal wiser, my dear young friend, and never have wished for any thing that you did not feel a strong desire to possess. To make matters worse, instead of wishing to have his plum-pudding back again, as any judicious boy would have done, he got so angry because every body laughed at him, that he cried out at the top of his voice, "Stop laughing at me! I don't want you to laugh at me! I wish somebody would make you all cry!" No sooner had he said the word than every body began to cry in good earnest. Papa cried so violently that he shook the roof of the house, and the tears ran down Mamma's eyes at such a rate that she had to catch them in a big Chinese bowl to keep from drowning the baby; Spenser roared out so loud that the butcher came running to see if there was a new calf for sale; May sobbed till a little river of tears ran down from both eyes and drowned three dolls-babies that she had concealed in her lap to play with under the table. Poor little sleepy Bruder sat with his eyes wide open, and a great tear as big as an apple-dumpling sticking straight out of each corner. Nina did just the same as May. Mitché, seeing every body in such an awful state of affliction, knew it was because the cat had run away with his pudding, and his feelings were so deeply affected by such sympathy that he lost control of the middle of the floor, almost doubled up with grief, with his hands on his knees and his feet down on the floor, and cried louder than any of the family. As for the dear little baby, it shrieked at such a rate that Mamma was obliged to give it a dose of paregoric; and when the old cat, having by this time finished the pudding, mewed most pitifully, it was a perfect mad bedlam of the most uncholy family concert. All the neighbors ran in to ask what was the matter; but nobody could speak a word on account of the hard crying. What made it worse, when the neighbors saw there was nobody hurt, they thought every body was crying because there was no more dinner. So they wondered much, and after crying a while for sympathy, went off to tell their friends that this unfortunate family had eaten up their Christmas dinner, and were all crying because they could eat no more—which was such an unhappy state of affairs that the whole village began to cry. In the mean time Little Mitché became frightened at the terrible uproar he had created, and sang out with all his might, "Don't cry so any more! I wish you would all hush!" At this every living soul in the room, including the baby, commenced whispering "Hush! hush!" and such a hushing never was heard in this world. Mitché was the first to begin, and after listening a while, said they could hear nothing. Then Papa said "Hush!" and Mamma said "Hush!" and Spenser said "Hush!" and May, and Bruder, and Nina, and even the little baby said "Hush!" and kept on saying "Hush," till the neighbors declared they heard something under the floor, and ran off again frightened out of their wits; and when they told the people of the village what had occurred, every body was frightened, and declared the place was haunted.

Poor Little Mitché thought it must be a grizzly bear, and the more Papa and Mamma and the children cried "Hush!" the worse he was frightened. At last he could stand it no longer, and shouted out, "Please to stop hushing! I wish you all quit!" Upon which every body quit the table, and left little Mitché alone to fight the grizzly. Was ever a poor boy so tormented? When he found himself entirely alone he reflected seriously over his troubles, and determined to go for advice to Papa, whom he considered a man of very sound judgment.

"Now Papa, being a man of sound judgment, reflected a moment, and then said, "My son, you have thrown away a great many valuable wishes on trifles. Why don't you wish for something worth having —a handsome family-carriage, for instance, in which we might all go traveling!"

Little Mitché clapped his hands with joy, and immediately wished for a magnificent family-carriage, which at the very same moment appeared in place of Papa's house, and all the family got into it. But, lo! it would not move an inch, and how could it, for there were no horses!

"Just as I expected," said Mamma; "to wish for a fine carriage without any horses to put before it! Besides, you see we have no house to live in now. I suppose we are all to reside in the carriage for the future!"

Papa looked rather blank at the result of his wish, and thought a carriage would certainly be a little inconvenient as a permanent place of residence. Now Mamma, having much more judgment in regard to these matters, remarked, triumphantly:

"I hope you will admit now that men don't know every thing. Had you desired the boy to wish for something really useful there would have been some sense in it—a sewing-machine, for instance. You see the poor little fellow has scarcely a rag on his back!"

Papa, like the Irishman, thought he had a good many; but being a man of sound judgment said nothing, though I regret to say he puffed his cigar in a very provoking manner.

Little Mitché was delighted at the idea of a sewing-machine, and immediately wished his Mamma had a very fine one. As sure as the old Sea-King lives the whole family were at that very moment seated on the ground around a beautiful sewing-machine! Papa puffed his cigar away, and muttered something about taking board and lodging under the machine, and sleeping on to; "it during the warm December nights to keep himself cool—and perhaps Mamma could sew the children up in a big bag every night and hang them on a tree to keep the gobblers from running away with them. Then all the children clapped their hands and laughed so heartily that Mamma was obliged to smile at Papa's foolishness. However, though she did not choose to admit it, she had evidently that a sewing-machine would be even a more inconvenient piece of residence than a carriage, and Mitché very sensibly wished for the horse back again just as it stood before; in which, of course, he was at once gratified.

He now came to the conclusion that the Sea-King was not to be trusted, since both old and young derived nothing but trouble from the gift of wishing; so he retired into the library to study what ought to be done. After turning the whole business over in his mind a happy thought struck him. He would go to the old Sea-King to be present, and then get Papa to give him a good beating; for Mitché, like many other little boys, had an idea that his Papa was the wisest man in the world. "Oh, it will be such fun fun," said he, clapping his hands joyfully, "to see the old fellow jumping about and crying with pain! Oh, I wish Papa were here!" At that moment Papa stood exactly before him. Mitché exclaimed, "Oh, Papa, can't you punish the old Sea-King for troubling me?" "To be sure, Mitché, where is he? I'll give him a good flogging." Mitché looked all around; but of course the old Sea-King was not there. Then he shouted a while, and said, "I just wish he would pop in here!" "Ho, ho!" cried a voice like the grating of sea-shells on a gravelly shore, "Ho, ho! my fine little fellow! I think you said you wanted me?" Mitché turned around, and saw, standing before him, all dripping with salt-water, the venerable King of the Seas.

"Now, Papa!" cried Mitché in triumph. But, of course, Papa had vanished!

"And pray, my little man," said the old Sea-King, with a sly leer, "what do you want with your Papa?"

Mitché was terribly frightened to find himself alone with this shaggy old monster, and replied, in a faltering voice:

"I thought, Sir, that your kind services merited some reward, and I merely wanted my Papa to give it to you."

"Ho, ho! Well, never mind! We'll excuse him this time. Take heart, my little friend," said the monster; "I've taken a great fancy to you, and little boys who tell the truth. But really I must go and attend to my chickens. They are dying all about probably for want of me. Is there any thing else you would like?"

At this Mitché took courage and said: "Please, good Sir, will you be so kind as to take back the gift of having whatever I wish for that you gave me on the night of the 24th of December, and truth."

At this the old Sea-King shook his sides with laughter, so that the water-spout ran down all over the floor. As soon as he could speak he turned his great oyster eye on Mitché and said, in a voice of unbounded gravity, "Very well, my little friend, as you please. Just call to mind this word when you want any thing. But bear this in mind: If little children had every thing they wish for, they would be very unhappy. Even if all little children quit to be such as they deserve; any thing more would do them harm instead of good." With a chuckle, continued the old Sea-King, rolling his oyster eye all around, and chuckling to himself, "of course the case is quite different with grown people. Being very judicious on account of their superior age and experience, they never wish for foolish things which they ought not to have, as innocent little children do. Ho, ho! good-by, Mitché!" Saying this, the jolly old Sea-King gave one roar of laughter that sounded like the dancing of waves over a thousand rocks—and vanished in a cloud of spray.

After all these wonderful adventures Little Mitché fell asleep and was put to bed; and so ends our Christmas Story.

SONG.

Why did I give my heart away,
Gave it so lightly, gave it to pay
For a pleasant dream on a summer's day?

Why did I leave my mother dear,
Left her with never a doubt or fear,
For him who has left me without a tear?

Why not believe the words they said,
That I'd better be lying cold and dead,
Than go with one whom I'd never wed?

Why did I love? I did not know
How surely passing years would show
My love could bring me nothing but woe.

Why did I give my heart away,
Gave it so rashly, gave it to pay
For a false sweet smile one summer's day?

CHAPTER XIII.

IT is a most miserable thing to feel ashamed of home. There may be black ingratitude in the thing, and the punishment may be retributive and well deserved; but that it is a miserable thing, I can testify.

Home had never been a very pleasant place to me, because of my sister's temper. But Joe had sanctified it, and I had believed in it. I had believed in the best parlor as a most elegant saloon; I had believed in the front door as a mysterious portal of the Temple of State whose solemn ingress was attended with a sacrifice of roast fowls; I had believed in the kitchen as a chaste though not magnificent apartment; I had believed in the forge as opening the road to manhood and independence. Within a single year all this was changed. Now it was all coarse and common, and I would not have had Miss Havisham and Estella see it on any account.

How much of my ungracious condition of mind may have been my own fault, how much Miss Havisham's, how much my sister's, is now of no moment to me or to any one. The change was made in me; the thing was done. Well or ill done, excusably or inexcusably, it was done.

Once it had seemed to me that when I should at last roll up my shirt-sleeves and go into the forge, Joe's 'prentice, I should be distinguished and happy. Now the reality was in my hold, I only felt that I was dusty with the dust of smallcoal, and that I had a weight upon my daily remembrance to which the anvil was a feather. There have been occasions in my later life (I suppose as there are to most lives) when I have felt for a time as if a thick curtain had fallen on all its interest and romance, to shut me out from any thing save dull ordinance and monotony. Never has that curtain dropped so heavy and blank as when my way in life lay stretched out straight before me through the newly-entered road of apprenticeship to Joe.

I remember that at a later period of my "time" I used to stand about the churches pretty on Sunday evenings when night was falling, comparing my own perspective with the windy marsh view, and making out some likeness between them by thinking how bad and low both were, and how on both there came an unknown way and a dark mist and then the sea. My sense of dullness quite agreed on the first working-day of apprenticeship as in that after-time; but I am glad to know that I never breathed a murmur to Joe while my indentures lasted. It is about the only thing I am glad to know of myself in that connection.

For, though it includes what I proceed to add, all the merit of what I proceed to add was Joe's. It was not because I was faithful, but because Joe was faithful, that I never ran away and went for a soldier or a sailor. It was not because I had a strong sense of the virtue of industry, but because Joe had a strong sense of the virtue of industry, that I worked with tolerable zeal against the grain. It is not possible to know how far the influence of any amiable honesthearted man may plump flies out into the world; but it is very possible to know how it has touched one's self in going by, and I know right well that any good that intercepted itself with my apprenticeship came of plain contented Joe, and not of restlessly aspiring discontented me.

What I wanted who can say? How can I say when I never knew? What I decided was, that in some unlucky hour I, being at my grimiest coal-and-dust, should lift up my eyes and see Estella looking in at one of the wooden windows of the forge. I was haunted by the fear that she would, sooner or later, find me out, with a black face and hands, doing the coarsest part of my work, and would exult over me and despise me. Often after dark, when I was pulling the bellows for Joe and we were singing old Clem, and when the thought how we used to sing it at Miss Havisham's would seem to show me Estella's face in the fire with her pretty hair fluttering in the wind and her eyes scorning me—often at such a time I would look toward those panels of black night in the wall which the wooden window then were, and would fancy that I saw her just drawing her face away, and would believe that she had come at last.

After that, when we went into supper, the place and the meal would have a more homely look than ever, and I would feel more ashamed of home than ever in my own ungracious breast.

CHAPTER XIV.

AS I was getting too big for Mr. Wopsle's great aunt's room, my education under that preposterous female terminated. Not, however, until Biddy had imparted to me every thing she knew, from the little catalogue of prices to a comic song she had once bought for a halfpenny. Although the only coherent part of the latter piece of literature were the open lines,

When I went to Lunnon town sirs
'Too rul too rul
'Too rul too rul
When I came home my brown sire
'Too rul too rul
'Too rul too rul

—still, in my desire to be wiser, I got this composition by heart with the utmost gravity; nor do I recollect that I questioned its merit, except that I thought (as I still do) the amount of Too rul somewhat in excess of the poetry. In my hunger for information I made overtures to Mrs. Wopsle to bestow some intellectual crumbs upon me: with which he kindly complied. As it turned out, however, that he only wanted me for a dramatic lay figure, to be contradicted and embraced and wept over and bullied and clutched and stabbed and thrown about in a variety of ways, I soon declined that course of instruction; though not until Mr. Wopsle in his poetic fury had severely mauled me.

Whatever I acquired I tried to impart to Joe. This statement sounds so well that I can not in my conscience let it pass unexplained. I wanted to make Joe less ignorant and common, that he might be worthier of my society and less open to Estella's reproach.

The old Battery out on the marshes was our place of study, and a broken slate and a short piece of slate-pencil were our educational implements: to which Joe added a pipe of tobacco. I never knew Joe to remember any thing from one Sunday to another, or to acquire, under my tuition, any piece of information whatever. Yet he would smoke his pipe at the Battery with a far more sagacious air than any where else—I would even say with a learned air, as if his consciousness were to be advancing immensely. Dear fellow, I hope he did.

It was pleasant and quiet out there, with the sails on the river seeming to pass by intent on their own affairs, and sometimes, when the tide was low, looking as if they belonged to sunken ships that were still sailing on at the bottom. It was pleasant, whenever the light struck asfant afar off, upon a cloud or soil or green hill-side or water-line, it was just the same. Miss Havisham and Estella and the strange house and the strange life appeared to have something to do with every thing that was picturesque.

On Sunday when Joe, greatly enjoying his pipe, had so plumed himself on being "most awful dull," that I had given him up for the day, I lay on the grass and thought about these my chin on my hand descrying traces of Miss Havisham and Estella all over the prospect, in the sky and in the water, until at last Pip appeared to have something to do with every thing that was picturesque.

"Joe," said I, "don't you think I ought to make Miss Havisham a visit?"

"Well, Pip," returned Joe, slowly considering. "What for?"

"What for, Joe? What is any visit made for?"

"There is some wisits p'raps," said Joe, "as for ever remains wisits, and others comes to an end in regard of wisiting Miss Havisham. She might think you wanted something—expected something of me."

"Don't you think I might say that I did not, Joe?"

"You might, old chap," said Joe. "And she might credit it. Similarly she mightn't."

Joe felt, as I did, that he had made a point there, and he pulled hard at his pipe to keep himself from wandering from it. Presently he

"You see, Pip," Joe pursued, as soon as he was past that danger, "Miss Havisham done the handsome thing by you. Miss Havisham done the handsome thing by you, she called me back to say to me as that were all."

"Yes, Joe. I know."

"ALL," Joe repeated, very emphatically.

"Yes, Joe. I tell you, I heard her."

"Which I mentions it, Pip, for the fact is that her meaning were—Make a end on it!—As you was!—Me to the North and you to the South! —Keep in sunders!"

I had thought of that too, and it was very far from comforting to me to find that he had thought of it; for it seemed to render it more probable.

"But, Joe."

"Yes, old chap."

"Here am I, getting on in the first year of my time, and since the day of my being bound I have never thanked Miss Havisham, or asked after her, or shown that I remember her."

"That's true, Pip; and unless you was to turn her out a set of shoes all four round—and which I mean'say as even a set of shoes all four round might not act acceptable as a present, in a total vacancy of hoofs—"

"I don't mean that sort of remembrance, Joe: I don't meant a present."

But Joe had got the idea of a present in his head and must harp upon it.

"Or even," said Joe, "if you was helped to knocking her up a new chain for the front door—or say a gross or two of shank-headed screws for general use—or some light fancy article, such as a mahogany fork when she took her muffins—or a gridiron when she took a sprat or such like—"

"I don't mean any present at all, Joe," interposed.

"Well," said Joe, still harping on it as though I had particularly pressed it, "if I was yourself, Pip, I wouldn't. No, I would not. For what's a door-chain when she's got one always up? And shank-headers is open to misrepresentations. And if it was a roasting-jack, you'd go into brass and do yourself no credit. And the oncommonest workman can't shove himself oncommon in a gridiron—for a gridiron is a gridiron," said Joe, steadfastly impressing it upon me, as if he were endeavoring to rouse me from a fixed delusion, "and you may spile him at what you like, but a gridiron it will come out, either by your leave or again your leave, and you can't help yourself."

"My dear Joe," I cried, in desperation, taking hold of his coat, "don't go on in that way. I never thought of making Miss Havisham any present."

"No, Pip," Joe asserted, as if he had been contending for that all along; "and what I say to you is, you are right, Pip."

"Yes, Joe; but what I wanted to say was, that as we are rather slack just now, if you could give me half holiday to-morrow, I think I would go up town and make a call on Miss Est—Havisham."

"Which her name," said Joe, gravely, "ain't Estavisham, Pip, unless she have been rechristened."

"I know, Joe, I know. It was a slip of mine. What do you think of it, Joe?"

In brief, Joe thought that if I thought well of it, he thought well of it. But he was particular in stipulating that if I were not received with cordiality, or if I were not encouraged to repeat my visit as a visit which had no ulterior object but my own pleasure, I would allow for a first visit to be my last. These conditions I promised to fulfill.

Now Joe kept a journeyman at weekly wages whose name was Orlick. He pretended that his Christian name was Dolge—a clear impossibility —but he was a fellow of that obstinate disposition that I believe him to have been the prey of no delusion of that sort, but willfully to have imposed that name upon the village as an affront to its understanding. He was a broadshouldered, loose-limbed, swarthy fellow of great strength, more than Joe, and always slouching. He never even seemed to come to his work on purpose, but would slouch in as if by secret machinery he had been set in motion by Joe's Bargeman to eat his dinner, or went away at night, he would slouch out like Cain or the Wandering Jew. No one knew where he lived, or was going and no intention of ever coming back. He lodged at a sluice-keeper's out on the marshes, and on working days would slouch down from his hermitage, with his hands in his pockets and his dinner loosely tied in a bundle round his neck and dangling on his back. On Sundays he mostly lay about the sluice gates, or stood against ricks and barns. He always slouched, locomotively, with his eyes on the ground, and never by chance looked before him. Required to raise them, he looked up in a half resentful, half puzzled way, as though the only thought he ever had in his life was rather an odd and injurious fact that he should never be thinking.

This morose journeyman had no liking for me. When I was very small and timid, he gave me to understand that the Devil lived in a black corner of the forge, and that he knew the fiend very well; also that it was necessary to make up the fire once in every seven years with a live boy, and that I might consider myself that live boy. From Joe's 'prentice, he was perhaps confirmed in some suspicion that I should displace him; howbeit, he liked me still less. Not that he ever said any thing, or did any thing, openly imputing hostility; I only noticed that he always beat his sparks in my direction, and that whenever I sang Old Clem he came in out of time.

Dolge Orlick was at work and present, next day, when I reminded Joe of my half-holiday. He said nothing in reply, for he and Joe had just got a piece of hot iron between them and I was at the bellows; but by-and-by he said, looming out of the smoke:

"Now, master! Sure you're not a going to favor only one of us. If Young Pip has a half-holiday, do you mean to tell Old Orlick?" I suppose he was about five-and-twenty, but he usually spoke of himself as an ancient person.

"Why, what do you do with a half-holiday, if you get it?" said Joe.

"What'll I do with it! What'll he do with it? I'll do as much with it as him," said Orlick.

"As to Pip, he's going up town," said Joe.

"Well, then, as to Old Orlick, he's going up town," retorted that worthy. "Two can go up town. Tain't for the like of me to go up town."

"Don't lose your temper," said Joe.

"Shall if I like," growled Orlick. "Some and their up-towning! As if one wasn't one. No favoring in this shop. Be a man."

The master refusing to entertain the subject until the journeyman was in a better temper, Orlick plunged at the furnace, drew out a red-hot bar, made at me with it as if he were going to run it through my body, whisked it round my head, laid it on the anvil, hammered it out—as if it were I, I thought, and the sparks were my spirting blood—and finally said, when he had hammered himself hot and the iron cold, and he again leaned on his hammer:

"Now, master?"

"Are you all right now?" demanded Joe.

"Ah! I am all right," said grim Old Orlick.

"Then, as in general you stick to your work as well as most men," said Joe, "let it be a half-holiday for all."

My sister had been standing silent in the yard, within hearing—she was a most unscrupulous spy and listener—and she instantly looked in at one of the windows.

"Like you, you fool!" said she to Joe, "giving holidays to great idle hulkers like that. You are a rich man, upon my life, to waste wages in that way. I wish I was his master!"

"Yond be every body's master, if you durst," retorted Orlick, with an ill-favored grin.

("Let her alone," said Joe.)

"I'll be a match for all noodles and all rogues," returned my sister, beginning to work herself into a mighty rage. "And I couldn't be a match for the noodles without being a match for your master, who's the dunder-headed king of the noodles. And I couldn't be a match for the rogues, without being a match for you, who are the blackest-looking and the worst rogue between this and France. Now!"

"You're a fool shrew, Mother Gargery," growled the journeyman. "If that makes a judge of rogues, you ought to be one."

("Let her alone, will you?" said Joe.)

"What did you say?" cried my sister, beginning to scream. "What did you say? What did that fellow Orlick say to me, Pip? What did he call me, with my husband standing by? O! O! O!" Each of these exclamations was a shriek; and I must remark of my sister, what is equally true of all the violent people I have ever seen, that passion was no excuse for her, because it is undeniable that, instead of lapsing into passion, she consciously and deliberately took extraordinary pains to force herself into it, and became blindly furious by regular stages; "what was the name he gave me before the base man who swore to defend me? O! Hold me! O!"

"Ah-h-h!" growled the journeyman, between his teeth, "I'd hold you, if you was my wife. I'd hold you under the pump, and choke it out of you."

("I tell you, let her alone," said Joe.)

"O! To hear him!" cried my sister, with a clap of her hands and a scream together—which was her usual vent—"To hear this fellow backing me! That Orlick! In my own house! Me, a married woman! With my husband standing by! O! O!" Here my sister, after a fit of clappings and screamings, let her hands upon her bosom and upon her knees, and threw her cap off and pulled her hair down—which were the last stages on her road to hysterics. Being by this time a perfect Fury and a complete success, she made a dash at the door, which I had fortunately locked.

What could the wretched Joe do now, after his disregarded parenthetical interruptions, but stand up in the chimney-corner and look into the fire? He could not do it long, for my sister was quite incensed by the mildness and submission that he meant by interfering betwixt himself and Mrs. Joe; and further, whether he was man enough to come on? Orlick felt that the situation admitted of nothing less than coming on, and was on his defense straightway; so, without so much as pulling off their singed and burned aprons, they fell at one another like two bears. But if any man in that neighborhood could stand up long against Joe I never saw the man. Orlick, in the course of one round, discovered than the pale young gentleman, was very soon among the coal-dust and in no hurry to come out of it. Old Orlick Joe unlocked the door and picked up my sister, who had dropped insensible at the window (but who had seen the fight first, I think), and who was carried into the house and laid down, and who was recommended to survive, and would do nothing but struggle and clench her hands in Joe's hair. Then came that singular period of solemn stillness which succeed all paroxysms, and then, with the vague sensation which I have always connected with that lull—namely, that it was Sunday, and everybody was dead—I went up stairs to dress myself.

When I came down again I found Joe and Orlick sweeping up, and no other trace of discomposure than a slit in one of Orlick's nostrils, which was neither expressive nor ornamental. As per agreement, I appeared before Dolge Bargemen, and they were sharing it by turns in a peaceable manner. The lull had a sedative and philosophic influence on Joe, who followed me out into the road to say, in a subdued declamation that might do me good, "On the Rampage, Pip, and off the Rampage, Pip—such is Life!"

With which general emotion I drew off, that the feelings that are very serious in a man quite comical in a boy) I found myself again going to Miss Havisham's counters little fire. But now I passed and repassed the gate many times before I could make up my mind to ring; nor have I declared whether I should ring at all without ringing; nor how I should undoubtedly have gone, if my time had been my own to come back.

Miss Sarah Pocket came to the gate. No Estella.

"How, then? You here again?" said Miss Pocket. "What do you want?"

When I said that I only came to see how Miss Havisham was, Sarah evidently deliberated whether or not she should go and tell about my business. But unwilling to hazard the responsibility, she let me in, and presently brought the sharp message that I was to "come up."

Every thing was unchanged, and Miss Havisham was alone. "Well?" said she, fixing her eyes upon me. "I hope you want nothing? You'll get nothing."

"No, indeed, Miss Havisham. I only wanted you to know that I am doing very well in my apprenticeship, and am always much obliged to you."

"There, there!" with the old restless fingers. "Come now and then; come on your birthday.—Ay!" she cried suddenly, turning herself and her chair toward me, "you are looking round for Estella? Hey?"

I had been looking round, in fact, for Estella; and I stammered that I hoped she was well.

"Abroad," said Miss Havisham; "educating for a lady; far out of reach; prettier than ever; admired by all who see her. Do you feel that you have lost her?"

There was such a malignant enjoyment in her utterance of the last words, and she looked me into such a disagreeable laugh, that I was at a loss what to say. She spared me the trouble of considering by dismissing me. When the gate was closed upon me by Sarah, of the walnut-shell countenance, I felt more than ever dissatisfied with my home and with my trade and with every thing; and that was all I took by that motion.

As I was loitering along the High Street, looking in disconsolately at the shop-windows, and thinking what I should buy if I were a gentleman, who should come out of the book-shop but Mr. Wopsle. Mr. Wopsle had in his hand the affecting tragedy of George Barnwell, in which he had that moment invested sixpence, with the view of holding every word of it by the head of Pumblechook, with whom he was going to drink tea. No sooner did he see me than he appeared to consider that a special Providence. He put a 'prentice in his way to be read at; and he laid hold of me, and insisted on my accompanying him to the old churchyard to hear it. As I knew it would be miserable at home, and as the nights were dark and the way was dreary, and almost any companionship on the road better than none, I made no great resistance; consequently we turned into Pumblechook's just as the street and the shops were lighting up.

As I never assisted at any other representation of George Barnwell, I don't know how long it may usually take; but I know very well that it took until past nine o'clock that night, and that wh n Mr. Wopsle got into Newgate I thought he never would go to the scaffold, he became so much slower than at any former period of his disgraceful career. I thought it a little too much that he should complain of being out short in his part, for that was as if he had not been running to seed, leaf after leaf, ever since he was taken up. This, however, was a mere question of length and conscientiousness. What stung me was the identification of the whole affair with my unoffending self. When Barnwell began to go wrong, I declare that I felt positively apologetic, as Pumblechook's indignant stare so taxed me with it. Wopsle, too, took pains to present me in the worst light. At once forsworn and soft-headed, I was made to murder my uncle with no extenuating circumstances whatever; Millwood put me down in argument as a minx gone astray; it became sheer monomania in my master's daughter to care a button for me; and all I can say for my gasping and perspiring on the pavement on the fatal morning is, that it was worthy of the general feebleness of my character. Even after I was happily hanged, and Wopsle had closed the book, Pumblechook sat staring at me, and shaking his head, and saying, "Take warning, boy! take warning!" as if it were a well-known fact that, in my previous state of existence, I constantly murdering a near relation, provided I could induce one to have the weakness to become my benefactor.

It was a very dark night when it was all over, and when I set out with Mr. Wopsle on the walk home. Beyond town we found a heavy mist out, and it felt very damp to me, and shaking his head, and saying, "Take warning, boy! take warning!" as if it were a well-known fact that, in my previous state of existence, I contributed

THE PRAYER AT SUMTER.

We publish herewith an illustration of one of the most striking scenes in the present national crisis—we may say in the history of the nation. The scene is described in a letter from Fort Sumter.

It is known that, on leaving Fort Moultrie, Major Anderson brought away with him the flag which he had been in the habit of hoisting over that fort. He entered Sumter on the night of 26-27th Dec., and determined to hoist the flag at noon on 27th. We give the scene in the words of an eye-witness:

"A short time before noon Major Anderson assembled the whole of his little force, with the workmen employed on the fort, around the foot of the flag-staff. The national ensign was attached to the cord, and Major Anderson, holding the end of the lines in his hands, knelt reverently down. The officers, soldiers, and men clustered around, many of them on their knees, all deeply impressed with the solemnity of the scene. The chaplain made an earnest prayer—such an appeal for support, encouragement, and mercy, as one would make who felt that 'Man's extremity is God's opportunity.' As the earnest, solemn words of the speaker ceased, and the men responded Amen with a fervency that perhaps they had never before experienced, Major Anderson drew the 'Star Spangled Banner' up to the top of the staff, the band broke out with the national air of 'Hail Columbia,' and loud and exultant cheers, repeated again and again, were given by the officers, soldiers, and workmen. 'If,' said the narrator, 'South Carolina had at that moment attacked the fort, there would have been no hesitation upon the part of any man within it about defending that flag.'"

FORT SUMTER.

By the kindness of two officers of Major Anderson's command, who forwarded sketches to us by Lieutenant Talbot on his recent mission to Washington, we are enabled to lay before our readers, in this Number, a complete series of illustrations of Fort Sumter, the work toward which every eye in this country is now directed. We publish on page 56 an exterior view of Sumter; on page 57 a large engraving of the great battery; and on page 60 several views of the interior of the work. All of these, as we stated, are from pictures drawn, within a day or two, by officers of Major Anderson's command.

The following description of the fort is from high authority:

"Fort Sumter is a modern truncated pentagonal fort, built upon an artificial island at the mouth of Charleston harbor, three and three-eighths miles distant from the city of Charleston. The island has for its base a sand and mud bank, with a superstructure, if we may so term it, of the refuse chips from several Northern granite quarries. These rocks are firmly imbedded in the sand, and upon them the present fortification is reared. The island itself cost half a million of dollars, and was ten years in construction. The fortification cost another half million dollars, and at the time of its occupancy by Major Anderson was so nearly completed as to admit the introduction of its armament. The walls are of solid brick and concrete masonry, built close to the edge of the water and without a berme. They are sixty-feet high and from eight to twelve feet in thickness, and are pierced for three tiers of guns on the north, east, and west exterior sides. Its weakest point is on the south side, of which the masonry is not only weaker than that of the other sides, but it is not protected by any flank fire, which would sweep the wharf. Once landed, an entrance may, at the present state of the construction, be easily made; for the blinds of the lower embrasures, though six inches in thickness, may yet be easily blown away, and even if this was impossible, scaling ladders can reach those of the second tier, which are not protected in this manner.

"The work is designed for an armament of one hundred and forty pieces of ordnance of all calibres. Two tiers of the guns are under bomb-proof casements, and the third or upper tier open, or, in military parlance, en barbette; the lower tier for forty-two-pounder Paixhan guns; the second tier for eight and ten inch Columbiads, for throwing solid or hollow shot, and the upper tier for mortars and twenty-four-pound guns. The full armament of the fort, however, had not arrived there when Major Anderson took possession; but since its occupancy by the present garrison no efforts have been spared to place the work in an efficient state of defense, by mounting all the available guns and placing them in salient points. As we before remarked, the full armament of the fort is not in position, as only seventy-five of the one hundred and forty guns required for it are now mounted. Eleven Paixhan guns are among that number—nine of them commanding Fort Moultrie, which is within easy range, and the other two pointing toward Castle Pinckney, which is well out of range. Some of the Columbiads, the most effective weapon for siege or defensive operations, are not mounted. Four of the thirty-two-pounder barbette guns are on pivot carriages, which gives them the entire range of the horizon, and others have a horizontal sweep of fire of 160 degrees. In addition to these weightier preparations for defense, the walls are pierced every where for muskets, of which there are endless numbers ready and loaded. The magazine contains seven hundred barrels of gunpowder and an ample supply of shot, powder, and shells for one year's siege, and a large amount of miscellaneous artillery stores. The garrison is amply supplied with water from artificial wells, which are supplied by the frequent showers of rain.

"In a defensive or strategical point of view, Fort Sumter radiates its fire through all the channels from the sea approach to Charleston, and has a full sweep of range in its rear, or city side. The fort is sufficiently out of range from a land artillery attack, so that all apprehensions for breaching it from that source may be put at rest. The maximum range of the guns from Sumter is three miles; but for accurate firing, sufficient to hull a vessel, the distance would require to be reduced one-half of that figure. The war garrison of the fort is six hundred men, but only seventy-nine of that number are within its walls."

Some military men have communicated to the Herald a plan for taking Fort Sumter, which is likely to be adopted by the South Carolinians in the event of an attack. The Herald says:

"The question so often mooted, Is Fort Sumter impregnable against any attack that may be made by the South Carolina troops? we answer emphatically in the negative. In making this statement we have the opinion of an officer who has served twenty-seven years in the American army, who says the work can be carried by an assault on the south or gorge side of the fort—its weakest point—and thus force the main gateway entrance to the work, and by attacks with smaller detachments effecting an entrance through upon embrasures of the fort, at which no guns are mounted. The attack would no doubt be made just before daybreak, so that the movements of the assailants would be covered by darkness. At all events, the only obstacle to the approach of a flotilla from Charleston would be exposure to the fire of a few barbette guns; and if the attacking force should be so fortunate as to gain a position within one-half a mile of the fort these guns could not be depressed enough to keep the assailants in short range; hence the defense of the fort would depend upon the mastery of the garrison, and, when the assailants shall approach near the wall of the fort, to complete the defense with hand-grenades and shells dropped from the ramparts. That the assault of Fort Sumter is fully planned we have not the slightest doubt; and that that attack, when it shall be put into execution, will be made upon the most scientific and strategical principles."

The same authority gives us the following about Columbiad guns:

"Many persons are under the impression that guns of very large size, such as those with which Fort Sumter is armed, can do great damage at a distance of four or five miles; but such is not the fact, as ascertained by actual experiment by the United States Board of Ordnance. Commander Dahlgren, in his work on heavy artillery, has given the result. The farthest range of a hundred-pound shell, even at an elevation of thirty-five degrees, gives to the gun, a 8438 yards; the time of flight being thirty-five seconds. The great twelve-inch Columbiad, the largest gun made, loaded with twenty-five pounds of powder, a shell of 173 pounds, and the piece at an elevation of thirty-five degrees, has made a range only of 5460 yards, the projectile occupying thirty-two seconds in its flight. By increasing the elevation to thirty-nine degrees, only 100 yards more was gained in the range. From the same gun, with a charge of powder twenty-eight pounds, a shell of 180 pounds, and an elevation of thirty-five degrees, a range of 5671 yards has been attained; and at an elevation of thirty-nine degrees, a range of 8761 yards (three and a third miles), which is the greatest that has ever been accomplished by any gun in our service. The flight occupied forty-six seconds. Charleston is therefore perfectly safe from the guns of Fort Sumter. If it were even within the farthest range of those guns, the angle of elevation necessary to accomplish such a distance is so extreme that to hit the city would be a matter of extreme uncertainty. The guns of Fort Sumter can only be raised to an elevation of thirty-three degrees, on account of the embrasure, and consequently could do no damage beyond about two miles and a half.

"A ten-inch Columbiad, at an elevation of thirty-three degrees, will throw a shell about three miles. There are no such guns in barbette at Fort Sumter, and if there are any casemate guns of that calibre no such elevation could be had. The upper surface of the gun would strike against the top of the embrasure at an elevation far short of thirty-three degrees."

The garrison of the fort consists of the following United States troops:

The Italians, now generally united under the sway of Victor Emanuel, demand that the whole peninsula, from the Alps to the Mediterranean, be united under one head. The brave but hopeless struggle which the ex-King of Naples is making at Gaeta will soon be brought to a close. As soon as Venetia is settled, the Pope will probably be disposed of, without bloodshed, by some scheme which will leave him a nominal sovereign without lay subjects, residing within the dominions of the King of Italy. But the question of Venetia can not apparently be decided without an appeal to arms. The Italians are determined that Venetia shall form part of their kingdom. The Venetians are bent on freeing themselves from a foreign yoke. Austria, on the other hand, resolutely refuses either to sell or to give away Venetia on any terms. This seems to be one of those questions which can not be settled without an appeal to arms. Some compromises have been suggested by friends of peace; but we do not think they have created much much respect from either side. An appeal to force alone can settle the question; and, as both sides are preparing for it, it may be taken for granted that we have not seen the last of the thereabouts, and that Venetia will form part of the kingdom of Italy before the end of the summer.

FORT MOULTRIE AT PRESENT.

WE publish on page 53, from sketches just sent us from Charleston, two pictures of Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island, Bay of Charleston, South Carolina. One of them represents the Battery at Moultrie, opposite Fort Sumter; the other the guns and gun-carriages disabled by Major Anderson before he left. We may add that Fort Moultrie is at present under the command of General Dunovant, of the South Carolina army, and that under him is serving Major Ripley, ex United States officer, whose history of the war with Mexico is well known. A correspondent of the Evening Post visited Fort Moultrie last week, and thus describes it:

"Fort Moultrie is, as the newspapers will tell you, 'an inclosed work of battery, having a front on the south, or water side, of a depth of about three hundred feet, built with salient and re-entering angles on all sides, and is admirably adapted for defence, either from the attack of a stunning party or by regular approaches.' That is to say, provided it is not exposed to the fire of a hostile position in Fort Sumter. Passing along its narrow and not very deep moat, we joined the throng of the spectators at the entrance.

"Here a couple of soldiers on guard, with crossed muskets and bayonets, blocked the way, and an officer (I believe a lieutenant) responded to many applications for admission, according to the rule. Passes were carried, in a quantity of newly-washed linen, a negress in a pyramidal turban of bright colors, half a dozen recruits, a bottle of whisky, and a cheese were passed in. Under cover of this seat. If any person persists in pushing in when the seats are full, he excites a natural indignation, and is regarded as an intruder and not a gentleman. So well established is this understanding that, when a passenger upon the street hails an omnibus which is full, the people inside call up to the driver peremptorily, "Full!" and he drives on without heeding the uplifted finger upon the sidewalk.

Now your Committee wish to know why the same rule should not regulate the system of horse-cars? When they are full—that is, when every seat is occupied, let it be the duty of the driver to do as the late lamented David Crockett advised, regardless of threats and oaths from the impatient candidate in the street. This is reason—this is common sense, and is the equal right of every man who has occasion to use a car; and if the holders of stock would run such a regulation, then let it be adopted by all means. It may reduce their dividends from fifteen per cent. to twelve, but let them be made to suffer that less rather than permitted to break their contract with the public.

Your Committee, therefore, beg leave to recommend strongly (not "to strongly recommend"), the careful consideration of Senator Ramsay's proposition in the Legislature of this State to reduce the ordinary fare from five cents to three, and to halve that rate for every passenger who is compelled to stand. As a matter, however, your Committee would suggest that the rate of fare be continued at five cents, and that the company pay that sum to every passenger for whom that company does not furnish a seat. The matter can be arranged just as easily for cars as for omnibuses.

And if you will consent, with three cheers for Senator Ramsay, will ever pray—to be delivered from all extortion.

MORE LIGHT.

IT is curious and interesting to watch the progressive development in Europe of the principles of civil and religious liberty which are so dear to us Americans. In the course of the French Emperor, if a tacking course, is still an advancing one; the resurrection of Italy, which will yet be fully accomplished, is one of the contemporary miracles; the completion of the system of self-emancipation in Russia; the erection of the French Senate into a kind of independent power, and the removal of various restrictions of the press, are all signs of day, so that the new year opens with more hope than any year in history.

But the wonder of wonders is that Austria is moving. King Canute may plant his throne and bid the sea retire, but he will infallibly get his feet wet if he does not presently retire himself. The Emperor of Austria has been latterly the peculiarly well-beloved son of the venerable P. O. M., the Papa of the Faithful at Rome. Rome has used the unshrinking hand of Austria to "maintain order" in the Papal dominions. Only yesterday I saw the photograph of the soldier who saved the American family in Perugia, last year, and if he were the best of the soldiery (and he is quite a good fellow it appears), what must the worst of them have been? It is not that they were an Austrian, but the force of Rome has been Austrian.

Then the secret history of that empire, of which Mr. Abbott gives us the details as they have been exposed in modern times, is as fearful and repulsive as that of imperial Rome or Bourbon France. Always there is a change of ill. But who shall tell the truth of the melancholy Spielburg? Even in the dark places the light begins to shine. Even in Austria there are some signs of sunrise.

There is to be freedom of religious worship in the Austrian dominions. Think of that, Papa Pio! The neutral relations of the different sects is to be established upon an equitable footing and "upon real love for one's neighbor." Was not that thunder, your Eminence, Cardinal Minister of State, Antonelli? Public instruction is to be promoted by every possible means, says Baron von Schmerling; the Austrian Premier; and the free development of nationalities is to be "accorded."

That is vague, but it may mean something. He says, further, that "every preventive interference is removed from the press." Does that mean freedom of the press? Publicity is to be introduced to the civil and penal courts. That is good, except that it would seem to be more probable that the courts are to be introduced to the public. There is also to be an extension of electoral rights and privileges.

So finely reads the programme. But a traveler of the old guard of 1848, like the Lounger, is very wary and slow to accept the promises of Empires. They must come, sooner or later; but he is a wise prophet who can say exactly when Austria, too, must grant the freedom and arouse. The rising tide of popular development will float her off and on at last. Although, at the opening of the year, the most listless Lounger can see that nations are more excited than at any time within his experience—except the old Loungers who date from 1812—yet he is not to say, that in all the movements the good old cause is not back, but that the principles of our American Fathers are becoming the faith and practice of the world.

FREAKS OF FAME.

FAME is a coy goddess. She stamps for immortality the wise and the foolish, the good and bad, alike. Washington and Benedict Arnold will walk together down in our future visionary history. He who built and he who fired the temple shall be equally remembered. The goddess, indeed, has two hands, one black and the other white. Yet it is but the difference of a syllable. With one hand she seals men to be famous; with the other, infamous.

It is so that one of the peculiar associations of one of the most quaint of New England towns is to be explained. Salem is one of the decayed great sea-ports of an earlier day. Probably the first American ship sailed for Calcutta out of Salem harbor. The merchants are Salem East India Company. It dealt with remote and half-fabulous lands; and from the trade its merchants accumulated half-fabulous fortunes. To this day the solitary ship that, on some summer morning, you may see standing out of the harbor, is probably going for spices, and ivory, and strange stuffs at Zanzibar. To this day you may find yourself paying for the railroad ticket that shall bring you away with a bill of "Asiatic Bank"—the very name suggesting lacs of rupees, and rich palaces crusted with jewels, and solid coin, and bars of Oriental gold. And still, as you walk about the narrow streets, you come upon immense square houses, mostly of brick, sometimes of wood—suburban palaces. The general aspect of silence, inaction, and decline fingers upon the deserted marble thresholds. They stand upon the street and about the square with speechless rigidity, like the old Roman Senators in the Forum—like the Gods same and plucked their beards. Alas! the Lungers of to-day pluck those stately houses by the beard! Where be your dwellings now—your ships, your grandeur? And a mournful echo answers across the waste common, "Gone to Boston!"

Let us stop here. The fact is quite too much like Aaron's rod, and begins to blossom with all kinds of moralization. The particular freak of fame that it is our last to mention is, that in this interesting, historic town, with the ancient witch-relics (they show in a bottle the pins that the witches stuck into people), the object of most universal interest to the stranger is the house in which Capt. Mr. White was murdered! By-and-by it will be the gable-roofed house in Union Street in which Hawthorne was born.

I remember as a boy seeing, in a lonely room of a melancholy "museum," a representation of the White murder in wax. It was in a glass case, and the murderer had on real clothes, and held a real dagger in his raised hand, and he wore a real glazed cap on his head. I was always drawn to the spot and fascinated as if by a magnet, but I was always in mortal terror lest the wicked man should turn and look at me with real eyes: and to this day I never see a dress of a glazed cap without wondering whether he murdered Mr. White, or whether he will not stab somebody with a dagger before he takes his cap off.

The house is one of the fine mansions; but it is built of wood, not brick. You ask at once for Brown Street—one of the corners of the common—for guard, and the whole dark story is present in your mind. Why this murder of an old man—who was to go public property, and of so especial public prominence—should be one of the most famous crimes in our modern history, and invest a town with a kind of ghastly interest, is a question not easily answered, until you consider that the actors were of a class in which murderers are rarely found, that the argument against them was the greatest criminal law plea of Daniel Webster. It is this last fact which explains the peculiar interest of strangers. The argument of Webster is like the most artful romance. It has the most intense interest of description and detail, and its peroration is more truly eloquent than any part of any sheer effort of imagination. This plea makes the scene of the murder in Salem what Scott's story makes the Tolbooth in Edinburgh—memorable and interesting, not for itself, but for the power that deals with it.

Few towns are more quaintly interesting than Salem. Yet it owes half a freak of fame it happens that it is noted for the gone glory of its commerce, its wretched witch-delusions, and the murder of one of its aged citizens.

A LITTLE MUSIC.

AMONG the means and influences of modern civilization there is one domestic instrument which has not had its due commendation, and that is the familiar piano. It stands in the parlor, a necessary piece of furniture even to families of but moderate means, ready to join its voice in leading the psalm tune, or the last new love-song, or the stroll ballad, or to reproduce the passionate sighs and exquisite dreams of the great composers. The piano is a feminine instrument, sounds best or gushing by the hearth-stone—a grove of fresh and fragrant melodies planted in the home and perennially blooming. It is the voice of the past and the future—a wondrous casket of tender memories: you lift the lid, and there lie the days and the loves that were!

But it is a great pity that the young people should be unwilling to play unless they can play like Thalberg or the famous players. What would become of the world if everybody could only paint unless they could paint like Titian or Raphael? or the merchants to engage in trade except they could be Rothschilds or Barings? or the young men to study unless they could be Humboldts? or that you are asked to sit down at the piano and play or sing, you are not permitted to do better than anybody else ever did; no, nor so well as many?

Why should you flatter yourself by the supposition that you are? If you can play simply some simple old melody in a simple manner, without trying to rumble over the keys in variations. The romance of an Irish or Scotch air is sure to enchant the audience even after famous players and singers. Thalberg played nothing more captivating than Home, sweet Home; Jenny Lind sang nothing more tender and touching than John Anderson my jo or Auld Robin Gray; and the most charming point of Fiotow's opera of Martha is the melody of the Last Rose of Summer.

These things belong rather to singing than playing. But it is one of the delights of the piano that it is a voice as well as an instrument. If you have more than the common sentimental enjoyment of music, you will naturally wish to become familiar with the literature of the piano. Then you will not be content to sing at the bay-board, but you will read Beethoven, and Weber, and Mendelsohn, and Chopin, and Mozart there. And as sure as you do that only by hard study and constant practice, it is not worth while to try unless you feel that you really wish to master the instrument. You may hum upon the keys the pleasant melodies, and we shall all be grateful, even if you are unable to sing them out boldly: but no mere smattering of the great composers is tolerable. Play well, or touch not the enchanted keys, is the rule with them.

There is no mystery greater than that of an ear for music. It is inscrutable how one man should have such wonderful sensibilities of enjoyment, and his neighbor, apparently of as fine a temperament, be utterly unable to understand his delight. Color blindness is one of the recent interesting speculations. It is quite without seeing, as it were; as the want of an ear for music is hearing without perceiving. It is looking upon a language you do not understand; but he who can read it is thrilled and penetrated by a power incredible to you.

And yet so many are gifted with the hearing ear that one touch of music makes the whole world kin. In Canada, upon the desert, on shipboard, in lovely mountains, in gay cities, the familiar song restores the friends and the places with whom and in which it was heard, and the singer, entranced, floats homeward, wherever he may be, as the wanderer died contented as he heard at last the ringing of the evening bells of Limerick. Will they ever forget, O Richard, O mon roi! who have heard thy manly voice pealing out like cathedral chimes,

"The bells of Shandon,
That sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the River Lee."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ITALY'S CHRISTMAS WAITS.

YES!—Christmas comes but once a year—
The longest for their pains;
Who dread the ills of Christmas bills,
And don't appreciate "Waits."
There's frost upon the window-panes,
There's snow upon the sky,
While underneath the blankets
Is your humble I.
For worse than save a-setting,
Or dogs that bay the moon,
Those horrid Waits with wheezy flute,
Cracked cornet and bassoon!

But let me hug this comfort still,
There are worse fates than mine;
Try but 'gainst others' misery, and's grace
Our Christmas Waits combine!
But there are those of the same sex,
That work more wide anney,
Whole nations of them, as the spi ure,
And kingdoms' peace destroy;
There's Kossuth-ballon—while her flag
Dark France to arms invites—
A Christmas Wait at Gaeta
Breaks Bomba's repose.

His drum ecclesiastical
The Pope, that holy man,
A Christmas Wait, is also beating
From out the Vatican.
While Antonelli fills with breath
His brazen serpents' round,
And rattles forth the Christmas box
Where Peter's Pence resound.
Poor Italy may have her wars,
And bid these Waits begone;
But still they'll play their discord loud,
And won't move off or on.

And, last, as if such Waits as these Weren't of themselves enough
To break the rest of Italy
With rude alarms and rough,
Comes he, who darkling discord still
Can find the music in make,
Who keeps not only Italy,
But Europe wide awake.
No Christmas Wait like him who plants
At Rome his red-legged band,
Whose tricolor at Gaeta
Helps Bombaline's stand.

AN ESCUTCHEON SUGGESTED.—At Leeds, near Hayfe, France, a cap was seen in the water with a string of corks around it, and a label upon it, inscribed, "Pull this string, and I am at the end of it!" The string was pulled, and brought there was found the late writer of the letter, with a paper, detailing the cause of his intended away with him; the same and inclosing the medicine grey stone.

A lawyer, on circuit, dropped a ten-pound note under the table, while playing cards at the inn. He did not discover his loss until he got to bed, but then returned immediately. On reaching the room he was met by the waiter, who said, "I know what you want, Sir; you have lost something." "Yes, I have lost a ten-pound note." "Well, Sir, I have got it safe here in bed." "Thanks, my good lad, here is a sovereign for you." "No, Sir; I won't be reward for being honest, but," looking at him with a knowing grin, "wasn't it lucky that none of the gentlemen found it?"

A priest, proceeding to the chapel one Sunday morning through the burial-ground, observed several sprightly girls seated on a tombstone, and wishing to be jocular with them, asked what they were doing there. "Nothing at all, place yer reverence," was the reply of one of them. "Nothing!" said he. "What is nothing?" "Shut your eyes, your Riverence," retorted one of the girls, "and you'll see it."

Husbands and letter-paper should always be well ruled.

STRAY THOUGHTS.

Your calman is the most aspiring of mortals: no matter what his rank may be, he is always looking for a hive.

A round of pleasure sometimes renders it difficult to make both ends square.

EVEN a puffing tradesman sometimes underrates himself; his cheap puff, "twenty years in bottle," turns out to be older; his delivery to be Medoc's cradle-born O.D.

If the schoolmaster is still abroad, why does not he come home and educate the ignorant?

Who cares to know the pedigree of a London sausage? Animal instinct is one of the most extraordinary things under the sun. Why should a sheep cut capers in a turnip field?

Nature is dependent on Art. What is beauty without sweep?

HOW BE SAVED A SHILLING.—A Journeyman weaver took to his employer a piece of cloth he had just finished. Upon examination, two holes but half an inch apart were found, for which a deduction of two shillings was demanded. "Do you charge the same for small as for large holes?" asked the workman. "Certainly—not a shilling for every hole, big or little."—Whereupon the workman immediately tore the two holes into one, exclaiming, "Then save a shilling, any how." His employer was so well pleased with his wit that he remitted the whole fine in case.

"Well, Jane, this is a queer world," said Joe to his wife; "a set of women philosophers has just sprung up." "Indeed!" said Jane, "and what do they hold?" "The strangest thing in nature," said he—"their tongues!"

The man that was stuck up with pride has been taken down, and hangs on his own hook at present. In case the hook should give way, let him lie upon his own inflatables until he is prepared to sleep on a clear conscience.

Dobbs (who is a jolly old bachelor) and a bright young lady were discussing the relative bantering each other in marriage. "Oh," said she, "you'll get married one of these days. I know you will." "Indeed!" said he, "and what do they hold?" "The strangest thing in nature," said he—"their tongues!"

The extensive authority of parents under the Chinese laws is well known. A Chinese father "kept his son" above aged mother flogged him every day, shed tears in the company of every visitor, and said, "Why do you weep? Are things are not as they used to be! The poor woman's arm grows feebler every day."

"How many times can you play?" asks Timmins of a street fiddler. "Any you like to call for." "Can you play Beautiful Star?" "Yes." "Old Dog Tray?" "Yes." "Polly, put the Kettle on?" "Yes." "Evening Hymn?" "Yes." "Then play them all together, for I'm in a hurry!"

We suppose that there is quite as large an amount of cash upon the hand as there is upon the water.

A hopeful schoolmaster says he has a pupil in his eye. Our boss with he, he can't see how there is room for one.

A man asked another, whom he was about to help to some chicken, whether he wished a leg or a wing. "It is a matter of indifference to me," said he, "which you do." "And infinitely more so to me," replied the carver, laying down the knife and fork, and resuming his own dinner.

A man's hat has but one nap on it; his bed has a new one every night.

When a man wants money or assistance, the world, as a rule, is very forgiving and indulgent, and—lets him want it.

Many a man thinks it a virtue that keeps him from turning a rascal, when it is only a little stomach. One should be careful, and not mistake potatoes for principles.

When two gentlemen fight a duel, each of them is a man after his own heart.

A GENTUS.—"Can you draw, young man?" inquired Gulp, of a youth who called for a private tutorship.—"Certainly," replied the candidate. "At ten years old I could draw a cheer; at twelve, a picture; at fifteen, a hand-cart, loaded with coals; and now I can draw a lawyer out of a jury, a bill of exchange. If I were an actor, I believe I could draw the public kind of a house; being a teacher, I am content to draw a salary, and the bigger the better." "Well, Sir," said Gulp, "call again."

Why can not the Emperor Napoleon insure his life? Because no one can be found who can make out his policy.

A San Francisco paper states that a system of wife-stealing has been developed among the Chinese of that city, which is based on upon the principle of insurance and semi-legal principle that the Celestials understand and accept. If a man be some fairly eminent man, who seems to be the end of the matter, the bereaved husband's only chance of ever being confined to his hopes of carrying off somebody else's wife.

THE MACHINE GOES BY STEAM.—There is a story of one of the linguists—he who got chaff because they need them, and had been appointed engineer, a business of which he had not learned the rudiments—that after his appointment a gentleman and two ladies had the curiosity to look at the engine-room and to examine the machinery. Finding the new office-holder on duty merely as usher, practical engineer doing the real duty of the so-called "assistant engineer." "How many horses power is your engine?" inquired one. "Horses-power?" replies grunty, with a look of mingled pity and contempt, "I don't know what the machine goes by steam."

In a recent case for assault the defendant pleaded guilty. "I think I must be guilty," said he, "because the plaintiff and I were both drunk; there was in the room; and the first thing I knew was that I was standing up, and he was doubled under the table. You'd better call it guilty."

If some men's bodies were not straighter than their minds they would be crooked enough to ride upon their own backs.

A QUANDARY.—If a person catch hold of your ear, and demand if he has the wrong pig by the ear, would you answer yes or no?

A man winds up his clock to make it run, and his business to make it stop.

THE DEATH OF ŒNONE.

I.

Now many a rolling month was gone,
And years were past away,
And Paris he dwelt in merry Troy town,
He and his lady gay.

The lady Œnone sate in her bower,
Nursing her sorrow and teen;
Ivy and briony twined her round,
And vine-leaves nodded between.

All pale and wan was that lone lady,
And thrice she deeply sighed:
"'Tis long, 'tis long for a knight to be Away from his own true bride.

"But here yesteren came the wild woman,
That redeth things to come,
And up the mountain-side she ran,
And away from her Trojan home.

"She spake me words so keen, so keen,
And shriek'd one deadly shriek;
And now I know the town below
Will fall by hand of Greek.

"And they will slay my traitor lord,
Their hands in his blood they will wet:
Now, by my fay," said the lone lady,
"I'll save my shepherd yet."

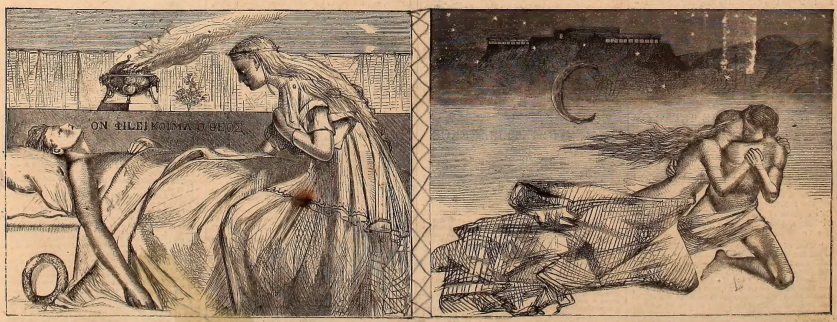
With that she clapt her lily-white hands,
Her lily-white hands clapt she,
And to her came running her sweet young son,
The boy was fair to see.

All men might tell that scann'd him well
He came of a royal race—
By the eyes below his forehead of snow,
And the light of his godlike face.

Twice seven summers on Ida hill,
And all with his lone, lone mother;
And all with the goats and painted pards,
For a sister and a brother.

"Now hie thee, hie thee, my winsome lad,
And tell your traitor sire,
The Greek will take Troy town so gay,
And burn it in the fire.

"The wild woman she redd it to me,
In sooth as I you say;
And yet there are days but two and three
And the Greek will have his way.



"SHE LOOK'D ON HIM DYING—THE SHEPHERD SHE KNEW—"

"AND DOWN SCAMANDER TWO SILENT GHOSTS."

"But tell him the wild wood twinkles green,
And waves the tall fir-tree;
And the hills might keep a shepherd, I ween,
That have long kept thee and me, my son,
That have long kept thee and me."

II.

Lady Helen she look'd from a window down,
Her face shone clear as the light:
"Now who comes walking thro' merry Troy town,
A boy full fair to the sight.

"All men may see by his bearing free
His come of a royal race—
By the eyes below his forehead of snow,
And the charm of his godlike face."

"O lady, I come from Ida hill,
In sooth as I you say;
And I would speak with Lord Paris:
Fair lady, say me not nay."

"Lo, I will bring thee to Lord Paris,
For thou art a comely lad;
And take this mantle thy shoulder upon,
I doubt it will make him glad."

She gave him a mantle so bright, so bright,
Her hands wove long ago;
"Fardy," she said, "he will love the lad
That I have engirded so."

Lord Paris lay in a chamber dark,
Apart from his Grecian wife;
He saw the very comeliest lad
He had seen in all his life.

He raised him up from his couch of gold,
He spoke the boy full fair;
Ay me, said he, what a stately height
That girt his shoulder there.

"Some trife," quoth he, "she wove long syne
For her Grecian husband true;
And this young lad that wears it now,
He shall it dearly rue."

With that he rushed upon the lad,
He smote a deadly blow:
The straight young limbs on the floor lay dead,
And life's blood ran therefro.

Then up and spake the Lady Helen,
"Lord Paris, now what have you done?
The mantle I wove long syne for you,
And this was your sweet young son."

III

They told his lone mother on Ida hill,
At the setting of the sun:
Never a sigh nor a shriek she utter'd—
Of mother's tears there was none.

She looked with no word out over the sea,
Then when the day was done:
"O gold! come never more help from me
To the slayer of my young son!"

They buried the boy by salt-sea shore,
Waves came soothing his sleep;
Lord Paris at eventide wander'd forth,
And laid him down there to weep.

Lame Philoctetès bent his bow—
Full well might he see him there lie—
Said, "Greet now brave Hector, Lord Paris, below,
For this hour thou shalt die."

He smote him right into the traitor heel,
Smote him there as he lay
"Now bear me to Ida," said Lord Paris,
"With all the speed ye may.

"The lady Œnone hath cunning and skill,
Never knife so mighty a foe;
And if to save me she but will,
This arrow is harmless to me."

She look'd on him dying—the shepherd she knew—
And then she look'd on him dead:
"A false, false-hearted man he was,
But he was fair," she said.

When the stars began to look out from heaven,
A corpse by his side she lay:
And down Scamander two silent ghosts
Slode into the evening gray.

THE FIRING ON THE "STAR OF THE WEST."

We publish on page 52 a fine illustration of the firing on the Star of the West from the Morris Island Battery Harbor of Charleston, on 10th January, 1861. The event was mentioned in our last Number; and it is only necessary to say here that she was on her way to Fort Sumter with men and supplies for the reinforcement of Major Anderson. The captain of the Star of the West, by name M'Gowan, gives the following account of the event:

"When we arrived about two miles from Fort Moultrie —Fort Sumter being about the same distance—a masked battery on Morris Island, where there was a red Palmetto flag flying, opened fire upon us—distance, about five-eighths of a mile. We had the American flag flying at our flag-staff at the time, and, soon after the first shot, hoisted a large American ensign at the fore. We continued on under the fire of the battery for over ten minutes, several of the shots going clean over us. One passed just clear of the pilot-house. Another passed between the smoke-stack and walking-beams of the engine. Another struck the ship just abaft the fore-rigging, and stove in the planking; and another came within an ace of carrying away the rudder. At the same time there was a movement of two steamers from near Fort Moultrie—one of them towing a schooner (I presume an armed schooner) —with the intention of cutting us off. Our position now became rather critical, as we had to approach Fort Moultrie to within three-fourths of a mile before we could keep away for Fort Sumter. A steamer approaching us with an armed schooner in tow, and the battery on the island firing at us all the time, and having no ammunition for ourselves from the attack of the vessels, we concluded that, to avoid certain capture or destruction, our only endeavor to get to sea. Consequently, we wore round and steamed down the channel, the battery firing upon us until their shot fell short.

A reporter of the Evening Post, who was on board, thus describes the scene:

"On we go; the soldiers are below with loaded muskets, and the officers are ready to give the word if there is anything to do. Now it is broad daylight, and we are making directly into the great bay of Charleston, where the forts are distinctly visible. The little steamer at our right is burning a signal light aft, and is making all possible headway up the harbor. Now we discover a large steamer at our left on Morris Island, a little village called Cumming Point, and apparently but little more than a mile from Fort Sumter.

"It is possible that those fellows have got a battery off here?' asks one.

"'No,' answers another, 'there is no battery there.'

"But there is. We see the flash of a gun, and we are about two miles from Fort Sumter and Moultrie, which are equidistant from us, and, suddenly, whiz-z-l comes a ricochet shot across Morris Island. It plunges into the water and skips along, but falls short of our steamer. The fire was forward of our bow, and was, of course, no injunction to stop. But we are not ready to accept the proffered hospitality, and the captain pays no attention to it, except to run up the stars and stripes to the mast-head, and a second flag which was on board. A moment of anxious suspense, and there comes from the same point a second masked battery. The shot falls short of us a hundred yards or more, and bounds clean over our vessel aft, nearly on a line with the head of a sailor, but below the level above it.

"On we go, and—whiz-z-l again goes the smaller gun next fired, and another ricochet shot skips along the water and falls short of us.

"'Both!' exclaims the captain; 'you must give us bigger guns than that, boys, or you can not hurt us.'

"On we go, without heeding the compliments of our Charleston friends. Another moment and bang! again goes the heavy gun. The ball now strikes our ship in the water-chain, about the level of the deck, where a sailor was holding the lead to take the soundings, and the ball struck directly under his feet. It is not surprising that, under the circumstances, Jack was strongly inclined to take to his heels, and he began to scramble up with might and main, when the captain ordered him to his post. No danger, one ball having struck so near him; on the principle, I suppose, that lightning never strikes twice in the same place. Jack, therefore, patiently takes his place and drops the lead again.

"The ball, fortunately, was too far spent to go through the side of our vessel, although it left an honorable scar.

"The battery continues to play upon us, and a huge ball comes clean over us, and near the pilot-house. We can get within range of the guns of Fort Moultrie, and yonder is a cutter in for it; a steamer, apparently, is coming upon us. A moment longer, and we shall be in range of these three batteries. The gunners on Morris Island are growing confident. Two more fly-wheel shots, and we are round a shot through our side, scattering death and destruction. Moultrie, I expect, will bring her heavy guns to bear, and will drive their deadly missiles into our bow, while the cutter will open on our right.

"Why does not Major Anderson open fire upon that battery and save us? We look in vain for help; the American flag flies from Fort Sumter, but no answering flag at our bow and stern is fired upon, yet there is not the slightest recognition of our presence from the fort from which we took our departure. The reinforcements sent on Morris Island has cut off all hope of escape by running the enemy's batteries and gaining shelter under the forts. Is it possible that Fort Sumter has been taken by the South Carolinians? If it has not, why does not Major Anderson open fire and protect us, or at least recognize us in some way? To go within range of the guns of Fort Moultrie only to expose vessel, men, and stores to almost inhuman destruction, is to expose us to the enemy.

"'Helm out of port!' shouts the Captain, and the Star of the West is turned seaward, and we are out of range at time, as you may will imagine. We turn without accident, and steam away, with the stars and stripes still floating, and the battery still playing upon us by way of a parting salute."

A person who was on Morris Island at the time of the firing thus describes the excitement:

"The shots were fired by the Citadel Cadets, under command of Major Stephens, who has this had the honor, which he no doubt considers as equaling the surrender of Sumter. Major Stephens is at the head of the State Military Academy, which occupies the Charleston Citadel. He is apparently about forty years of age, 6 ft. high, of dark or black hair, black and heavy beard, and large black eyes. He is about the middle size, of lithe form, with quick, nervous motions. His guns were directed at the steamer with scientific accuracy, and even the shot which failed to strike the ship fell within a few feet of her, and bounded down, and she immediately retreated. She was struck certainly three times, and perhaps five. The last shot which took effect was fired after she had turned to go out. The steamer was seen to shoot forward with a jerk the instant the shot struck her. Two balls were struck within her hull; one just forward of her wheel-house, the other upon the larboard quarter."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Saturday, January 5, in the Senate, Senator Seward made his great speech on the crisis, expatiating on the injury that would be done to the Union by secession, the dissolution of the Union, and offering certain concessions, which are given below. The Senate was crowded to bear him, and all the diplomatic corps were present. Nothing of importance was done after he ended.——In the House, Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, introduced a resolution to give the right of way to the Star Spangled Banner, and to declare that it shall not be able to cover in the views which are certain, so far as I understand them, touching the authority, under existing laws, to reinforce the colonies of the country, the port of Charleston.

"Under such circumstances, after mature consideration, I have concluded that I can not longer continue in your Cabinet without disagreement to you and to myself, upon questions of vital importance to the country. I therefore request you to accept the resignation of the commission I now hold as Secretary of the Treasury. In order that my successor shall be appointed and qualified. In doing so I am myself the bearer of a request to you for an advance of the high respect and regard which, personally, I entertain for you, with which I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your friend and obedient servant,

"PHILIP F. THOMAS.

"THE PRESIDENT."

THE MISSISSIPPI ORDINANCE OF SECESSION.

The following is the Ordinance of Secession. An Ordinance to dissolve the Union between the State of Mississippi and other States united with her under the compact entitled 'The Constitution of the United States of America.'

"The people of Mississippi in Convention assembled declare and ordain, and it is hereby ordained and declared, as follows, to wit:

"Section 1. That all the laws and ordinances by which the said State of Mississippi became a member of the Federal Union of the United States of America be, and the same are hereby repealed, and that the Union now subsisting between the said State and the people thereof to observe the same by withdrawing from the said States shall cease to possess the rights, functions, and powers which by any of said laws and ordinances were possessed and exercised by the said United States, and is dissolved from all the obligations, restrictions, duties and liberties created by the Federal Union, and shall henceforth be a free, sovereign, and independent State.

"Section 2. That so much of the first section of the seventh article of the Constitution of this State requires members of the Legislature and all officers, legislative and judicial, to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, be and the same is hereby abrogated and annulled.

"Section 3. That all rights acquired and vested under the Constitution of the United States, or under any act of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, and now by law of this State, and not incompatible with this ordinance, shall remain in force, and have the same effect as the said ordinance had not been passed.

"Section 4. That the people of the State of Mississippi hereby consent to form a Federal Union with such of the States as have seceded, or may secede from the Union of the United States of America, upon the basis of the present Constitution of the said United States, except such parts thereof as embrace other portions than such seceding States.

"Adopted. Yeas 84, nays 15."

AFFAIRS AT CHARLESTON.

On Monday, January 14, communication passed between the Governor and Major Anderson. The Legislature passed unanimous resolutions declaring that any attempts to reinforce Fort Sumter will be regarded as an act of war. The Governor sent a Message to the House of Representatives declaring that he is guarding the coast only for the purchase of three steam propellers. He prefers small iron screw propellers. He has ordered the propeller to be provided with thirty-two seamen: one propeller to be stationed at Charleston, one at Georgetown, and one at Beaufort; also to fortify all the inlets and mouths of the rivers with obstacles and defenses. He says that he has had a constant communication between them as a protection against sudden hostile attack on Southern States. On Tuesday and Wednesday a bill passed the House staying the collection of all debts due to persons in the non-slaveholding States till after December next. Governor Pickens sent in a Message giving the details of the Steps Military Commission reported in favor of raising more troops, and urging the State on a war footing. The following telegraphic messages have been sent from Governor Pickens:

"C. S. Lamar, President Bank of the Republic, New York:

"SIR,—Authority has been positively published that no flag and no vessel will be disturbed or prevented from entering our harbor with stores bearing foreign brands or munitions of war for Fort Sumter.

"All such will be seized, and all vessels in commerce only will be gladly received. F. W. PICKENS."

THE SOUTH CAROLINA ARMY.

The following Message has been sent to the South Carolina Legislature:

"EXECUTIVE OFFICE, January 7, 1861.

"To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives:

"A Convention has passed resolutions authorizing the Governor to raise two regiments of militia men—one regiment for twelve months and one regiment for twelve additional months. Under these resolutions, I have commissioned fifteen from the companies down in point-Rinaldi, and in one instance I have commissioned a captain to raise immediately a full company. This force is the most effective expensive as possible to the State, I have for the present confined myself to the companies down in point-Rinaldi. Perhaps it may not be necessary to enlist for the second regiment.

"The Convention also, by resolution, authorizes the Governor to call immediately into active companies, and their officers, somewhat on the principle of volunteers, and to form them into a regiment by appointing the field-officers. I have made a call for one hundred men for present a present, and appointed Colonel Maxey Gregg, a brave and able officer, to command it. A portion of the company is in actual position on Sullivan's Island, and other companies for its support are arriving. This regiment is for six months. If a regiment of men enlisted for twelve months be called for, I suppose about 1,000 men will be necessary.

"The regiment for six months, under Colonel Gregg, will be at an expense of about $100,000. If the other regiment be called for, for six months, as above necessary, it will be an additional expense of $100,000.

"The Convention has specifically recommended that some provision be made for the pay and support of those regiments in such manner as the wisdom of the Legislature may adopt. I recommend also that the bill which is before the Legislature, entitled 'a bill for the establishment of a Coast Police for South Carolina,' be passed. This, it is supposed, will involve an expense of $250,000.

"The act passed to provide an armed military force may involve an expenditure of $50,000, and provision has been made for raising $400,000 more for the purchase of arms and munitions. These several sums amount to $1,400,000. It is hoped that circumstances may arise which will give a specific settlement to our difficulties; and if so, every reasonable endeavor will be made to prevent the expenditure of the whole amount; but the more certain way to produce a pacific turn to events is to be thoroughly prepared to meet any emergency. F. W. PICKENS."

ACTION OF THE SENATE ON THE NEW APPOINTMENTS.

On 12th the President sent to the Senate the nomination of Mr. Holt as Secretary of War. It was considered in Executive Session, and, from all accounts, the preliminary discussion—and it was a striking character—had an effect was made by its opponents to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, but this was unsuccessful and unreasonable, resisted, by the motion of reference being defeated by a vote of 34 against 18. The objection of Mr. Hale by his opponents is that, in their opinion, he is a corrionist, and this some of them openly avow. On 15th Mr. Holt's nomination was confirmed by 33 to 12.

The nomination of Mr. M'Intyre as Collector of Customs in the neighborhood of Charleston is still suspended in the Committee of Commerce.

WHY MR. THOMAS RESIGNED.

The following letter has been published:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11, 1861.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I do not see how it is any longer. You are aware, to agree with you, and with a majority of your constitutional advisers, in the measures which have been adopted in reference to the present condition of things in South Carolina. I feel that it is all probable that I shall be able to concur in the views which are certain, so far as I understand them, touching the authority, under existing laws, to reinforce the colonies of the country, the port of Charleston.

"Under such circumstances, after mature consideration, I have concluded that I can not longer continue in your Cabinet without disagreement to you and to myself, upon questions of vital importance to the country. PRESENT CONDITION OF CHARLESTON.

A Washington correspondent says: "I have just received a dispatch from Governor Pickens, stating that Major Anderson has now unincorporated mail facilities, and Major Anderson has now unincorporated mail facilities, and that no more is to be sent to market for fresh provisions and vegetables whatever desired. In fact, he has the same facilities that he enjoyed before he occupied Fort Moultrie.

"I am authorized to state by the South Carolina Commissioner that all property seized has been divested by the ordinance of the Convention, to be held subject to an adjustment of accounts between the two Governments hereafter.

"The Star Bill has not yet passed either House of the South Carolina Legislature. It is utterly false that any special sanction has been given to any other party currency. The contributions of negro labor have been entirely voluntary on the part of those who have rendered it. It is also the same of contributions of money, which have been very liberal. It is equally false that Governor Pickens or any body else, has had any requisition for money or labor made on him. All the appropriations of money made so far made by the Legislature have been furnished by the State banks in exchange for par, and the public debt paid from the Bank of State stock, of which the State is the only stockholder. Commerce goes on as usual with out restriction. There is no scarcity of provisions, and the market is at ordinary prices."

WILL FORT SUMTER BE SURRENDERED?

A telegram to the Herald, dated Washington, January 17, says: "Colonel Huyn sent his communication to the President to-day. It is understood to set forth the arrival of Colonel Hayne, after a free conference with his South ern friends here, in no somewhat changed the original intention and purpose, and instead of making an unconditional demand for the surrender and evacuation of Fort Sumter, he now presents it in the shape of a suggestion. He thereby leaves it to the discretion of the President of the surrender, in order to avoid bloodshed.

"The firmness of the Administration in dealing with the secession movement now have caused the prominent secessionists in the city to join in advising the withdrawal of Charleston, and the reservation of their threat to take Fort Sumter until after the 4th of March, and Major Anderson is to be provided with provisions from Charleston, providing the South Carolina authorities accept the proposition and Major Anderson accepts the following terms. The South Carolinians may yield, but it is believed that Major Anderson will not consent to leave Charleston for his supplies if his government will not supply him."

THE WILL IT BE TAKEN?

The following is an extract of a letter from a reliable gentleman in Charleston to a friend in this city:

"CHARLESTON, Jan. 11, 1861.

"The steamer Star of the West attempted on Wednesday night to come into our harbor to bring government troops, but she was driven back by our forces at Morris Island, and by the fire other than was made a similar attempt. We are in every way prepared to keep out any force that may attempt to enter here without such purposes. There is but one feeling here—the sentiment is unanimous not to submit to the rule of the President just having elected. It will not be done by South Carolina. This can be relied upon. Many of us suffer under hardships, but she can never be made to submit. It is utterly out of the question. Should there be a collision, I am ready to fight to death on this question. You can form no idea of the feeling here. Under no circumstances will be driven out of Fort Sumter if it costs 10,000 lives. This is a fixed fact, and in my opinion it will be done ere long. Every preparation is being made to do it. He is in a very strong fortification, and once that it is difficult to take, but it will be done by force of numbers. There are 16,000 men now anxious to make the attempt, but the authorities wish it done with the least loss of life, and will not be up to pouring themselves. It may be done before this reaches you, but I think not. Governor Pickens, whom Major Anderson surrenders, and that I do not think he will do. He has but about 1,000 effective men, and no force as a state of revolt. They are unwilling to fight in a war of this kind. Many have families in Charleston, besides their lives and friends, and it is reported they refused, on the morning that they were to take the Star of the West, to work the guns. Anderson did not fire a single gun on that morning, which, if he would, he would have done if he could have got his men to obey. He has now more than half his force in irons for refusing to obey him on that morning. The two men from a deserter found him full."

AFFAIRS IN ALABAMA.

The passage of the secession ordinance is said to have given great satisfaction in Mobile. Money was subscribed for the defense of the city. It seems, however, that the members of the Convention have not yet come to sign the ordinance of secession; they have telegraphed their delegation in Congress not to resign their seats. All the ships in Mobile have cleared for foreign ports. On 15th the Legislature met in Montgomery. Governor Moore's Message urges the necessity that Alabama at once be placed upon the same footing as before leaving, and the appointment of a Military Board by the Legislature.

SECESSION OF FLORIDA.

The ordinance of secession was signed on 11th at Tallahassee, and the Ship of course sailed for Pensacola next day. The seizure of the forts was noticed in our last number.

SEIZURE OF THE FLORIDA FORTS.

Secretary Holt has received the following dispatch from Flag-officer Armstrong, commanding Pensacola Navy Yard:

"Armed bodies of Florida and Alabama troops appeared before the gates of the Navy-yard and demanded possession. Having no means of resistance, I surrendered, and hauled down my flag. They are now in possession."

Captain Farrand, Commander of the Navy, has notified the Department of his resignation.

A dispatch from Pensacola says:

"We required down here and captured Fort Barrancas and Navy-yard, and have possession of the latter, granting them permission to continue to occupy their quarters. We are now in possession. This morning we hauled down on the Government garrisoning Fort Pickens, which has before remained neutral. You will see by telegram to the Administration resuming the status quo ante bellum, and we will maintain it accordingly."

It is said at the Department that the Navy-yard contained a hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars' worth of ordnance stores.

THE GEORGIA SECESSION CONVENTION.

This body met last week, and duly organized. On 18th it adopted a resolution declaring—Ayes, 164; Nays, 133—that it is the duty of Georgia to secede from the Union; and second, appointing a committee to draft an ordinance of secession. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 165 to 130.

THE CONVENTION IN ARKANSAS.

An ordinance for a Convention in Arkansas has failed to pass the Senate of Arkansas, the Arkansas Legislature on 15th unanimously passed a bill submitting the question of calling a Convention to the people on the 18th of February. If a majority favor a Convention, the Governor is to appoint the day.

ACTION OF MISSOURI.

Mr. Johnson, Chairman of the Committee on Federal Relations, in the Missouri Senate, introduced a bill in the Senate on 14th of January, which provides that the Governor shall appoint one Commissioner from each congressional District to a Constitutional Convention of the States, to be held at Washington, on the 4th of February, to agree upon a common basis, by way of amendment to the Constitution, to be made by the three States, and the result to be laid before the Convention called in the third section. To that Convention the Governor is directed to appoint three Commissioners from this State, to meet three Commissioners from each of the thirty-three States—the latter Convention to be held at Washington on the 11th of February, for the purpose of adjusting the present difficulties, to preserve the Union, and to avert civil war. The Governor is also required to appoint one Commissioner to proceed to Illinois and request the Legislature to extend the moneyguard, and use its influence with the other Free States to have conventions were appointed to the Wheeling Convention. The Missouri Senate has still gone farther than secession.

The bill was amended by the adoption of a provision similar to that contained in the Virginia bill, submitting the action of the Convention to the people, after which the whole subject was tabled, and a substitute, embracing an entirely new proposition—asking Congress to call a Convention for the redress of grievances, as provided in the fifth article of the Constitution—was introduced by Mr. Stevenson.

A petition praying for the adoption of the Crittenden propositions by Congress, bearing nearly 6000 names, has been forwarded to the Missouri Congressional delegation at Washington.

THE VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE.

In the Virginia Senate, on 17th January, the Committee on Federal Relations reported resolutions that, in the opinion of the General Assembly, the amendments proposed in the Crittenden resolutions constitute a basis of adjustment on which we would recommend the Union be kept together; that Commissioners be appointed to the General Government, also to the Northern States, and other seceding States, with instructions respectfully to request the President and the Congress of the United States to convene, recommending the proceedings contemplated by the action of this General Assembly, they being calculated to produce a satisfaction of arms between the States and the General Government. Considerable opposition was manifested, and a substitute offered.

The House has adopted the resolutions reported by the Committee on the part of Virginia to the proposed National Convention at Washington on the 4th of February, with the amendment that the Commissioners be instructed on the subject, at all times to the control of the General Assembly. It is a matter of much doubt whether Virginia will embrace the approval of Mr. Crittenden's proposition.

THE NEW SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.

The following appears in the Washington correspondence of the Baltimore Sun:

"It is said that the secession movement and consulting as to the best mode of consolidating their interests into a southern confederacy, is a subject now uppermost. The plan is to make Senator Hunter, of Virginia, Provisional President, and Senator Toombs, Provisional Secretary of State and of defense. Mr. Hunter possesses in a more eminent degree the philosophical acumen of Jefferson than any other statesman now living. Colonel Davis is a graduate of West Point, and was a gallant officer in the service of Texas, and served as Secretary of War under President Pierce, and is next to General Scott in military science or courage."

WHY MAJOR ANDERSON DID NOT PROTECT THE DOCKYARD.

The Tribune correspondent says: "As Major Anderson's correspondence with Governor Pickens has been submitted to some members of Congress that certain important facts should be known to the public. In consequence of the peculiarity of his position, Major A. has made no correspondence with the War Department, to know its purpose or policy, but has acted entirely by accidental and unfrequent opportunities. It was decided here, after much hesitation, that the Star of the West, with the South Carolina Commissioner, to send reinforcements, and four companies were detailed for the service, were ordered on the Brooklyn for that purpose. These orders were afterwards countermanded, and the vessel sailed without them—nothing between hope and fear—and, moreover, it was considered important as to the subject of the secret existence of Wilkes."

CONSPIRACY AT NAPLES.

A telegram dated Paris, Wednesday, January 4, says: "A conspiracy of the Bourbon party has been discovered, but has been suppressed. Several Royalist officers have been arrested, with some of the agents of King Francis II. They were found guilty. The Count de Trapani and others on the 19th inst. Several Neapolitan officers have been arrested."

THE SALE OF VENETIA.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says: "Until now the Austrian negotiations are still quite strangers for the sale of Venetia. They are, according to private letters from a Viennese correspondent, in a serious, more warm state of time. The Austrian government, it is moreover stated, has sent a note to Paris and London, intimating that she is ready to sell Venetia, provided she is not forcibly molested by force of arms. We may, therefore, consider war in the spring as out of the question, according to the letters from Berlin, one hundred and twenty rifled guns are ordered from Essen, and manufactured by Krupp. The first of the order is to be completed and delivered by the 15th of January, and the remainder in the 1st of March."

CHINA.

THE LOOT OF THE PALACE.

The China Telegraph says: "The prize-money taken in the Chinese Palace amounted to several crore rolls out of Pekin, amounts for the troops engaged there to about £25,000, and for the navy to a sum of £15,000 in specie, which the French handed over (in accordance with the terms of the treaty) to the British authorities, and was found in the Imperial Treasury, and by one of £9000, realized by the sale by auction in the camp of articles which could not conveniently be carried off. Lord Elgin and Baron Gros made them give up, declaring on their words of honor that they had already got their proper share of the booty, and as Sir Hope Grant and his two generals of divisions, Napier and Mitchell, are getting their shares as per the scale given the following scale: First-class field officers, £60; second-class field officers, £30; captains, £40; lieutenants, £20; sergeants, £20; sergeants, etc., £7 10s.; privates, £5. The Chinese Prince Kung has given the commander of the French no-1 commission of the palace for two days prior to the British taking it in. The French, it is supposed, had some private information. General Montauban is said to have realized £20,000 as his personal share."

MEXICO.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE LIBERALS.

We read in the Mexican Extraordinary, of Mexico City, December 5, as follows:

"Neither time nor space admit of our going into lengthened details of the defeat of the chiefs of the Vera Cruz Sedition, but, after the fall of Guadalajara, on the 30th of October, General Ortega, principal military chief of the Constitutional forces, had to remain in anxiety for troops in this direction.

"Miramon, in order to make with the greater part of his troops, to attempt to carry out his plans, and the first news we had of his movements was that he had left the capital on Saturday, the 23d. He arrived here, accompanied only by two or three officers, and his army was said to be not far off, but very thing. Consternation was at once depicted upon the faces of all the Reactionists, whose hopes were all centered in him.

"The account of the battle is thus briefly given by General Ortega:

REPUBLIC OF MEXICO, FEDERAL ARMY.

THE GENERAL-IN-CHIEF TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE MINISTER OF WAR:

"On this day, after a hard fight, the forces under my command have entirely routed the troops of the enemy, who, in strength of eight thousand men, with thirty pieces of artillery, were defeated by the forces under the Generals Velez, Negrete, Ayestaran, Cobos, Valle, and Joaquin Miramon. The enemy abandoned on their retreat all artillery, ammunition, and thousands of prisoners. The fight commenced at eleven o'clock in the morning, and ended at half-past six in the afternoon, and was finished a little after ten o'clock at the hacienda of Salazar. Those of the enemy who took part in the action were the divisions from Zacatecas, San Luis Potosi, Guanajuato, and one brigade from Guadalajara. To the valor of these we owe this important triumph, which has undoubtedly secured the pacification of the republic.

"I beg your Excellency to congratulate to the President upon this glorious event, and to bring him that probably the day after to-morrow the Federal army will be in the capital of the republic; and in the name of the army I beg his Excellency the President to come as soon as possible to that city, in order to act more promptly in behalf of the constitutional order.

"HACIENDA DE SAN FRANCISCO, December 29, 1860."

Early on the morning of the 31st the forces of Arellinas entered and took possession of the city gates, and early in the day the Constitutional forces commenced pouring in. General Ortega entered about noon, without the pomp or display and took up his quarters in the National Palace.

President Juarez and his Cabinet are expected here within a few days.

ENGLAND.

THE WAR AGITATION AGAIN.

A PRELIMINARY WAR-PANIC in England, France, Italy, and America, has been held at the Mansion House, London, for the purpose of concerting new efforts for the restoration of the child Mortara to his parents.

FRANCE.

THE RECEPTION ON NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

"The Pope's Nuncio," says the Herald, "presented himself on New-Year's Day to proceeding to Napoleon the respects and congratulations of the Diplomatic corps, in whose name he spoke. The Emperor replied: "I thank you for the wishes which you have expressed to me. I regard the union with other Governments that the friendly understanding between the Powers will maintain peace, which is the object of my desires."

FRANCE AND THE EASTERN QUESTION.

We read in the correspondence to the London Herald: "The great topic of conversation to-day is an incident which took place last night at the Théâtre du Cirque Impérial, during the performance of the 'Massacres de Syrie,' a melodrama, which, though produced under authority, is not to be the worse for that. Rachel, the Marquard, the Emperor's Secretary and Chef du Cabinet, and the wife of the latter, were there—the Empress was represented in the blackest colors, and the Maronites are the very embodiment of all the virtues, while the Druses are by the Christians, avengers, liberators, etc. There is much expenditure of gunpowder, but the glory, 'grosses-os,' and the 'dénouement' of Rachel, in a long white shroud, followed by the end of the fifth act. The authorship of the piece belong well known. It was received by the audience with attention to 'assist' at the first performance, a great number of officers of the army and navy, and the members of the audience was made up of Senators, functionaries, journalists, and men of letters. The Emperor arrived at about eight o'clock, when the first act was over, and was received with cries of 'Vive l'Empereur!' The piece was literally crammed with allusions to the 'beneficent' influence of the Emperor, and when Napoleon put down the house, all turning their eyes on the Emperor, who looked on with an approving smile, the applause was deafening. There was a climax when, in the middle of the third act, the actor representing Abd-el-Kader, gave utterance to the following sentiment: 'The Christians have come to be solved by the sword of Napoleon III.' The audience rose in a state of indescribable excitement. 'Vive l'Empereur!' 'Vive le Guerrier d'Orient!' He plainly appeared to approve of the sentiment, and the whole house rose. Rachel, in front of the box, bowing repeatedly, while the members of the royal family applauded vociferously also. In Paris to-day the incident was spoken of as a political manifestation, and the Bourse particularly it produced a very painful impression."

PRUSSIA.

DEATH OF THE KING.

A telegram from Cape Race announces the death of the King of Prussia. His Majesty King Frederick William IV., son of Frederick William III., was born on October 15, 1795. The very greatest care was bestowed upon his education, and some of the most distinguished men of the day were his instructors. The late monarch was present at most of the great battles fought in 1813, 1814, and 1815, although he was not intrusted with any command. He was called to the throne in 1840 by the death of his father, and distinguished his accession by repealing several of the injurious which had grown out of his predecessor's system of government. But the liberality that marked the early part of King Frederick William's reign was not kept up. The Constitution, promised in 1850, was long delayed, and when granted, the King, on the first pretext or occasion, sought the aid of the Chambers to redress him from the provisions that guaranteed representative Government. During the Crimean war, the king, in endeavoring to keep friends with either party, lost the regard of both. He showed himself to be time-serving, vacillating, and irresolute. With all his faults, however, Frederick William was a sincere friend of science and the arts. He contributed his throne with considerable sum. His Majesty had been in exceedingly bad health and often insane for several years, during which time the entire government of the Kingdom was administered by his brother, the late Prince Regent, but now Prince William of Wirtemberg. The new King is generally regarded as an absolutist, and opposed to popular representation. It has been predicted that, upon his assuming the throne, he would make war upon the Government of undergo a revolution. He is exceedingly ambitious, energetic and determined by character. Should the Grand Duke's cousin be married to the Princess Royal of England.

DISTURBANCES IN HUNGARY.

ITALY.

THE FRENCH AT GAETA.

The rumored departure of the French fleet from Gaeta has been contradicted. Up to now eleven French steam frigate, fully armed, has anchored off Gaeta, and suspicion is of course entertained that this event is the first symptom of the rumored intention of Russia to supply the protection of the Pope. The Paris Constitutionnel says: "It is somewhat premature to draw any decided inference from the fact that the French squadron has left Toulon. As the Queen of Naples has left Gaeta, in consequence of the approach of the Sardinian troops."

The Paris correspondent of the London Star says: "The report of the withdrawal of the French fleet from Gaeta is thought to be directly the reverse of true. The steam vessel, well armed and equipped, alongside of the French ships, which have been the announcement of the last few days in the chancelleries of the various Russian embassies, and which has been confirmed to-day by several French journals, is that the Emperor Alexander would take his place. The Russian vessel has been treated with singular consideration here—anchoring between hope and fear—and, moreover, it has been evident present as to the subject of the secret existence of Wilkes."

MAIN BATTERY AT FORT SUMTER, BEARING ON FORT MOULTRIE AND THE CHANNEL.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.—[SEE PAGE 62.]

THE GRAY WOMAN.

THERE is a mill by the Neckar-side to which many people resort for coffee, according to the fashion which is almost national in Germany.

I used to drink coffee there with some friends in 184—. The stately old miller came out to greet us, as some of the party were known to him of old.

My friend asked the daughter of the house for permission to go into an inner chamber, and see her mother. It was granted, and we went into a sort of salon overlooking the Neckar, very small, very bright, and very close. Sitting there, while my friend kept up a brisk conversation in a language which I but half understood, my eye was caught by a picture in a dark corner of the room, and I got up to examine it more nearly.

It was that of a young girl of extreme beauty; evidently of middle rank. There was even a sensitive refinement in her face, as if she almost shrank from the gaze which, of necessity, the painter must have fixed upon her. It was not over-well painted, but I felt that it must have been a good likeness, from the strong impress of peculiar character which I have tried to describe. From the dress, I should guess it to have been painted in the latter half of the last century. And I afterward heard that I was right.

There was a little pause in the conversation.

"Will you ask Frau Scherer who this is?"

My friend repeated my question, and received a long reply in German. Then she turned round and translated it to me.

"It is the likeness of a great-aunt of her husband's." (My friend was standing by me, and, looking at the picture with sympathetic curiosity.) "See! here is the name on the corner—page of this Bible, 'Ursula Scherer, 1778.' Frau Scherer says there is a tradition in the family that this pretty girl, with her complexion of lilies and roses, lost her color entirely through fright that she was known by the name of the Gray Woman. She speaks as if this Anna Scherer lived in some state of life-long horror. But she does not know details; refers me to her husband for them. She thinks he has some papers which were written by the original of the picture for her daughter, and he had in this very house not long after our friend there was married. We can ask Herr Scherer for the whole story if you like."

"Oh yes, pray do!" said I. And as our host came in at this moment to ask how we were faring, and to tell us that he had sent his daughter in her carriage to convey us home, seeing no chance of the heavy rain abating, my friend, after thanking him, passed on to my request.

"Ah!" said he, his face changing, "the aunt Anna had a sad history. It was all owing to one of those hellish Frenchmen; and her daughter suffered for it—like cousin Ursula, as we all called her when I was a child. To be sure the good cousin Ursula was his child as well. The sins of the fathers are visited on their children. The lady would like to know all about it, would she? Well, there are papers—a kind of apology the aunt Anna wrote for putting an end to her daughter's engagement—or rather, facts which she revealed that prevented cousin Ursula from marrying the man she loved; and if the lady would never have any other good fellow, else I have heard say my father would have been thankful to have made her his wife." All this time he was unremarkingly in the full current of his household bureau, and now he turned round, with a bundle of yellow MSS. in his hand, which he gave to my friend, saying, "Take it home, take it home, and if you are to make out our crabbed German writing, you may keep it as long as you like, and read it at your leisure. Only I must have it back again when you have done with it, that's all."

And so we became possessed of the manuscript of the following letter, which is the only supplement, during many a long evening that ensuing winter, to translate, and in some parts to abbreviate. The letter began with some reference to the pain which she had already inflicted upon her daughter by some unexplained opposition to a project of marriage; but I decided, without the slightest delay, that the good miller had furnished us we could have made out even this much from the passionate, broken sentences that made us fancy that some sense between the mother and daughter —and possibly a third person—had occurred just before the mother had begun to write.

"Thou dost not love thy child, mother! Thou dost not care if her heart is broken!" Ah, God! and those words of my husband's about Ursula have in my ears as if the sound of them would fill them when I lie a-dying. And her poor tear-stained face comes between me and everything I see. Child! hearts do not break; life is very tough as well as very terrible. But I will not decide for thee. I will tell thee all; and then shalt thou bear the burden of choice. I may be wrong; I have little wit left, and never had much, I think; but an instinct serves me in place of judgment, and that instinct tells me that Hans and I should not as yet be married. Yet, I may be in error. I would fain make my child happy. Lay this paper before the good pring Schriesheim[illegible] after reading it, that hast doubts which make thee uncertain." Only I will tell thee all now, on condition that no spoken word ever passes between us on the subject. It would kill me to be questioned. I should have to see all present again.

My father held, as thou knowest, the mill on the Neckar, where thy new-found uncle, Scherer, now lives. Thou remembereat the surprise with which we were received there last vintage twelvemonth. How thy uncle disbelieved me when I said that I was his sister Anna, whom he had long believed to be dead, and how I had to lead thee underneath the picture, pointed of me long ago, and point out, feature by feature, the likeness between it and thee; and how, as I spoke, I recalled first to my own mind, and then to my speech to his, the details of the time when it was painted; the merry words that passed between us then, a happy boy and girl; the position of the articles of furniture in the room; our father's habits—his grey-stone pipe, and chair, that shaded the window of my bedroom, through which my brother was wont to squeeze himself, in order to spring on to the topmost bough that would bear his weight; and thence would pass me back his cap laden with fruit to where I sat on the window-sill, too sick with fright for him to care much for eating the cherries.

And at length Frits gave way, and believed me to be his sister Anna, even as my own eyes were from the dead. And thou remembered how he fetched in his wife, and told her that I was not dead, but was come back to the old home once more, changed as I was. And she would scarce believe him, and scanned me with a cold, distrustful eye, till at length—for I knew how old are the Hubette Müller—I said that I was well-to-do, and needed not to seek out friends for what they had to give. And then she asked—not me, but her husband—why I had kept silence, my own brother, father, brother, every one that loved me in my own dear home—to esteem me dead? And then thine uncle (thou remembered'st) said he could not to know more than I cared to tell; that I was his Anna, found again, to be a blessing to him in his old age as I had been in his boyhood. I thanked him in my heart for his trust; for were the need for telling all less than it seems to me now, I could not speak of my past life. Of course, my own brother's home still, held back her welcome, and, for want of that, I did not go to live in Heidelberg as I had planned beforehand, but with my own brother Frits, for I committed myself with his promise to be a father to my Ursula when I should die and leave this weary world.

That Baron Müller was, as I may say, the cause of all my life's suffering. She was a baker's daughter in Heidelberg—a great beauty, as people said, and, indeed, as I myself can bear witness. I, too—thou sawest my picture—was reckoned a beauty, and I believe I was so. Babette Müller looked upon me as a rival, I think, before she so admired, and had no one much to love her. I had several people to love me—my grandfather Fritz, the old servant Katherine, and the young apprentice at the mill—and I feared admiration and notice, and the being stared at as the 'Schöne Müllerin' whenever I went to make my purchases in Heidelberg.

Those were happy, peaceful days! I had Katchen to help me in the house-work, and what, o'er you all the time, was my father, who was always gentle and indulgent toward us women, though he was stern enough with the apprentices in the mill. Karl, the young miller, was his favorite; and I can see now that my father wished him to marry me, and that Karl himself was desirous to do so. But I was a child, shrinking and passionate—not with me, but with the others—and I shrank from him in a way which, I fear, gave him pain. And then my father would call me a naughtiness; and Babette was brought to the mill to be its mistress. Not that I cared much for giving up my post, for, in spite of Katchen's kind kindness, I always felt that I did not manage well for so large a family (with the men, and a girl under Katchen, we sat down seven each night to supper). But Babette and Katchen could not fault with Katchen, I was unhappy at the blame that fell on faithful servants; and by-and-by I began to see that Babette was gaining the power which some open love to me, and, as she once said, to get done with it, and take me off to a home of my own. My father was growing old, and I helped him always in my daily discomfort. The more Karl advanced, the more I disliked him. He was good in the main, but I had no sympathy of taste with him, and could not bear any one who talked to me about it.

Things were in this way when I had an invitation to go to Carlsruhe to visit a relation, for whom I had been very fond. Babette was all for my going; I don't think I wanted to leave home, and yet I had been very fond of Sophie Rupprecht. But I was afraid of my father missing me, and how the affair was settled for me, but not until both Fritz and my father had made inquiries as to the character and position of Sophie's family. They learned that the father had held some kind of inferior position about the Grand Duke's court, and was now dead, leaving a widow and Sophie, and two daughters, the elder of whom was Sophie, my friend. Madame Rupprecht was not rich, but more than respectable—genteel, in fact. Her means sustained, my father made no opposition to my going; Babette forwarded it by all the means in her power, and even my dear Fritz had his word to say in favor.

At last I quitted the mill by the Neckar-side. It was a long day's journey, and Frits went with me to Carlsruhe to see me comfortably up at the third floor of a house a little behind one of the principal streets, in a cramped-up court, to which we gained admittance through a narrow gate in the street. I remember how pinched their rooms looked after the large space we had at the mill; and yet they had not the feeling of confinement which was new to me, and which gave me pleasure, faded as some of it was. Madame Rupprecht was too formal a lady to be very fond of me at the first interview; but Sophie was all that I had recollected her at school—kind, affectionate, and only rather too ready with her expressions of admiration and enjoyment of everything new to her own way, and that was all we needed in the first enthusiastic renewal of our early friendship. The one great object of Madame Rupprecht was to retain her position in society; and as her means were much diminished since her husband's death, there was not much comfort, though there was a great deal of show, in their way of living—just the opposite of what it was at my father's house. I believe that my coming was not too much desired by Madame Rupprecht, as I brought with me another mouth to be fed; but Sophie had spent a year or more in entreating for permission to invite me, and her mother, having once consented, was too well-bred not to give me a stately welcome.

The life in Carlsruhe was very different from what it was at home. The hours were later, the coffee was weaker in the morning, the potage was weaker, the boiled beef less relieved by other diet, the dresses finer, the evening engagements constant. I did not find these visits pleasant. We might not knit, which would have relieved the tedium a little; but we sat in a circle, talking together, only interrupted occasionally by gentlemen, who, breaking out of the knot of men who stood near the door talking eagerly together, stole across the room to Sophie, but rather to her aunt, and, bringing his feet together in the position we called the first at the dancing-school, made a low bow to the lady he was addressing. The first time I saw these manners I could not help smiling; but Madame Rupprecht saw me, and spoke to me next morning rather severely about it, telling me that, of course, in my country breeding I could have seen nothing of court manners or French fashions, but that that was what was expected in Carlsruhe. Of course I tried never to smile again in company. This visit to Carlsruhe took place in '93, just when every one was full of the events taking place at Paris; and yet as Carlsruhe French fashions were not talked of than French politics. Madame Rupprecht, especially, thought a great deal of all French people. And this again was quite foreign to us at home. Frits could hardly bear the name of a Frenchman; and it had nearly been an obstacle to my visit to Sophie that our mother preferred being called Madame to her proper title of Frau.

One night I was sitting next to Sophie, and longing for the time when supper would have supper and go home, so as to be able to speak together—a thing forbidden by Madame Rupprecht's rules of etiquette, when a gentleman entered who was the most necessary conversation passing between members of the same family when in society. I was fretting, I remember, back my inclination to yawn, when two gentlemen came in, one of whom was evidently a stranger to the whole party, from the formal manner in which the host led him from room to room to the hostess. I thought I had never seen any one so handsome or so elegant. His hair was powdered, of course; but one could see from the color that it was in fair in its natural state. His features were as delicate as a girl's, and set off by two little "mouches," as we called patches in those days, at the left corner of the mouth, the other prolonging, as it were, the right eye. His dress was blue and silver. I was so long in admiration of this young man, that I was as much surprised as if the angel Gabriel had spoken to me when the lady of the house brought him to where we were sitting. She called him Monsieur de la Tourelle, and he began to speak to me in French; but though I understood him perfectly, I dared not trust myself to reply to him in that language. Then he tried German, speaking it with a kind of soft lisp that I thought charming. But before the end of the evening I became a little tired of the extreme softness and effeminacy of his manners and the exaggerated compliments he paid me, which had the effect of making all the company look at me, and of which Madame Rupprecht was, however, pleased with the precise thing that displeased me. She liked either Sophie or me to be admired, but of course she would have preferred that it should have been her daughter, but her daughter's friend was next best. As we went away I heard Madame Rupprecht and Monsieur de la Tourelle reciprocating civil speeches with might and main, from which I found out that the French gentleman was coming to call on us the next day.

I do not know if I was more glad or frightened, for I had been kept upon stilts of good manners all the evening. But still I was flattered when Madame told me next day as if she had invited him because he had shown pleasure in my society, and even more gratified by Sophie's undisguised delight at the honor—for I had not expected it so fine and agreeable a gentleman. Yet, with all this, they had hard work to keep me from set efforts at the salon that day when we heard his voice inquiring at the gate on the stairs for Madame Rupprecht. They had made me put on my best grey gown, and they themselves were dressed as for a reception.

When he was gone away, Madame Rupprecht congratulated me on his company. I had myself, I fancied, been entirely spoken to any one else beyond what mere civility required, and had almost invited myself to come in the evening to the most invited himself to come in the evening to bring over some new pieces from all the fashion in Paris, he said. Madame Rupprecht had been out all morning, as she told me, to glean information about Monsieur de la Tourelle. He was a proprietaire, had a small château on the Vosges Mountains; he owned land there, but had a large enough income to be quite independent of that property. Altogether, he was a good match, as she emphatically observed. She never seemed to think that I could refuse him after this account of him, and indeed so I believe she would have allowed Sophie a choice, even had he been as old and ugly as he was young and handsome. I do not remember what the events have come to pass since then, and blurred the clearness of my recollections—if I loved him or not. He was very much devoted to me, and rather frightened me by the excess of his demonstrations of love. And he was very charming to every body around me, who all spoke of him in the most flattering of terms, and of me as the most fortunate of girls. And yet I never felt quite at my ease with him. I was always relieved when he was not there, although I disliked his presence when he did not come. He prolonged his visit to the friend with whom he was staying at Carlsruhe as long as he could. He sent presents, which I was unwilling to take, only Madame Rupprecht seemed to consider me an affected prude if I refused them. Many of these presents consisted of articles of valuable old jewelry, evidently belonging to his family; by accepting these I doubled the ties which were formed around me by circumstances even more than by my own consent. In those days we did not write letters to absent friends as frequently as is done now, and I had been unwilling to name him in the few letters that I wrote home. At length, however, I learned from Madame Rupprecht that she had written to my father to announce the splendid conquest I had made, and to request his presence at my betrothal. I started with astonishment. I had not realized that affairs had gone so far as this. But when she asked me, in a stern, offended manner, what I had meant by my conduct if I did not intend to marry Monsieur de la Tourelle—I had received his visits, his presents, all his various advances, without showing any unwillingness or repugnance—(and it was all true; I had shown no repugnance, though I did wish to be married to him—but there was so strong a feeling in the old hang my head, and silently consent to the rapid enunciation of the only course which now remained for me if I would not be esteemed a heartless coquette all the rest of my days?

There was some difficulty, which I afterward learned that Monsieur de la Tourelle had made my betrothal taking place from home. My father, and Frits especially, were for having me return to the mill, and there be betrothed, and from there be married. But the Rupprechts and Monsieur de la Tourelle were equally urgent on the other side; and Babette was unwilling to have the trouble of the communion at the mill; and also, I think, a little disliked the idea of the contrast of my grander marriage with her own.

So my father and Frits came over to the betrothal. They were to stay at an inn in Carlsruhe for a fortnight, at the end of which time the marriage was to take place. Monsieur de la Tourelle told me he had business at home which would oblige him to be absent during the interval between the two events—at least I was very glad of it, for I did not think that he valued my father and my brother as I could have wished him to do. He was very polite to them, and all the other usual manœuvres, which he had rather dropped with me; and complimented us all round, beginning with my father and Frits, and ending with cousin Ursula and Babette. But he little scoffed at the old-fashioned church ceremonies which my father insisted on; and I should have been very much put out of his compliments as satire, for I saw certain signs of manner by which I knew that my future husband, for all his civil words, had irritated and annoyed my father. But all the necessary arrangements were liberal in the extreme, and more than satisfied, almost surprised, my father. Even Frits jeered in his way—rough and whistling. I should not care about any thing. I was bewitched—in a dream—a kind of despair. I had got into a net from which I could not possibly make escape. I did not see how to get out of it. I clung to my own home-people that fortnight as I had never done before. I was always with them in a way as pleasant and familiar to me after the constraint in which I had been living. I might speak and do as I liked, without being checked by Madame Rupprecht, or reproved in a delicate, complimentary way by Monsieur de la Tourelle. One day I said to my father that I did not know what I meant by it, I would rather go back to the dear old mill; but he seemed to feel this speech of mine as a declaration of duty as great as if I had committed perjury; and I felt after the ceremony of betrothal, on the next day right ever me but my future husband. And yet he asked me some solemn questions; but my answers were not such as to do me any good.

"Dost thou know any fault or crime in this man that should prevent God's blessing from resting on the marriage with him? If so, thou dost foul aversion or repugnance to him in any way?"

And to all this what could I say? I could only stammer out that I did not know of any fault in him enough; and my poor old father saw in this reluctance only the fancy of a silly girl who did not know her own mind, but who had now gone too far to recede.

So we were married in the Court chapel—a privilege which Madame Rupprecht had procured for us, and which she must have thought was to secure us all possible happiness, both at the time and in recollection afterward.

We were married; and after two days spent in festivity at Carlsruhe, among all our new fashionable friends there, I bade good-by forever to my dear old father, and to Frits, and began my life as I take me by way of Heidelberg to his old castle in the Vosges; but I found an amount of determination, rather than of unwillingness, in appearance, for which I was not prepared, and he refused my first request so decidedly that I dared not urge it.

Henceforth, Anna, said he, I was to live in a different sphere of life; and though it is possible that you may have the power of showing favor to your relations from time to time, that will be a matter entirely within my own discretion, and is what I can not allow." I felt almost afraid, after this formal speech, of asking my father and Babette to come and see me; I did beg them to pay me a visit ere long, when the agony of bidding them farewell overcame all my prudence. But they shook their heads, and said that my home, of different kinds of life, of my being a French woman now. Only my father broke out at last with a passing, and, I fear, a bitter word, against which God forbid!—let her remember that her father's house is ever open to her." I was on the point of crying out, "Oh! take me back then now, my father!—oh, my father!" when I felt, rather than saw, my husband present near me. He looked on with a slightly contemptuous air, and taking my hand in his, he led me weeping away, saying that short farewells were always the best when they were inevitable.

It took us two days to reach his château in the Vosges, for the roads were bad and the way difficult to ascertain. Nothing could be more devoted than he was all the time of the journey. It seemed as if he were trying in every way to make up for the separation, which every hour made me feel the more complete, between my present and my former life. I seemed as if I were only now wakening up to a full sense of what marriage was, and I dare say I was not a cheerful companion on the tedious journey. At length jealousy of my regret for my ters, my face toward the window, which, both from the darkness of the wood growing high up the mountain-side and the faint light of the declining moon, seemed only like an oblong of paler, purpler black than the shadowy room. How much I remembered from my one instantaneous glance before the candle went out, how much I saw as my eyes became accustomed to the darkness, I do not know; but even now, in my dreams, comes up that room of horror, distinct in its profound shadow. Amante could hardly have been gone a minute before I felt an additional gloom before the window, and heard soft movements outside—soft, but resolute, and continued until the end was accomplished, and the window raised.

In mortal terror of people forcing an entrance at such an hour, and in such a manner as to leave no doubt of their purpose, I would have turned to fly when first I heard the noise, only that I feared by any quick motion to catch their attention, as I also ran the danger of doing by opening the door, which was all but closed, and to whose handlings I was unaccustomed. Again, quick as lightning, I bethought me of the hiding-place between the locked father and brother got the better of M. de la Tourelle, and he became so much displeased with me that I thought my heart would break with the sense of desolation. So it was in no cheerful frame of mind that we approached Les Rochers, and I thought that perhaps it was because I was so unhappy that the place looked so dreary. On one side the château looked like a raw new building, hastily run up for some immediate purpose, without any growth of trees or underwood near it, only the remains of the stone used for building, not yet cleared away from the immediate neighborhood, although weeds and lichens had been suffered to grow near and over the heaps of rubbish; on the other were the great rocks from which the place took its name, and rising close against them, as if almost a natural formation, was the old castle, whose building dated many centuries back.

It was not large nor grand, but it was strong and picturesque, and I used to wish that we lived in it rather than in the square half-furnished apartment in the new edifice, which had been hastily got ready for my reception. Incongruous as the two parts were, they were joined into a whole by means of intricate passages and unexpected doors, the exact positions of which I never fully understood. M. de la Tourelle led me to a suite of rooms set apart for me, and finally installed me in them, as in a domain of which I was sovereign. He apologized for the hasty preparation which we had been able to make for my reception, and before I asked, or even thought of complaining, that they should be made as luxurious as heart could wish before many weeks had elapsed. But when, in the gloom of an autumnal evening, I caught my own face and figure reflected in all the mirrors, which showed only a mysterious background in the dim light of the many candles which failed to illuminate the great proportions of the half-furnished salon; I begged M. de la Tourelle that I might be taken to the rooms he had occupied before his marriage; he seemed angry with me, although he effected to laugh, and so decidedly set aside the notion of my having any other rooms but these that I trembled in silence at the fantastic figures and shapes which my imagination called up as peeping from the background of the gloomy mirrors. There was my boudoir, a little less dreary—my bedroom, with its grand and tarnished furniture, which I unlikely made more my visiting-room, looking up the various doors which led into the boudoir, the salon, the passage—all but one, through which M. de la Tourelle always came from his own apartments in the older part of the castle. But this preference of mine for occupying my bedroom surprised M. de la Tourelle, and, although he did not care to express his displeasure. He would always allure me back into the salon, which I disliked more and more as the constant separation from the rest of the building by the long passage into which all the doors of my apartment opened. This passage was lined by heavy doors and portières, through which I could not hear a sound from the other parts of the house, and, of course, the servants could not hear any movement or cry of mine unless expressly summoned. To a girl brought up as I had been in a household where every individual lived all day in the sight of every other member of the family, and created either cheerful words or the sense of silent companionship, this grand isolation of mine was very formidable; and the more so, because M. de la Tourelle, as a landed proprietor, sportsman, and what not, was generally out of doors the greater part of every day, and sometimes for two or three days at a time. I had no pride to keep me from associating with the domestics; it would not have been natural to me in many ways to have sought them out for a word of sympathy in those dreary days when I was left so entirely to myself, had they been like our kindly German servants. But I disliked them, one and all; I could not tell why. Some were civil, but there was a familiarity in their civility which repelled me; others were rude, and treated me more as if I were an intruder than the mistress and future wife; and yet of the two sets I liked these last the best.

The principal male servant belonged to this latter class. I was very much afraid of him, he had such an air of suspicious surliness about him in all he did for me, and yet M. de la Tourelle spoke of him as most valuable and faithful. Indeed, it sometimes struck me that Lefebvre ruled his master in some things; and this I could not make out. For, while M. de la Tourelle behaved toward me as if I were some precious toy or idol, to be cherished, and fostered, and petted, and indulged, I soon found out how little I, or, indeed, any one else, could bend the terrible will of the man who had, on first acquaintance, appeared to me too effeminate and too good to exert his will to the slightest particular. I had learned to know his face better now; and to see that some vehement depth of feeling, the cause of which I could not fathom, made his gray eye glitter with pale light, and his lips contract, and his delicate cheek writhen on certain occasions. But all had been so open and above board at home that I had no experience to help me to unravel any mysteries among those who lived under the same roof. I understood that I had made what Madame Ruppredt and her set would have called a great marriage, because I lived in a château with many servants, bound ostensibly to obey me in minutes. I supposed that M. de la Tourelle was fond enough of me in his way—proud of my beauty, I dare say (for he often enough spoke about it to me)—but he was also jealous, and suspicious, and uninfluenced by my wishes, unless they tallied with his own. I felt at this time as if I could have been fond of him too, if he would have let me; but I was timid from my childhood, and before long my dread of his displeasure (coming down like thunder into the midst of my love, for such slight causes as a hesitation in reply, a wrong word, or a sigh for my father) conquered my humorous inclination to love one who was so handsome, so accomplished, so indulgent and devoted. But if I could not please him when indeed I loved him, you may imagine how often I did wrong when I was so much afraid of him as to quietly avoid his company for fear of his outbursts of passion. One thing I remember noticing, that the more M. de la Tourelle was displeased with me the more Lefebvre seemed to relish it; and when I was restored to favor, sometimes on as sudden an impulse as that which occasioned my disgrace, Lefebvre would look askance at me with his cold, malicious eyes, and once or twice at such times he spoke most disrespectfully to M. de la Tourelle.

I have almost forgotten to say that, in the early days of my life at Les Rochers, M. de la Tourelle, in contemptuous indulgent pity at my weakness in disliking the dreary grandeur of the château, sent up to the milliner in Paris from whom my corbeille de mariage had come, to desire her to look out for me a maid of middle age, experienced in the toilet, and with as much refinement that she might on occasion serve as companion to me.

A Norman woman, Amante by name, was sent to Les Rochers by Madame Prunier milliner, to become my maid. She was tall and handsome, though upward of forty, and somewhat gaunt. But on first seeing her I liked her; she was neither rude nor familiar in her manners, and had a pleasant look of straightforwardness about her that I had missed in all the inhabitants of the château, and that I foolishly set down in my own mind as a national want. Amante was directed by M. de la Tourelle to sit in my boudoir, and not with the servants. He also gave her many instructions as to her duties in matters which, perhaps, strictly belonged to my department of management. But I was young, and inexperienced, and thankful to be spared any responsibility.

I dare say it was true what M. de la Tourelle said—before many weeks had elapsed—that, for a great lady, a lady of a castle, I became sadly too familiar with my Norman waiting-maid. But you know that by birth I was nothing so far apart in rank: Amante was the daughter of a Norman farmer, I of a German miller; and, besides, that my life was so lonely. Illness and sorrow had left me not please my husband. He had written for some one capable of being my companion at times, and now he was jealous of the influence of her—an agency because I could sometimes laugh at her original tones and amusing proverbs, while when with him I was too much frightened to laugh.

From time to time families from a distance of some leagues drove through the bad roads in their heavy carriages to pay us a visit, and there was occasionally high festivity in the château; more public affairs should be a little more settled. These little events and plans were the only variations in my life for the first few months. Of the social alternations in M. de la Tourelle's temper, his unreasonable anger, and his passionate fondness.

Perhaps one of the things which caused me keen pleasure and comfort in Amante's society was, that whereas I was afraid of every body (I do not think I was half a knave) she was afraid of no one but M. Tourelle, which respectfully informed him that she had detected the weak point, but forbore to press him too closely upon it out of deference to his position as her master. Lefebvre, with all his influence to others, she had quite teader ways with me; all the more so at this time because she knew, what I had not yet words to express, that M. de la Tourelle, by-and-by I might become a mother, that wonderful object of mysterious interest to single women, who no longer hope to enjoy such blessedness themselves.

It was once more autumn; late in October. But I was reconciled to the dreariness of the look of the new part of the building no longer looked bare and desolate; the débris had been so far cleared away by M. de la Tourelle's orders as to make me a little flower-garden, to which I tried to cultivate those plants that I remembered as growing at home. Amante and I had moved the furniture in the suite of rooms, so as to be living as my husband had ordered many an article from time to time that he thought would give me pleasure, and it was becoming a very comfortable imprisonment in a certain part of the great building, the whole of which I had never yet explored. It was October, as I said, when M. de la Tourelle spoke of, though short in duration, and M. de la Tourelle had occasion, so he said, to go to that distant estate on the superintendence of which he was living at him away from home. He took Lefebvre with him, and possibly some more of the lackeys; he often did. And my spirits rose a little at the thought of his absence, and the new sensation that he was the father of my unborn babe came over me, and I tried to invest him with this fresh character. I tried to persuade myself that passionate love for me that made him so jealous and tyrannical, imposing, as he did, restrictions on my very intercourse with my dear father, not fatherly. I was so entirely separated, as far as personal intercourse was concerned.

I had, it is true, given myself go into a sorrowful review of all the troubles which lay hidden beneath the seeming luxury of my life. I knew that no one cared for me except my husband, and sometimes for it was clear enough to see that I, as his wife, and also as a parvenu, was not popular among the few neighbors who surrounded us; and as for the servants, they were a lurking kind of enemies, looking, treating me with a semblance of respect that had more of mockery than reality in it, while the men had a lurking kind of familiarity with them, sometimes displayed even to M. de la Tourelle, who on his part, it must be confessed, was often severe even to cruelty in his treatment of them. My husband loved me, I said to myself, but I said it almost in the form of a question. His love was shown fitfully, and more in ways calculated to please himself than to please me. I felt that for no wish of mine would he deviate one little from any predetermined course of action. I had learned the inflexibility of those thin, delicate lips; I knew how anger would turn his fair complexion to deadly white, and bring the cruel light into his pale blue eyes. The love I bore to any one seemed to be a reason for his hating them, and as I went on pitying myself one long dreary afternoon during this absence of his of which I have spoken, only sometimes remembering to check myself in my murmurings by thinking of the new unseen link between us, and then crying afresh to think how wicked I was, how very ill. I remember that long October evening! Amante came in from time to time, talking away to cheer me—talking about dress and Paris, and I hardly know what, but from time to time looking at me keenly with her friendly dark eyes, and with serious interest, too, though all her words were about frivolity. At length she heaped the fire with wood, drew the heavy silken curtains close; for I had been anxious hitherto to keep them open so that I might see the pale moon mounting the skies, as I used to see her—the same moon—rise from behind the Kaiser Stuhl at Heidelberg; but the night made me cry, so Amante set it out. She dictated to me as a nurse does to a child.

"Now, Madame must have the little kitten to keep her company," she said, "while I go and ask Marchon for a cup of coffee." I remember that speech, and the way it roused me, for I did not like Amante to think I wanted amusing by a kitten. It might be my petulance, but this speech—such as she might have made to a child—annoyed me, and I said that I did not want for my lowness of spirits—meaning that they were not of so imaginary a nature that I could be diverted from them by the gambols of a kitten. So, though I did not choose to tell her all, I told her a part; and as I spoke, I began to suspect that the good creature knew much of it all, and, withal, that the little speech about the kitten was more thoughtful kind than it had seemed at first. I said that it was so long since I had heard from my father; that he was an old man, and many things might happen—I might never see him again—and I so seldom heard from him or my brother; it was a more complete and continuous cry than I had ever anticipated when I married, and something of my home and of my life previous to my marriage I told the good Amante, who had been brought up as a great lady, and the sympathy of any human being was precious to me.

Amante listened with interest, and in return told me some of the events and sorrows of her own life. Then, remembering her purpose, she set out in search of the coffee, which ought to have been brought to me an hour before; but in my husband's absence my wishes were but seldom attended to, and I never dared to give orders.

Presently Amante returned, bringing the coffee and a great large cake.

"See!" said she, setting it down. "I took at my pleasure. Marchon is civil. Those who eat always laugh. And, besides, I have a little news that will please Madame." Then she told me that, lying on a table in the great kitchen, was a bundle of letters, come by the courier from Strasburg that very afternoon; then, fresh from her conversation with me, she had recognized the string that bound them, but had only just traced out one that she thought was from Germany, when a servant-man came in, and with the start he gave her she dropped the letters, which he picked up, swearing at her for having untied and disarranged them. She told him that she believed there was a letter there for me from my father, and swore the more, saying that if there was it was no business of hers, or of his either, for that he had the strictest orders always to hand to me whatever arrived during his master's absence into the private sitting-room of the latter—a room into which I had never entered, although it opened out of my husband's dressing-room.

I asked Amante if she had not conquered and brought me the letter. No, indeed, she replied, it was almost as much as her place was worth to live among such a set of servants; it was only a month ago that Jacques had stabbed Valentin for some jesting joke. That poor Valentin—that handsome young lad who carried up the wood into my salon? Poor fellow! he lies dead and cold now, and that is the way with them. One has not an end to himself, but those of the household knew better. Oh! I need not be afraid; Jacques was gone, on an errand to Paris, and his wife was such a fool as not to be afraid of him. Monsieur would be at home the next day, and it would not be long to wait.

But I felt as if I could not exist till the next day without the letter. It might be to say that my father was ill, dying—he might pray for his daughter from his death-bed! In short, there was no end to the thoughts and fancies that haunted me. It was of no use for Amante to say that, after all, she might be mistaken, and that the letter was writing well—that she had but a glimpse of the address; I let my coffee cool, my food all became distasteful, and I urged Amante to have patience to get at the letter, and have some news of my dear ones at home. All the time Amante kept her imperturbable good humor, and tried to console me accordingly. At last she said, as if wearied out, that if I would consent to make a good supper, she would see what could be done. Accordingly, when Monsieur's room in search of the letter, after the servants were all gone to bed. We agreed to go together when all was still, and look over the letters; there could be no harm in that, she argued, as we were such cowards we dared not do it openly and in the face of the household.

Presently our supper came up—partridges, bread, fruits, and cream. How well I remember that supper! We put the untouched cake away in a sort of buffet, and set the cold coffee out of the window, in order that the servants might not take offense at the apparent fancifulness of sending down for food I could not eat. I was so anxious for all to be in bed that I told the footman who served that he need not wait to take away the plates and dishes, but might go to bed. Long after I thought the house was quiet, Amante, in her caution, made me wait. It was past eleven before we set out, with candle steps and veiled light, along the passages, to go to my husband's room and steal my own letter, if it was indeed there—a fact about which Amante had become very uncertain in the progress of our discussion.

To make you understand my story, I must now try to explain to you the plan of the château. It had been at one time a fortified place of some strength, perched on the summit of a rock, which projected from the side of the mountain. Additions had been made to the old building (which must have borne a strong resemblance to the castles overlooking the Rhine), and these new buildings were placed so as to command a magnificent view, being on the steepest side of the rock, from which the mountain fell away, as it were, leaving the great plain of France in full survey. The ground-plan was something of the shape of three sides of an oblong; my apartments in the modern edifice occupied the narrow end, and had this grand prospect. The front of the castle was old, and ran parallel to the valley below. In this were contained the offices and public rooms of various descriptions, into which I never penetrated. The back wing (considering the new building in which my apartments were, as the centre) consisted of many rooms, of a dark and gloomy character, as the mountain-side shut out much of the sun, and heavy pine woods came down from the far ravels of the windows. Yet on this side—on a projecting plateau of the rock—my husband had formed the flower-garden of which I have spoken; for he was a great cultivator of flowers in his leisure moments.

Now my bedroom was the corner room of the new buildings on the part next to the mountain. Hence I could have let myself down into the flower-garden by the window on the western or south side, without danger of hurting myself; while the windows at right angles with these looked shore down a descent which rendered it fearful. Still further along this wing, you came to the old building; in fact, these two fragments of the ancient castle had formerly been attached by some such connecting apartments as my husband had rebuilt. These rooms belonged to M. de la Tourelle. His bedroom opened into mine, his dressing-room lay beyond; and that was where nearly all I knew, for the servants, as well as he himself, had a knack of turning me back, under some pretense, if ever they found me walking about alone, as I was inclined to do, when first I came, from a sort of curiosity to see the whole of the place of which I found myself mistress. But M. Tourelle never encouraged me to go out alone, either in a carriage or for a walk, saying always that the roads were bad, or that those climbing paths indeed, I have sometimes fancied since that the flower-garden, to which the only access from the castle was by these rooms, was made on purpose in order to give me exercise and employment under his own eye.

But to return to that night. I knew, as I have said, that M. de la Tourelle's private room opened out of his dressing-room, and this out of his bedroom, which again opened into mine, the corner room. But there was no other door to all these rooms, and these doors led into a long gallery, lighted by windows, looking into the inner court, if I do not remember incorrectly. And now that we went through my room into my husband's apartment through the dressing-room; but the door of communication into his study was locked, so there was nothing for it but to turn back and go by the gallery to the other door. I recollect noticing every one of these things in succession, then seen by me for the first time. I remember the sweet perfume that hung in the air, the scent toilet-table, and the dressed his clothes, and the whole apparatus for bathing and dressing, more luxurious even than those which he had provided for me. In the room itself was less splendid in its proportions than mine. In truth, the new buildings ended at the entrance to my husband's dressing-room. There were deep window recesses in walls eight or nine feet thick, and in one of the partitions between the chambers were three feet deep; but over all these doors or windows there fell thick heavy draperies, so that I should think no one could have heard in one room what passed in another. We went back into my room, and out into the gallery. And then I made out what was a fear that possessed us, I don't know why, lest some of the servants in the opposite wing might trace our progress toward the door of study made unused by any one except my husband. Somehow, I had always the feeling that all the domestics, except Amante, were spies upon me, and I was so trammelled in a web of observation and unspoken limitation extending over all my actions.

There was a light in the upper room; we paused, and Amante would have again retreated, but I was chafing under the delays. What was the harm of my seeking my father's unopened letter to me in my husband's study? I, pitiful and ill-used, now blamed Amante for her unusual timidity. But the truth was, she had far more reason for suspicion as to the proceedings of that terrible household than I had ever known of. I urged her on, I pressed on myself; we entered the door, locked, and with the light in my hand I searched for the letters lay on the table, their white oblongs catching the light in an instant, and revealing themselves to my eager eyes, before even the words of love from my peaceful distant home. But just as I pressed forward to examine the letters the candle which Amante held, even in some draught, went out, and we were in darkness. Amante proposed that we should carry the letters back to my salon, collecting them as well as we could in the dim, and returning all but the expected one for me; but I begged her to return to my room, where I kept tinder and flint, and to strike a fresh light; and so she went, and I remained alone in the room, of which I could only just distinguish the size and the principal articles of furniture: a large table, with a deep overhanging cloth, in the middle, escritoires and other heavy articles against the walls, all this I could see—I stood there, my hand on the table close by the letters, my face toward the window, which, both from the darkness of the wood growing high up the mountain-side and the faint light of the declining moon, seemed only like an oblong of paler, purpler black than the shadowy room. How much I remembered from my one instantaneous glance before the candle went out, how much I saw as my eyes became accustomed to the darkness, I do not know; but even now, in my dreams, comes up that room of horror, distinct in its profound shadow. Amante could hardly have been gone a minute before I felt an additional gloom before the window, and heard soft movements outside—soft, but resolute, and continued until the end was accomplished, and the window raised.

In mortal terror of people forcing an entrance at such an hour, and in such a manner as to leave no doubt of their purpose, I would have turned to fly when first I heard the noise, only that I feared by any quick motion to catch their attention, as I also ran the danger of doing by opening the door, which was all but closed, and to whose handlings I was unaccustomed. Again, quick as lightning, I bethought me of the hiding-place between the locked door to my husband's dressing-room and the portiers which covered it; but I gave that up, I felt as if I could not without screaming or fainting. So I sank down softly, and crept under the table, hidden, as I hoped, by the great deep cover, with its heavy fringe. I had not recovered my swooning senses fully, and was trying to assure myself as to my being in a place of comparative safety, for, above all things, I dreaded the betrayal of fainting, and struggled hard for mastery, because as I might attain by deadening myself to the danger I was in by inflicting intense pain on myself. You have often asked me the reason of that watch on my hand; it was where, in my agony, I bit out a piece of flesh with my relentless teeth, thankful for the pain, which helped to numb my terror. I say I was but just concealed when I heard the window lifted, and one after another stepped over the sill, and stood by me so close that I could have touched their feet. They laughed and whispered; my brain swam so that I could not tell the meaning of their words; but I heard my husband's laughter among the rest —low, hissing, and scornful—as he kicked something heavy that they had dragged in over the floor, and which lay near me; so near that my husband's kick in touching it touched me too. I don't know why—I can't tell how—but some feeling, and not curiosity, prompted me to put out my hand, clear of the folds, over the table, and feel in the darkness for what lay spurned beside me. I stole my groping palm upon the clenched and chilly hand of a corpse!

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON.

THE render will find on the preceding page a General View of the City of Charleston, South Carolina, showing the City, the Bay, the Forts, etc. The wide street which occupies the centre of the picture is Broad Street. The Mercury office stands on the left-hand side of this street as you walk down toward the Custom-house — the building at its extremity. Many merchants have their offices here; it is, in fact, the Broadway of Charleston.

Charleston is one of the oldest, and was once one of the greatest cities in the United States. It was founded by British noblemen under a special grant from the Crown, and was intended to be the chief town of the most aristocratic province in America. Before the Revolution it was one of the wealthiest cities on the sea-board; it is recorded, that fine ladies in London, York and Philadelphia sent to Charleston for the silks and laces which they could not get at home. During the Revolution it was for many years in possession of the British, and the city abounds with memorials of the struggle they had to take it, and of the straits to which the patriots of that day were put. Not the least interesting of these famous relics is the arsenal, where the citizens were ordered to deposit their arms on the surrender of the city. They did so, but threw down loaded as they were, so that the work was scarcely done when a terrific explosion almost uprooted the town itself. Some 20,000 pounds of powder were ignited, and the lunatic asylum, poor-house, guard-house, barracks, etc., were all destroyed. Many lifeless carcasses were dashed against the walls of the old church of the Unitarians, which were splashed with blood and brains.

The population of Charleston is about 40,000 souls; the city covers a corporate domain nearly three miles long by something less than two miles at the widest.

WHAT.

SHE was working a slipper; but she didn't like that. She sang a little melody, that wouldn't do:

She tried to read a little, then sat down with the cat, And then commenced a note—"Dearest, why didn't you—?"

And then she tore it up, and then tried to keep still And watch the spent sun till he dropped behind the hill.

She was reading a novel, but he didn't like that, So he took down his fishing-rod, that wouldn't do; Then he whistled to his dog, then he looked on his hat, And then commenced a note—"Dearest, why didn't you—?"

And then he tore it up, and then tried to keep still And watch the spent sun till he dropped behind the hill.

The sun dropped out of sight, and she walked up the lane;

He too, quite by chance, of course, came along:
So they met, and they stopped: not a word she would either deign:

Then he said—nothing, and naught had she to say.
It last he took up at her, and she took up to his,
And then commenced a note—"Dearest, why didn't you—?"

"Why didn't you—Dearest?"—"Dearest, why didn't you—?"

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

MY poor companions had but a sorry time of it on that morning. I was in a fearful temper, and made no effort to control it. The little romance of my meeting with these creatures was beginning to scale off, and there beneath lay the vulgar metal of the natures exposed to view. A few old Vitrichen shuffling along in his tattered shoes, half-stupid with wine and shame together, I could bear to look at him; while Tintenfleck, although at the outset abashed by my rebukeful tone and cold manner, had now rallied, and seemed well disposed to assert her own against all comers. Yes, there was a palpable air of defiance about her, even to the way that she sang as she went along; every third and cadence seemed to say, "I'm doing this to amuse myself; never imagine that I care whether you are pleased or not." I decided, before me no method of avoiding this conclusion, since at every time that I turned on her a look of anger or displeasure she reply was to sing the louder.

"And it was only yesterday," thought I, "and I dreamed that I could be in love with this creature—dreamed that I could replace Kate Herbert's image in my heart with that coarse travesty of woman's gentleness. Why, I might as well hope to make a gentleman of old Vatercken, and present him to the world as a man of station and eminence."

What an insane hope was this! As well might I shiver a fragment from a stone on the roadside, and think to give it value by having it set as a ring. Neither of my companions them company for a day might be pardonable. It was the whim of one who is, above all, a student of mankind. But why continue the companionship? A little more of such intimacy, and who is to say what I may not imbibe of their habits and their natures; and Tottz, the man of sentiment, the child of impulse, romance and poetry, become a slave of the Play—a satimbanque! Now, though I could implicitly rely upon the honesty of the latter, to prevent the possibility of my ever displaying any feats of agility, I could yet picture myself in a long-tailed blue coat and buckle-kneed shoes, round and round in the saw-dust circle, with four or five other creatures of the same sort, and who have no consciousness of their degradation till they are made the butt of some extempore drollery by the clown.

The creative temperament has this great disadvantage, that one can not always build castles, but must occasionally construct bowls, and sometimes even wigwams and tilts. Such then was I now, with a large contract order for this species of edifice, and certainly I set to work with a will. The impatience of my mind communicated itself to my gait, and I walked along at a tremendous rate.

"I can scarcely keep up with you at this pace," said Tintenfleck, "and I fear we have left poor Vaterchen a long way behind."

I made some rude answer—I know not what —and told her to push on before.

"I will not leave him," said she, coming to a halt, and standing with a composed and firm attitude before me.

"Then I will!" said I, angrily. "Farewell!" And waving my hand in a careless adieu, I walked briskly onward, not even turning a look on her as I went. I had not proceeded above a hundred a heavy sob close behind me, but I would not look round for worlds. I was in one of those moods—and I have had many of them—when a harsh or an ungracious act appears something very daring and courageous. The very pain in my nerves from the sobs convinced me that it must be heroic, just as a devotee is satisfied after a severe self-castigation.

"Yes, Tottz," said I, "you are taking the right thing here. A little more of such association as this, and you would be little better than themselves. Besides, and above all, you ought to be true. Now these are not real purses more than the tinsel gems and tin-foil splendors they wear on their tunics." It broke on me too, like a sudden light, that by the Rights of Tottz, the many-sided, many-tinted—what a German would call 'der mehrfarbig farben bedeckte Pottz'—I ought to be true to myself, and in my changes of character requiring great resources and unlimited "properties," as stage folk call them; whereas, "Tintenfleck, Vaterchen and Pottz" might be as poor as Lazarus. Indeed, the poorer the more real, since more natural.

"How inconsiderate," thought I, "of me to our search after riches! Not taking account of the fact that the very identity of which we are each of us so tenacious and so vain is ever merged in wealth. Rich men must, of necessity, be very much alike, their surroundings being so similar. They will naturally conform to the same sort of pursuits, have common ties—even family resemblance, whereas poverty has manifold aspects: it makes this man moody, that other man reckless; have rendered abject, slavish, and degraded; some become morose, stern, and defiant. I wonder what precise effect it will have upon me?"

While I thus speculated, I caught sight of a man scaling one of the precipitous paths by which the winding road was shortened for foot travelers; a second glance showed me that this was Harpar, who, with a heavy knapsack, was toiling along. I made a great effort to come up with him, but what I reached the road he was still a long distance in front of me. I could not, if there had been any one to question me, say why I wished to overtake him. It was a sort of chase suggested simply by the object in front; rare type, if we but knew it, of one-half the pursuits we follow throughout life.

As I mounted the last of these by-paths which led to the crest of the mountain, I felt certain that with a slight accession of strength I should come up with him; but scarcely had I gained the top than I saw him striding away vigorously on the road full a mile away from me. "He shall not beat me," said I, and I increased my speed. It was all in vain. I could not do it; and when I drew nigh Lindau at last, very weary and footsore, the sun was just sinking on the western horizon of the lake.

"Which is the best inn here?" asked I of a shopkeeper who was lounging carelessly at his door.

"Yonder," said he, "where you see that post-carriage turning into."

"To-night," said I, "I will be guilty of an extravagance. I will treat myself to a good supper, and an honest glass of wine." And on these hospitable thoughts intent I unslung my knapsack, and, throwing as much of distinction as I could into my manner, strolled into the public room.

So busied was the household in attending to the travelers who arrived "extra post," that none condescended to notice me, till at last, as the hunger grew, a venerable old waiter approached me, and said, in a half-friendly, half-rebukeful tone, "It is at the Swan you ought to be, my friend, the next turning but two to the left hand, and you'll see the blue lantern over the gateway."

"I insist to remain where I am," said I, imperiously, "and to remember your impertinence when I am about to pay my bill. Bring me the carte."

I was overjoyed to see the confusion and shame of the old fellow. He saw at once the grievous error he had committed, and was so overwhelmed that he could not reply. Meanwhile, with all the painstaking accuracy of a practiced gourmand, I was making a careful note of what I wished for supper.

"Are you not ashamed," said I, rebukefully, "to have ordered me here, when you know in your heart they are swallows?"

He was so abject that he could only give a melancholy smile, as though to say, "Be merciful, and spare me!"

"Bohemian pheasant, too—come, come, this is too bad! Be frank and confess; how often has that same stuffed bird sold done duty on a capon of your own raising?"

"Gracious Heir!" muttered he, "do not crush us down with irony!"

I don't think that he said this in actual words, but his terrified eyes and his shaking cheeks declared it.

"Never mind," said I, encouragingly, "it will not hurt us to make a sparing meal occasionally; with the venison steak, the fried salmon, the dish with oysters, and the apricot tart, we will satisfy appetite, and persuade ourselves, if we can, that we have fared luxuriously."

"And the wine, Herr?"

"Ah, there we are difficult. No little Baden vintage, no small wine of the Bergstrasse, can impose upon us. Let us have which, or, if you can guarantee it, Marcobrunner will do; but, mind, no substitutes!"

He laid his hand over his heart and bowed low; and, as he moved away, I said to myself, "What a mesmerism there must be in real money, when even in the mockery of it, I have made that creature a bond slave." Brief as was the interval in preparing my meal, it was enough to allow me a very considerable share of time for reflection on what, of what I would, a certain voice within would whisper, "Where are your fine resolutions now, Pottz? Is this the way you have begun to find promised yourself? Are you not at the old work again? Are you not masquerading it once more? Don't you know enough that all this pretension of yours is bad money, and that at the first ring of it on the counter you will be found out?"

"This you may rely on, gracious Sir," said the waiter, as he laid a bottle on the table beside me with a careful hand. "It is the orange seal, I'll be bound, and, in a whisper, "taken from the Margrave's cellar in the revolution of '93, and every flask of it worth a province."

"We shall see—we shall see," said I, haughtily; "serve the soup!"

If I had not been a Bohemian, I believe I should have eaten very heartily, and drunk my wine with a great relish, notwithstanding that dram reward. I did eat, however, a little, but if I can only see the smallest bit of terra firma between myself and the edge of a precipice, I feel as though I have the freest, widest range over. For the life of me I can not realize any thing that may, or may not, befall me remotely. "Blue are the ships far off," says the adage; and on the contrary are the dramin do I aver, that faint are all dangers that are distant. A sudden peril overwhelms me; but I could look forward to a whole week this day fortnight with a fortitude truly heroic.

After this confession, valued reader, marvel no more that I should remain in my present beatitude, and sipped my Rhenish with a racy enjoyment.

"This is a nice old half-forgotten sort of place," thought I; "a kind of vulgar Venice, water-washed, and muddy, and dreary, and dothing. I'll stay here for a week or so; I'll give myself up to the genius loci; I'll Germanize to the top of my bent; who is to say what metaphysical melancholy, dashed with a strange element of humor, may not come of constantly feeding on this heavy cookery, and eternally listening to their gurgling gutturals? I may come out a Wieland or a Herder, with a sprinkling of Henri Heine! Yes," said I, "this is the true way to approach life; first of all, develop your own nature, and then mark its effect in their exercise you influence your fellow-men. Above all, however, cultivate your individuality, your own peculiar gift, your own idiosyncrasy."

"Ja, guideger Herr," said the old waiter, as he tried to step away from my grasp, for, without knowing it, I had laid hold of him by the wrist while I spoke to him this speech. Desirous to re-establish my character for sanity, somewhat compromised by this incident, I said,

"Have you a money-changer in these parts? If so, let me have some silver for this English gold." I put my hand in my pocket for my purse; not finding it, I tried another and another. I ransacked them all over again, patted myself, shook my coat, looked into my hat, and then, with a sudden flash of memory, I bethought me that I had left it with Catinka, and was actually without one sou in the world! I sat down, pale and almost fainting, and my arms fell powerless at my sides.

"I have lost my purse!" gasped I out, at length.

"Indeed!" said the old man, but with a tone of such palpable scorn that it actually sickened me.

"Yes," said I, with all that force which is the peculiar prerogative of truth; "and in it all the money I possessed."

"I have no doubt of it," rejoined he, in the same dry tone as before.

"You have no doubt of what, old man? Or what do you mean by the supercilious quietness with which you assent to my misfortune? Send the landlord to me."

"I will do more; I will send the police," said he, as he shuffled out of the room.

I have met scores of men on my way through life who would not have felt the slightest embarrassment in such a situation as mine; fellows so accustomed to shipwreck that the cry of "Breakers ahead!" or "Man the boats!" would have occasioned neither excitement nor trepidation. What stuff they are made of instead of nerves, muscles, and arteries, I can not imagine, since, to me, the question is self-preservation, how can it possibly be more imminent than when not alone your animal existence is jeopardized, but the very and more precious life of fame and character is in peril?

For a moment I thought that though this besotted old fool of a waiter might suspect my probity, the more clear-sighted intelligence of the landlord would at once recognize my honest nature, and, with the confidence of a noble conviction say, "Don't tell me that the fine gentleman is a knave. I read him very differently. Tell me your story, Sir." And then I would tell it. It is not improbable that my position that night have been verified had it not been that it was a landlady and not a landlord who swayed the destinies of the inn. Oh, what a wise intention of our ancestors was the salic law! How justly they appreciated the unbridled rashness of the female character in commercial life—well they understood the one-sided impetuosity with which they rush to wrong conclusions!

Until I listened to the Frau von Wintner, I imagined the German language somewhat weak in the matter of epithets. She undeceived me on this head, and the resources of abusive import that would have done credit to a Homeric hero. Having given me full ten minutes of a strong vocabulary, she then turned on the waiter, scornfully asking him if, in his time of life, he ought to have let himself be imposed upon by so palpable and undeniable a swindler as myself. She then very plainly showed that she was no extenuation of his fault, that rogue and vagabond had been written on my face, and inscribed in characters not to be misunderstood if he had followed the well-beaten track of all my fraternity in fraud, and ordered every thing like meat coarsely but honestly dressed. In fact, so strenuously did she urge this point, and so eager did she seem about enforcing a belief in her statements, that I almost began to suspect she might suggest an anatomical examination of me to sustain her case. Had she been even less eloquent, the audience would still have been with her, for it is a curious but unquestionable fact that in all little visited localities the stranger is ungraciously regarded and ill-looked on.

Whatever I attempted to make a stand in my defense I was overborne at once. Indeed, public opinion was so decidedly against me that I felt very happy in thinking French law was not a Teutonic institution. The room was now filled with retainers of the inn, strangers, townfolk, and travelers, and, to judge by the looks of their gestures and the loud tones of their voices, one would have pronounced me a criminal of the worst sort.

"But what is it that he has done? What's his offense?" I heard a voice say from the crowd, and I fancied his accent was that of a stranger. A perfect inundation of this unparticular accusation, however, now poured in, and I could gather no more. The turmoil and uproar rose and fell, but at every swell, and it was still at its greatest utterly exhausted, I burst out into a very violent attack on the uncivilized habits of a people who could thus receive the bitterness to a man totally unconvicted of any offense.

"Well, well, don't give way to passion; don't let temper get the better of you," said a fat, citizen-like man beside me. "The stranger there has just paid for what you have had, and all is settled."

I thought I should have fainted as I heard these words. Indeed, until that instant I had never brought home to my own mind the utter destitution of my state; but now these I stood, realizing to myself the condition of one of those we send of in our newspapers as having received five shillings from the poor-box, while D. 450 is deputed to make inquiries after him at his lodging, and learn particulars of his life and habits. I could have been being sent to prison. I could have endured any amount of severity, so long as I revolted against its injustice; but the sense of being an object of actual charity crushed me utterly, and I could nearly have cried with vexation.

By degrees the crowd thinned off, and I found myself standing alone beside the table where I had dined, with the hateful old waiter, as though standing a sentinel over me.

"Who is this person," asked I, haughtily, "who, with an indelicate generosity, has presumed to interfere with the concerns of a stranger?"

"The gracious nobleman who has paid for your dinner is now eating his own, at No. 8," said the old monster, with a grin.

"I will call upon him when he has dined," said I, transfixing the wretch with a look so stern as to make rejoinder impossible; and then, throwing my plaid wrapper and my knapsack on a table near, I strolled out into the street.

Lindau is a picturesque old place, as it stands rising as it were out of the very waters of the Lake of Constance, and the great mountain of the Sentis, with its peak of six thousand feet high, is a fine object in the distance; while the gorge up of the Upper Rhine offers many a grand effect of Alpine scenery, not the less striking when looked at with a setting sun, which made the fore-ground more massive and the hill-tops golden; and yet I carried that in my heart which made the whole picture as dark and dreary as Poussin's "Deluge." It was all very beautiful. There was the snow-white summit, reflected in the still water of the lake; there the rich wood, browned with autumn, and now tinted with a golden glory, richer again; there were the white-sailed boats, asleep on the calm surface, streaked with the variegated light of the clouds above, and it was peaceful as it was picturesque. But in what I could not feel joy it, and all because I had lost my purse—just as if certain fragments of a yellow metal the more or the less ought to endure eyesight, and the sense of hearing, and make a man's whole existence miserable. "And after all," thought I, "Catinka will be here this evening, or to-morrow, at farthest. Vätterchen was tired, and could not come on. It was I who left them; I, in my impatience and ill-humor. The old man is doubtless counting out the purse confided to the girl, nor is it at all needful that he should. They will certainly follow me, and why, for the mere inconvenience of an hour or so, should I persist in seeing the whole world so crape-covered and sad-looking? Surely this is not the philosophy my knowledge of life has taught me. I ought to know and feel that these daily accidents are but stones on the road one travels. They may, sometimes, wound the foot or damage the shoe, but they rarely delay the journey, if the traveler be not faint-hearted and craven. I will trample this incident in a higher spirit. I will wait for their coming in that tranquil and assured condition of mind which is the ripe fruit of a real insight into mankind. Fit said, after long years of experience, that there was more of good than of bad in human nature. Let it be the remark of some future biographer that Potts spread out his hands!"

When I got back to the inn I was somewhat puzzled what to do. It would have been impossible with any decency to have accosted any former tone of command, and for the life of me I could not bring myself down to any thing like entreaty. While I thus stood, uncertain how to act, the old waiter approached me, almost courteously, and said my room was ready for me when I wished it.

"I will first of all wait upon the traveler in No. 8," said I.

"He has retired for the night," was the answer. "He seems in very delicate health, and the fatigue of the journey has overcome him."

"To-morrow will do, then," said I, easily; and not choosing upon any inquiry as to the means by which my room was at my disposal, I took my candle and mounted the stairs.

As I lay down in my bed I resolved I would take a calm survey of my past life: what I had done, what I had failed to do, what were the guiding principles which directed me, and whether they were like to teach me. But scarcely had I administered to myself the preliminary oath to tell nothing but the truth, than I fell off sound asleep.

My first waking thought the next morning was to inquire if two persons had arrived in search of a very elderly man and a young woman. I described them. None such had been seen. "They will have sought shelter in some of the inferior hotels," thought I; "I'll up and look after them." I searched the town from end to end; I visited the meanest halting-places of the wayfarer. I inquired at the private houses—at the gate—but none had arrived who bore any resemblance to those I asked after. I was vexed—very vexed at their delay—gradually I found myself growing distrustful. The suspicion that the ice is not strong enough for your weight, and then, close upon that, the shock of fear that comes on when the ice gives a crack or fracture breaks on the ear, are mere symbols of what one suffers at the first glimmering of a betrayal. I repelled the thought with indignation; but certain thoughts there are which, when turned out, stand like sturdy duns at the gate, and will not be sent away. This was one of them. It followed me wherever I went, importunately begging for a hearing, and menacing me with all the consequences if I were obdurate enough not to listen. "You are a simpleton, Potts—a weak, foolish, erring creature! and you select as the object of your confidence those whose lives of accident present exactly as the most irresistible of all temptations to them—the Dupe! How they must have laughed—how they must yet be laughing at you! For that old drunken fox will chuckle over your simplicity, and the minx Tintenfleck indulge herself in caricatures of your figure and face. I wonder how much of truth there was in that old fellow's story? Was he ever the syndic of his village, or was the whole narrative a mere fiction like—like—" I covered my face with my hands in shame as I muttered out, "like one of your own, Potts?"

I was very miserable when I arrived at this, for I could no longer stand proudly forward as the prosecutor, but was obliged to steal ignominiously into the dock and take my place beside the other prisoners. What became of all my honest indignation as I bethought me that I of all men could never arraign the counterfeit and the sham? No, no, there is a Nemesis for this as for all the other faults of one's nature, and as we see fish chased and devoured by other fish, who themselves have persecutors, so they who deceive must in their turn be deceived; the one grand ground of consolation which remains to the honest dupe—the sense of having deserved better—is lost to him who is a knave toward others.

"Let them go, then," cried I, "and prosper if they can; I will never pursue them. I will even try and remember what pleased and interested me in my first fortune, and so may be, forget that they have carried away my little all of wealth."

A loud tramping of post-horses, and the cracking of whips, drew me to the window, and I saw beneath in the court-yard a handsome traveling-carriage getting ready for the road. By the way suggestive is a well-cushioned caleche, with its many appliances of ease and luxury, its trim imperials, its comfortable rug—all suggestive of gentle-books—all little episodes of those who are to journey in it!

"Who are the happy souls about to travel thus cheerfully?" thought I, as I saw the waiter and the courier discussing the most convenient spot to deposit a small hamper with eatables for the road; and then I heard the landlady's voice call out,

"Take up the bill to No. 8."

So, then, this was he, who was fat getting ready to depart—No. 8, who had interposed in my favor the evening before, and toward whom in a night's rest and refreshment I had altered my feelings and changed my sentiments very remarkably.

"Have you ask the gentleman at No. 8 if I may be permitted to speak with him?" said I to the man who took in the bill.

"He'll scarcely see you now—he's just going off."

"Give the message as I speak it," said I; and he disappeared.

There was a long interval before he issued forth again, and when he did so he was flurried and excited. Some overcharges had to be taken off, and some bad money in change to be replaced by honest coin, and it was evident that various little well-intended rogueries had not achieved their intended success.

"Go in, you'll find him there," said the waiter, insolently, as he went down to have the bill rectified.

I knocked. A full, round voice cried, "Come in!" and I entered.

This work, by Fredrika Bremer, who is the most original thinker and writer of the age, abounds in the most beautiful descriptions of the scenery and life of Switzerland and Italy, and is worthy of the highest commendation. The Authoress lands the reader easily, and almost imperceptibly, into the very heart of the society of the land she visits; he is there as if he made a part of that society, and that he is, with her, enjoying, in the richness of its most beauty of all the surroundings of which she is the centre, while enchanted with her beautiful and vivid description of scenes and places, in imagination he is seated with her the mountain side, and gazes upon the splendid panorama spread out in all its glorious beauty; sees in the beautiful vale, listening to the music of the stream, and drinking in invigorating draughts of the mountain air, he gazes in awe upon the rain-storm that threatens to bast a season, swelling the mountain torrents, with their thunder and surge, and thunder down in their courses to the sea and the lakes, presaging wrath and threatening destruction. He sees in the evening the fire "fairies smile upon the deluge-physiognomy of the Brocken," conjuring up a sublime panorama of the "cloud garment of the Jura" until "the earth covered with luxuriant grass and flowers, and with fearful eyes, but the rain-storm that threatens to bast a season, swelling the mountain torrents, with their thunder and surge, and thunder down in their courses to the sea and the lakes, presaging wrath and threatening destruction. Now Ready:
Negroes and Negro "Slavery."
The First an Inferior Race—The Latter its Normal Condition.
BY J. H. VAN EVRIE, M.D.
1 Vol. 12mo, Price $1.

The author of this pamphlet has devoted several years to the great and agitating question of so-called negro slavery. He writes directly into two parts: first, the specific and radical differences of the races he examines. The color, figure, hair, features, brain, &c., of the negro are shown to be only the more palpable specialities, out of a thousand similar ones separating the negro from the white man. Why, when or how the Creator saw fit to thus order this difference in regard to materials, He simply starts with the facts as they exist. After the negro is shown to be a different being, physically and mentally, his proper relation to the white race is demonstrated; also mulattoism, hybridism and its ultimate extinction, showing the impossibility of intermixture like separate species of the white race; the "Slave" Trade, its humanity and ignominy—darkness, the education of negroes, the domestic affections, their wide difference from those of the white race, marriage, climatic and industrial adaptation, the American idea of government, northern and southern predomes, the future of the negro, his natural home in the tropics, the British anti-slavery policy, &c., are the general subjects discussed, showing that the utmost harmony exists between the northern and southern systems of society, and that all the negro question exists only in the minds of ignorant or dishonest politicians.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For February, 1861.

A complete Set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE will be a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. Besides the Tales, Poems, and Essays which form the leading features of Periodical Literature, each Number of the Magazine has contained articles of permanent value. Nearly Two Hundred Papers, illustrated by more than Two Thousand Engravings, have been devoted to American History, Biography, Industry, Character, and Scenery. Each of our great Agricultural Staples has been made the subject of elaborate articles. The results of the explorations of travelers in regions heretofore undescribed have been carefully epitomized. The "Literary Notices" embody impartial estimates of more than two thousand books, comprising almost every work of any value which has been issued from the American press during the last ten years. The "Monthly Record of Current Events," though filling a small space in each Number, contains matter sufficient to fill several volumes. Every event of historical importance is here noted; it furnishes a more complete history of the last ten years than can be found in any other accessible shape.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, aware of its permanent value, have electrotyped every page. They can, therefore, supply any Number from the beginning upon the following terms:

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Any Volume, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for $2 00 per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent from the above rates. THE SECEDING MISSISSIPPI DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE MISSISSIPPI DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.

JEFFERSON DAVIS, a Senator from Mississippi, is the son of Samuel Davis, a Revolutionary soldier, and was born in Kentucky on the 3d of June, 1808. Soon afterward his father removed to Mississippi, where he received his elementary education, and then entered Transylvania University, Kentucky, from whence he entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1824. After graduating, he served with such ability in the line and staff, that when a new regiment of dragoons was raised in 1833 he received a first lieutenant's commission therein, and for two years was actively engaged in the expeditions against the Indians at the Northwest. Resigning his commission in 1835, he settled down on his plantation, devoting many of his hours to the study of political economy, until in 1843 he was tempted from his retirement to "take the stump" in behalf of the Democratic party, and was, as he terms a shanghai, that he was nominated and afterward elected a member of the Electoral College which gave the vote of Mississippi to Polk and Dallas. In 1845 he was elected to Congress, but resigned at the commencement of the Mexican war, to accept the colonelcy of the First Mississippi Rifles, which performed such effective service at Monterrey and at Buena Vista. Returning home severely wounded, he was elected in 1847 to the United States Senate, where he took high States Rights grounds, and was re-elected in 1851, but resigned to enter into a contest with Henry S. Foote for the gubernatorial chair. Although he reduced the majority of his opponent, he was defeated by 999 votes; but he continued to take a leading part in politics, and was appointed Secretary of War when General Pierce became President. His able administration of military affairs is well known; and since his return to the Senate in 1857 he has, as chairman of the Military Committee, done much to increase the efficiency of our army. Personally, Senator Davis is the Bayard of Congress, sans peur et sans reproche, a finished scholar; a high-minded gentleman; an easy, yet vigorous and effective speaker; a devoted father; a true friend. He is emphatically one of those "born to command," and is doubtless destined to occupy a high position, either in the Southern Confederacy or in the United States. While so gloriously linked with the Union, by services in the field, the forum, and the cabinet, he has repeatedly declared: "If, in the contingency of the election of a President on the platform of Mr. Seward's Rochester speech, let the Union be dissolved." Let the "great, but not the greatest, evil" come; for, as did the wise and good Calhoun, from whom he drawn that expression of value, I love and venerate the Union of these States, but I love Liberty and Mississippi more."

ALBERT GALLATIN BROWN, a Senator from Mississippi, was born in Chester District, South Carolina, in 1813, and about ten years afterward was taken by his father to the State where he now resides, and where he commenced life as a farmer's boy. After receiving the limited educational advantages, he was admitted to the bar when only nineteen years of age, commenced practice, and in 1835 was elected to the State Legislature, where he soon distinguished himself by a report against the Constitutional right of the General Government to charter a United States Bank. After becoming the Democratic leader in the Legislature, he was, in 1839, elected to the National House of Representatives, and, after declining a re-nomination, was placed on the bench of the Circuit Court. In 1844 he was elected Governor, and served four years with great credit, restoring the finances of the State to a healthy condition, establishing a State University and Common Schools, and taking the initiative steps in the works of internal improvement since so nobly carried out. In 1849 he was again elected to the House of Representatives; and in 1854 was transferred to the Senate, where his frank, energetic nature gives him a commanding position in debate. Emphatically "a man of the people," Governor Brown is the sworn foe of extravagance and profligacy in the management of public affairs, and a zealous advocate for the interests of the people of the District of Columbia, who are represented by him as chairman of the Committee on Territories. That the Confederated Government should acknowledge slaves as property, and protect them as such, he believes to be the right of Mississippi to claim, and if she is refused he considers secession the proper course for her and every other Southern State to take.

LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR, who represents the First District in the House, was born in Central Georgia, in 1820, and was educated for the bar. Removing to Mississippi, he settled at Oxford, Lafayette, where he now resides, and identified himself with the States Rights party at an early period of its existence. After filling many local offices, he was elected to Congress in 1857, and was placed by Speaker Orr on the Committee on Elections—a tribute to his ability for cursus. Involving such complicated questions and the often contradictory decisions which accompany contests for seats. In various debates involving the question of slavery he has taken a prominent part, regarding the negro "as his own words—"as an institution of property, of society, and of government, in the Constitution." If the constitutional rights of the South could have been protected, he would not have been a "Secessionist" for he openly declared in debate so recently as December, 1859: "For one, I am no disunionist per se. I am devoted to the Constitution of this Union, and so long as this Republic is a great tolerant Republic, throwing its loving arms around both sections of the country, I, for one, will bestow every talent which God has given me for its promotion and its glory. We intend to abide by it and to maintain it, and we will submit to no persistent violation of its provisions. I do not say it for any purpose of menace, but for the purpose of defining my own position. When it is violated, persistently violated—when its spirit is no longer observed upon this floor—I war upon your government; I am against it. I am upon the basis of secession, and I will fight under it as long as the blood flows and ebbs in my veins."

REUBEN DAVIS, the Representative from the Second District, is the son of a Virginian who fought under General Washington in the revolutionary struggle, and who removed in 1815 to Tennessee, where Reuben was born in January, 1813. After acquiring such an education as the limited means of his father permitted, he went to Alabama, and thence to Mississippi, where he studied medicine and practiced a short time. Returning to Alabama he read law, as a profession more congenial to his tastes, and was admitted to the bar at Tuscaloosa, after which he removed to Aberdeen, in Mississippi, where he has since resided. In 1835 and in 1837 he was chosen District Attorney for the Sixth Judicial District, and in 1842 he was appointed to a seat on the bench of the State High Court of Errors. In 1845 he was a prime colleague of the Second Mississippi Regiment, which did not arrive in season for the battle of Buena Vista, but was retained by General Taylor in the column under his command until the expiration of its term of service. In 1851 Colonel Davis took a prominent position among the States Rights men, received the nomination for Governor, and in 1855 was elected to the State Legislature on that platform. Elected to Congress in 1857, he has been a useful member of the Democratic party in Congress, and has mingled freely in prominent debates, his marked personal resemblance to Daniel Webster making him an object of curiosity to many to the strangers from New England. Mrs. Davis, it may not be amiss to state, is the writer of some of the sweetest poems which have been contributed to Southern literature, and shares with her husband the warm esteem of devoted friends in every section of this Union. Like her husband, she fearlessly express his regard for, as protected by the Constitution. Yet he has ever warned his Northern friends that Mississippi will maintain her rights if the "irrepressible conflict" is inevitably arrayed against them.

"We, Sir," said he, in a speech delivered over a year since, "will resist. We are the descendants of a revolutionary country, who fought for liberty like water, and spent their money without regret, to strike on the shackles of British injustice and legislative tyranny. We are the descendants who burn our houses, and convert our sunny South—now beautiful as a garden of flowers, rich in soil, and yielding abundant harvests—into a desolate once which has given to the North and the world its present commercial and national prosperity—into a wilderness waste. We, Sir, at the hazard of bringing upon the world bankruptcy and ruin, famine and pestilence, lamentation and mourning."

WILLIAM BARKSDALE, the popular member from the Third Representative District of Mississippi, was born on the 21st of August, 1821, in Rutherford County, Tennessee, at the residence from which his father had gone, in the war of 1812, to fight the battles of the Confederacy. After receiving his education at Nashville, Barksdale entered William removed to Columbus, Mississippi, where he read law, and was admitted to the bar before he was of age. He soon gained a lucrative practice, he also conducted the Columbus Democrat, in which he sustained the doctrine of Jefferson and Madison, that the right to judge of "infractions of the Constitution, as well as the mode and means of redress," has never been delegated to the Federal Government, and consequently each State has the right of peaceable secession. In 1846 he went to Mexico, as a staff officer in the Second Mississippi Regiment, performing his arduous duties with great credit. In 1849 he published a series of powerful measures of 1850, he was a member of the State Convention called to discuss them in 1851; and in 1853 (the Legislature having refused to instruct the State) he was elected to Congress on the general ticket. Since then, he has been a leading member of the States Rights wing of the Democratic party, and his fearless, manly, yet gentlemanly bearing, and social courtesy have given weight to his decided remarks. "Never," said he, in a speech delivered in January, 1860, "will I submit to the dictation of this Union; but should the Republican party obtain the control of the Government, I shall be for dissolution. Heavier taxation than has ever been borne by the South, as the statistics which I have before me will clearly prove: and we have patriotically submitted to it because of the interests which the Union of our fathers. For the future, I would demand that all the compromises and guarantees of the Constitution shall be rigidly enforced, and I would state the Union upon the issue. And even in the event of its dissolution, I shall have no fears for the South. With a territory larger than all of Europe, with our cotton crop worth at this day to more than two hundred million dollars; with our rice, and sugar, and tobacco; with a people united in feeling and sentiment, and with her own borders all the elements of a splendid nationality. If, then, we are to have no peace, if fierce aggressions shall be still the order of the day, if sectional warfare is never to cease, the South, with the strong arms and brave hearts of her gallant sons, will build up for herself a proud name."

OTHO R. SINGLETON, the Representative from the Fourth District, was born in Jessamine County, Kentucky, and received an English education. Settling at Bardstown in that State, after which he removed to Mississippi, where he has since been a leading member of the bar. Having identified himself with the States Rights party, he served two years in the Lower, and six years in the Upper House of the Legislature of Mississippi, during which time he took an active part in all measures calculated to develop the resources of the State, and make her an independent power. In 1852 he was elected a member of the Electoral College which gave the vote of Mississippi to Pierce and King, and the following year he was elected to Congress. In discussing the great question of the day he has ever taken what were considered such ultra Southern views that he was opposed by a more conservative States Right Democrat at the Election for the Thirty-Sixth Congress, but in a district of 14,000 votes he was elected by a majority of 3564, showing that he represents his constituents. He has never hesitated in proclaiming that, in his opinion, the election of a Republican President would bring on resistance at the South, and in 1859 announced in debate that the only plan for preserving the Union was this: "You of the North must recede at once from the position you have taken; throw open the Territories to us; acknowledge our rights to slave property, declare to the world that, if a Territory apply for admission as a slave State, you will at once, and without any reservation, admit her; execute the Fugitive Slave Law; however unpleasant it may be to you, give assurance to the people of the South, that when their slaves run away, you will not, hereafter, interpose no obstacles to their recovery; cease your eternal war upon this institution, and then we may expect the storm to subside, the waves of passion to recede, and the vessel of state to right herself, and dance gayly away before a prosperous breeze. I am no prophet, nor the son of a prophet; but I tell you that, unless you do this, unless you decide from the course which you are pursuing, the historian now lives who will write the sad epitaph of Ilium fuit upon the mountains of the country."

JOHN J. MCRAE, Representative from the Fifth District, was born where he now resides, in Wayne County, Mississippi, in the year in which the State was admitted into the Union. Receiving a thorough education, he was admitted to the bar, and so distinguished himself in his profession that he was sent to the State Legislature soon after attaining his majority. Repeatedly re-elected, and twice chosen Speaker, he was finally transferred to the Senate, and in 1854 was elected Governor, succeeding Hon. Henry S. Foote. While in the gubernatorial chair he distinguished himself in advancing the internal improvements of the State, in perfecting her educational system, and in developing her mechanical interests. After the death of the lamented Quitman, Governor McRae was elected as his successor, and took his seat during the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress. During the prolonged contest which resulted in the election of Mr. Pennington as Speaker of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, he took an active part in the exciting debates; and his prolonged encounter with Mr. Carter of New York, on the tenets of the Republican party, in a good-natured yet determined manner, was a feature of the struggle. He himself, he not only deemed slavery national, but "a universal institution of God and man, nature and Christianity, earth and heaven—having its origin in the law of God, sustained by the Bible, sustained by Christianity, sustained by the laws of all nations, sustained by all history in all parts of the world."

HIGH TREASON.

THE crime of high treason is unfamiliar to our courts and juries; the very word—treason—is not understood by the bulk of our people—so calm and tranquil has been our national life during the past two generations.

"Treason against the United States," says the Constitution (Art. 3, Sect. 3), "shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." A subsequent clause in the Constitution empowered Congress to pronounce the penalty of treason, as will be seen in the statute of April 30, 1790, declaring that persons convicted of treason should "suffer death," and that persons "adjudged guilty of misprision of treason"—that is to say, persons who knew of the treason and did not make it known to the authorities—should be "imprisoned not exceeding seven years, and fined not exceeding $1000." This is the sum of treason in the United States.

There is but one very famous case of treason in our judicial records—that of Aaron Burr.

Fifty-six years have elapsed since Burr committed the acts which led to his trial. He had been Vice-President of the United States, and had vainly hoped to be President. He not only failed in that project, but on the re-election of Jefferson was set aside as Vice, and Clinton, of New York, chosen instead; he failed again in his effort to become Governor of the State. It was the smart of these defeats which set him boiling. His scheme was to establish an independent government west of the Alleghanies, which should include Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, the Territory of Louisiana (now Missouri), and to annex to the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kansas, and part of Mexico. Some of his letters and confessions justify the belief that the form of government he would adopt was monarchical, with himself as sovereign, and New Orleans as his capital. At any rate, it is certain that he looked to the secession of the States and Territories named to the acquisition of part of Mexico, and to the consolidation of a great empire on the banks of the Mississippi. He proceeded so far with his enterprise as to collect bodies of men in various places, to seize some military posts, to secure the confederation of certain dissatisfied officers of the army and navy, and to enter into negotiations with some foreign Powers, whose aid he proposed to secure by allowing them peculiar commercial privileges. From the contemporaneous accounts of his proceedings it would seem that he obtained very considerable encouragement from the people of the Territories of Mississippi and Louisiana. It is supposed that the pulse of Jackson was felt, for in a letter to Claiborne he says: "I hate the Dons, and would like to see Mexico reduced; but I would die in the last ditch before I would see the Union dissolved." But at Frankfort, Kentucky, where Burr was arrested by a zealous district-attorney, he was triumphantly acquitted, and honored by a public ball afterward. Matters were working favorably enough for his schemes, a considerable force had been collected on Blennerhasset Island, and newspapers were sedulously engaged in imbuing the people on the Mississippi with secession-ist doctrines, when President Jefferson issued his famous proclamation against Burr. This vigorous measure turned the tide. The people, brought face to face with the emergency, naturally took the side of the Government and loyalty. The Legislature of Ohio authorized the seizure of Burr's boats. The Legislature of Kentucky posted militia to guard the river. The Governor of Mississippi Territory called out 400 men to arrest Burr. At New Orleans several of his accomplices were arrested. The great secessionist himself was taken in Mississippi, sent to Richmond, Virginia, and there tried for high treason. Chief Justice Marshall presided, and charged the jury that there was no evidence of there having been any assembling of men in arms to resist the Government, and no evidence to connect Burr with the gatherings which had taken place on Blennerhasset Island. If the Government had proved that there had been assemblages of men in arms instigated by Burr, and intending to resist the Government, it would seem that he would have been convicted and hanged.

This famous case is the only precedent in our reports which sheds any light on the law of treason in the United States.

Within the last few days the painful subject has been agitated in legal and social circles. Persons have been summoned before the Grand Jury in New York for shipping arms to Alabama and South Carolina. A collector is said to have been arrested in South Carolina for protesting his willingness to pay over duties to the United States Government. Affidavits have been laid before the Supreme Court charging ex-members of the Cabinet with high treason, with treason. If the present controversy be not adjusted by a compromise our courts will soon be busily engaged in cases of treason.

Two rather interesting legal questions have been suggested by recent events:

1. What is "levying war" against the United States? Blackstone says (Book IV., p. 81) that war may be levied "by taking arms to reform the laws, to remove evil counselors, or other grievances whether real or pretended.....To resist the King's forces by defending a castle against them is a levying of war; and so is an insurrection with a view to pull down all inclosures, and the like." Chief-Justice Marshall said: "If a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."

2. What is "adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort?" Blackstone (Book IV., p. 82) says that "giving the enemy intelligence, sending him provisions, selling him arms," is giving him aid and comfort.

The authority of Blackstone is the more important as it has been cited in the decisions above quoted was, as we learn from Curtis on the Constitution (Book IV., Chap. xii., p. 384), taken verbatim from the great English statute, 25 Edward III. cap. 2, upon which Blackstone's commentary is based.

THE LOUNGER.

ON THE WATCH.

COMMODORE BANKS, of Massachusetts, recommends, in his last Message, that the dome of the Boston State House be gilded. That dome is the most conspicuous object as you approach the city; and it is seen from all the neighboring heights, the dome of St. Peter's is seen from the villas about Rome. Boston also sits upon its three hills, dark and massive, like a feudal baron; and the gilded dome would be only like a glittering crown, reminding the feudatory villages around off the grandeur of their lord. That lord ought to be proud of his subjects, for no city in the world had ever a more thrifty, prosperous, intelligent neighborhood of villages. Each wears its style and runs each apart contented with themselves and proud of the whole.

Now if, some winter morning, when you wish to get a little more of the secret of that thrift and character, you take one of the trains that incessantly departing westward from Boston, after crossing the Back Bay, and gliding through the gardens of Brookline and Brighton, skirting the valley of the Charles River, you will find yourself in the pretty village of West Newton. It is white and wooden, and neat and cheerful, especially as you see it the next moment from the comfortable robes, wrapped in which you are slipping along the road behind a solid pair of horses, making music as they go. A few moments bring you to the road which winds above a broad basin of the Charles, upon which they are cutting ice. The surface of the river is furrowed by a horse and machine, and the process looks to you like winter plowing. But yonder are spires among the trees; and nearer, upon the very edge of the river basin, is a low two-story building, full of windows. The spires are the spires of Waltham, and the many-windowed building is the factory of the American Watch Company.

Of all manufactures, that of watches must be the most exquisite and delicate. But why should Europe make our watches? asks common sense and the genius of American enterprise. Why should it? asks the American Watch Company; and in this factory that Company is demonstrating why we should make them for ourselves. And it is a very pretty and satisfactory answer to a very plain question.

There are some two hundred and forty or fifty hands employed, of which about a third are women, and only about a dozen in all are foreigners, mainly Englishmen; and the work is almost exclusively done by machinery, but machinery so delicate and beautiful that, when your mind has become a little excited by observing the innumerable and to you inexplicable processes of the different wheels, you feel as if you had seen the human brain in full play, thinking out watches.

The fineness of the work is bewildering. Here are screws not exceeding a hundred of an inch which make a pound. They are kept in little glass phials, like those of the Homeopathic medicine cases. And here are springs of metal so fine that five thousand must be laid side by side to make an inch; and here are measures that will indicate the ten thousandth part of an inch. Here, with a flying steel point, notched with a paste of diamond-dust, the inside of the fine bores of the "jewels" are polished; and in the gallery engraving machines the pure gold upon the plates; while just beyond, wheels with their outer rim studded with small wisps or brooms of brass wire, revolve with a velocity that makes the room hum, and impart to the plates that sparkling, frosty complexion which is peculiar to the inner plates of watches.

The genius of the work by machinery mobilizes the whole business. The Company may have turned out about forty or fifty thousand watches, and these are all divided into different classes, sizes, etc. For instance, there may be a thousand or five thousand "foundations" cut and shaped local. They are all exactly of the same size; each line in one corresponds with the same in all the others. Each hole is drilled in precisely the same spot, so that the screw which will fit one hole in one will perfectly fit the corresponding hole in all. So with the wheels also; and if your watch in California or Hindostan loses some such part, you have only to send to the factory for number and class, and you have by return-mail the part wanting. Do you guess how it is packed? A thin layer of wool is set open and the exact

RALPH FARNHAM'S LAST DREAM.

In the midst of his children's children, by the home-fire's cheerful blaze,
An old man sat in an easy-chair, dreaming of by-gone days;
Dreaming of wearisome marches, by flood, morass, and wold,
Where many a brave heart fainted with hunger and thirst and cold:
Dreaming of midnight watches in the dreary, drizzling rain,
And the hum of his comrades' voices, that he never should hear again;
Of the smouldering fires of the bivouac, the sentinel's measured tread,
The smoke and roar of the battle, and the faces of the dead—
Of the fair young son of his neighbor, who fought and fell by his side,
And the sacred message he gave him to his girl-love when he died.
He saw the face of the maiden grow as cold as death and as pale,
As he sat by her father's hearth-stone and told her the cruel tale.
"Ay, ay!" in his sleep he murmured, "she was fair and he was brave,
But she faded away like a blossom, and we made him a soldier's grave.
But we routed the British legions, and sent them over the sea,
For the God of battles helped us, and our native land was free.
My son, I have been dreaming a dream that gave me pain;
I thought I was young, and a soldier, fighting for freedom again:
I saw the tents and the banners, and the shining ranks of the foe,
And the crimson tracks our poor recruits left on the frozen snow.
But is it true, this rumor, or only an idle tale—
Do they talk of dissolving the Union?—Ah, well may your cheek grow pale,
And well may an old man tremble, and his heart beat faint and low,
When he thinks of the price it cost us some fourscore years ago!
I have watched its growing greatness through a life of many years,
But I never forgot that its blessings were purchased with blood and tears.
I never forgot the privations of fourscore years ago,
When the naked feet of our poor recruits left crimson tracks in the snow.
I never forgot their faces, and I seem to see them still,
Who looked straight into the face of death at the battle of Bunker's Hill.
And so the home of Marion is the first to break the band
That bound the beautiful sisterhood of our beloved land;
The children of the heroes around whose memory clings
The glory of King's Mountain, Cowpens, and Eutaw Springs!
I saw our blessed banner, with its white and crimson bars,
When fair South Carolina was one of the thirteen stars;
And if ever that constellation is marred or rent in twain,
It would blast the sight of these poor old eyes to see its folds again.
If God has forsaken our country, the only boon I crave
Is that He will delay its ruin till I have gone down to the grave;
For I could not breathe with traitors, nor turn my face to the sun,
Nor dwell in the land of the living, when the States are no longer one."

UNDER THE FIR-TREES.

A HARVEST ROMANCE.

"HA, MARIAN! well met, fair maid! Where roaming this bright morn?"
The maiden, with a sigh, replies, "My Lord, to lease the corn."
Her hair with blossoms wild bedeck'd, her cheek with blushes dyed,
She stands a very queen of flowers, yet downcast as a bride.

"Come, Marian, my love, with me; nay, why so bashful now?
This scorching sun will deeply tinge the whiteness of thy brow;
The coarse, harsh stubble of the fields these little hands will spoil;
My village beauty was not born to suffer heat and toil.

"Come, fairest, come, why linger still? Such rude employment leave;
Beneath the fir-trees' welcome shade, we'll wander as at eve.
Have you that happy hour forgot—my murmur'd vows and sighs?
Dear Marian, turn, and let me read my answer in thine eyes!"

Fair Marian at his bidding turns; they pace beneath the trees,
Whose tall and tender columns wave and mutter with each breeze.
But those sweet eyes are filled with tears, the blush forsakes her cheek.
"What is it troubles Marian so? Speak, little maiden, speak."

But Marian, resting on a bank, looks down and thinks a while;
The handsome noble, lounging near, looks on with careless smile.
No sound disturbs the solitude but labor's distant hum:
Impatiently at last he cries, "My sweetest, art thou dumb?"

Then, hands clasped loosely round his arm, upturn'd her pretty face,
Fair Marian says with earnest air, yet full of modest grace,
"The words you whisper'd me last night, and once we met before,

SEA BATTERY, FORT MONROE, OLD POINT COMFORT, VIRGINIA.—[SEE PAGE 70.]

Were best unsaid—must be forgot—and we must meet no more.

"Nay, hear me, while I tell you how, in listening to those vows,
With joyful heart methought I heard the waving fir-tree boughs
Say, as the soft wind through them sang, 'Such fond words must be true.
Ah! happy, happy Marian! he loves and loves but you!'

"We parted—homeward went your steps, but mine here linger'd still,
Lest other eyes should guess what hopes my flutt'ring bosom fill;
But as I mused, another song the trees sang in mine ear,
'Ah, simple, simple Marian! Doubt, maiden, doubts and fear!'

"Then asked I again my heart—'But could my lord mean guile?
Would one so great as he deceive poor Marian with a smile?
The untarnish'd honor of his house, his name be all forgot?'
So mournfully the branches waved, I trembling fled the spot!

"And through the long and wakeful night still sounded in mine ear
The soughing of those fir-tree boughs—'Doubt, maiden, doubt and fear!'
My lord, I have no more to tell, my inmost thought you know:
But now her falt'ring voice in vain essays to bid him go.

The young man listened with his head bent down upon his breast.
He answered, "Little friend, forgive this sad and sorry jest;
In seeing you so beautiful, I have been much to blame,
For trifling with so pure a heart, regardless of your fame!"

Bending yet lower, that fair face he once more looks upon.
"Forgive—forgive me, Marian." One kiss, and he is gone!
Faintly, more faintly falls his step—it dies in far-off grove,
And with it fade the maiden's dream, her first sweet dream of love.

Up, up, there is no longer time here grievingly to stay;
For in the fields ask many tongues "Where Marian is to-day?"
The griefs and cares of poverty must workfully be borne;
But Marian's tears fall thick and fast, while leasing in the corn.

CHAPTER XV.

WITH my head full of George Barnwell, I was at first disposed to believe that I must have had some hand in the attack upon my sister, or at all events that as her near relation, popularly known to be under obligations to her, I was a more legitimate object of suspicion than any one else. But when, in the clearer light of next morning, I began to reconsider the matter and to hear it discussed around me on all sides, I took another view of the case which was more reasonable.

Joe had been at the Three Jolly Bargemen, smoking his pipe, from a quarter after eight o'clock to a quarter before ten. While he was there my sister had been seen standing at the kitchen door, and had exchanged Good-night with a farm-laborer going home. The man could not be more particular as to the time at which he saw her (he got into dense confusion when he tried to be) than that it must have been before nine. When Joe went home a few minutes before ten he found her struck down on the floor, and promptly called in assistance. The fire had not then burned unusually low, nor was the snuff of the candle very long; the candle, however, had been blown out.

Nothing had been taken away from any part of the house. Neither, beyond the blowing out of the candle—which stood on a table between the door and my sister, and was behind her when she stood facing the fire and was struck—was there any disarrangement of the kitchen, excepting such as she herself had made in falling and bleeding. But there was one remarkable piece of evidence on the spot. She had been struck with something blunt and heavy on the head and spine: after the blows were dealt, something heavy had been thrown down at her with considerable violence as she lay on her face. And on the ground beside her, when Joe picked her up, was a convict's leg-iron which had been filed asunder.

Now Joe, examining this iron with a smith's eye, declared it to have been filed asunder some time ago. The hue and cry going off to the Hulks, and people coming thence to examine the iron, Joe's opinion was corroborated. They did not undertake to say when it had left the prison-ships, to which it undoubtedly had once belonged; but they claimed to know for certain that that particular manacle had not been worn by either of two convicts who had escaped last night. Further, one of those two was already retaken, and had not freed himself of his iron.

Knowing what I knew, I set up an inference of my own here. I believed the iron to be my convict's iron—the iron I had seen and heard him filing at on the marshes—but my mind did not accuse him of having put it to its latest use. For I believed one of two other persons to have become possessed of it, and to have turned it to this cruel account. Either Orlick or the strange man who had shown me the file.

Now as to Orlick, he had gone to town exactly as he told us when we picked him up at the turnpike; he had been seen about town all the evening, he had been in divers companies in several public houses, and he had come back with myself and Mr. Wopsle. There was nothing against him save the quarrel; and my sister had quarrelled with him, and with every body else about her, ten thousand times. As to the strange man, if he had come back for his two bank-notes there could have been no dispute about them, because my sister was fully prepared to restore them. Besides, there had been no altercation; the assailant had come in so silent and suddenly that she had been felled before she could look round.

It was horrible to think that I had provided the weapon, however undesignedly, but I could hardly think otherwise. I suffered unspeakable trouble while I considered and reconsidered whether I should at last dissolve that spell of my childhood, and sell Joe all the story. For months afterward I every day settled the question finally in the negative, and reopened and reargued it next morning. The contention came, after all, to this: the secret was such an old one now, had so grown into me and become a part of myself, that I could not tear it away. In addition to the dread that, having fed up to so much mischief, it would be now more likely than ever to alienate Joe from me if he believed it, I had the further restraining dread that he would not believe it, but would assort it with the fabulous dogs and veal cutlets as a monstrous invention. However, I temporized with myself, of course—for, was I not wavering between right and wrong, when the thing is always done?—and resolved to make a full disclosure if I should see any such new occasion as a new chance of helping in the discovery of the assailant.

The Constables, and the Bow Street men from London—for this happened in the days of the extinct red waistcoated police—were about the house for a week or two, and did pretty much what I have heard and read of like authorities doing in other such cases. They took up several obviously wrong people, and they ran their heads very hard against wrong ideas, and persisted in trying to fit the circumstances to the ideas, instead of trying to extract ideas from the circumstances. Also, they stood about the door of the Jolly Bargemen, with knowing and reserved looks, that filled the whole neighborhood with admiration; and they had a mysterious manner of taking their drink, that was almost as good as taking the culprit. But not quite, for they never did it.

Long after these constitutional powers had dispersed my sister lay very ill in bed. Her sight was disturbed, so that she saw objects multiplied, and grasped at visionary tea-cups and wine-glasses instead of the realities; her hearing was greatly impaired; her memory also; and her speech was unintelligible. When at last she came round so far as to be helped down stairs, it was still necessary to keep my slate always by her, that she might indicate in writing what she could not indicate in speech. As she was (very bad handwriting apart) a more than indifferent speller, and as Joe was a more than indifferent reader, extraordinary complications arose between them, which I was always called in to solve. The administration of mutton instead of medicine, the substitution of Tea for Joe, and the baker for bacon, were among the mildest of my own mistakes.

However, her temper was greatly improved and she was patient. A tremulous uncertainty of the action of all her limbs soon became a part of her regular state, and afterward, at intervals of two or three months, she would often put her hands to her head and would then remain for about a week at a time in some gloomy abstraction of mind. We were at a loss to find a suitable attendant for her, until a circumstance happened conveniently to relieve us. Mr. Wopsle's great aunt conquered a confirmed habit of living into which she had fallen, and Biddy became a part of our establishment.

It may have been about a month after my sister's reappearance in the kitchen when Biddy came to us with a small speckled box containing the whole of her worldly effects, and became a blessing to the household. Above all, she was a blessing to Joe, for the dear old fellow was sadly cut up by the constant contemplation of the wreck of his wife, and had been accustomed, while attending on her all the evening, to turn to me every now and then, and say, with his blue eyes moistened, "Such a fine figure of a woman as she once were, Pip!" Biddy instantly taking the cleverest charge of her, as though she had studied her from infancy, Joe became able in some sort to appreciate the greater quiet of his life, and to get down to the Jolly Bargemen now and then, for a change that did him good. It was characteristic of the police people that they had all more or less suspected poor Joe (though he never knew it), and that they had to a man concurred in regarding him as one of the deepest spirits they had ever encountered.

Biddy's first triumph in her new office was to solve a difficulty that had completely vanquished me. I had tried hard at it, but had made nothing of it. This it was:

Again and again and again my sister had traced upon the slate a character that looked like a curious T, and then, with the utmost eagerness, had called our attention to it as something she particularly wanted. I had in vain tried every thing producible that began with a T, from tar to toast and tub. At length it had come into my head that the sign looked like a hammer, and on my lastly calling that word in my sister's ear she had begun to hammer on the table, and expressed a qualified assent. Thereupon I had brought in all our hammers, one after another, but without avail. Then I bethought me of a crutch, the shape being much the same, and I borrowed one of a cripple in the village, and displayed it to my sister with considerable confidence. But she shook her head to that extent, when she was shown it, that we were terrified lest, in her wrath and shattered state, she should dislocate her neck.

When my sister found that Biddy was very quick to understand her, this mysterious sign immediately reappeared on the slate. Biddy looked thoughtfully at it, heard my explanation, looked thoughtfully at my sister, looked thoughtfully at Joe (who was always represented on the slate by his initial letter), and ran into the forge, followed by Joe and me.

"Why, of course!" cried Biddy, with an exultant face. "I know what you see!"

Orlick, without a doubt! She had lost his name, and could only signify him by his hammer. We told him so, and he wanted him to come into the kitchen, and he slowly laid down his hammer, wiped his brow with his arm, took another wipe at it with his apron, and came slouching out, with a curious loose, vagabond bend in the knees that strongly distinguished him.

I confess that I expected to see my sister denounce him, and that I was disappointed by the different result. She manifested the greatest anxiety to be on good terms with him; was evidently much pleased by his being at length produced, and noticed that she would have him given something to drink. She watched his countenance as if she were particularly wishful to be assured that he took kindly to his reception; she showed every possible desire to conciliate him; and there was an air of humble propitiation in all she did, such as I have seen pervade the bearing of a frightened child toward a hard master. After that day, a day rarely passed without her drawing the hammer on her slate, and without Orlick's slouching in and standing doggedly before her, as if he knew no more than I did what to make of it.

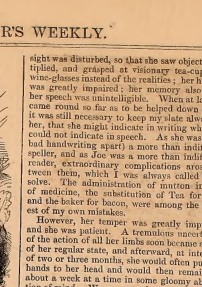
CHAPTER XVI.

I NOW fell into a regular routine of apprenticeship-life, which was varied, beyond the limits of the village and the marshes, by no more remarkable occurrence than the arrival of my birthday and my paying another visit to Miss Havisham. I found Miss Sarah Pocket still on duty at the gate; I found Miss Havisham just as I had left her; and she spoke of Estella in the very same way, if not in the very same words. The interview lasted but a few minutes, and she gave me a guinea when I was going, and told me to come again on my next birthday. I may mention at once that this became an annual custom. I tried to decline taking the guinea on the first occasion, but with no better effect than causing her to ask me, very angrily, if I expected more? Then, and after that, I took it.

So unchanging was the dull old house, the yellow light in the darkened room, the faded spectre in the chair by the dressing-table glass, that I felt as if the stopping of the clocks had stopped Time in that mysterious place, and, while I and every thing else outside it grew older, it stood still. Daylight never entered the house as to my thoughts and remembrances of it, any more than as to the actual fact. I bewildered me, and under its influence I continued at heart to hate my trade and to be ashamed of home.

Imperceptibly I became conscious of a change in Biddy, however. Her shoes came up at the heel, her hair grew bright and neat, her hands were always clean. She was not beautiful—she was common, and could not be like Estella—but she was pleasant and wholesome and sweet-tempered. She had not been with us more than a year (I remember her being newly out of mourning at the time it struck me), when I observed to myself one evening that she had unobtrusively thoughtful and attentive eyes; eyes that were very pretty and very good.

It came of my lifting up my own eyes from a task I was poring at—writing some passages from a book, to improve myself in two ways at once by a sort of stratagem—and seeing Biddy observant of what I was about. I laid down my pen, and Biddy stopped in her needle-work without laying it down.



"HULLOA!" HE GROWLED; "WHERE ARE YOU TWO GOING?"

"Biddy," said I, "how do you manage it? Either I am very stupid or you are very clever."

"What is it that I manage? I don't know," returned Biddy, smiling.

She managed our whole domestic life, and wonderfully too; but I did not mean that, though that made what I did mean more surprising.

"How do you manage, Biddy," said I, "to learn every thing that I learn, and always to keep up with me?" I was beginning to be rather vain of my knowledge, for I spent my birthday guineas on it, and set aside the greater part of my pocket-money for similar investment; though I have no doubt now that the little I knew was extremely dear at the price.

"I might as well ask you," said Biddy, "how you manage?"

"No; because when I come in from the forge of a night, my one can see me coming to set it. But you never turn to at it, Biddy."

"I suppose I must catch it—like a cough," said Biddy, quietly, and went on with her sewing.

Pursuing my idea as I leaned back in my wooden chair and looked at Biddy sewing away with her head on one side, I began to think her rather an extraordinary girl. For I called to mind now that she was equally accomplished in the terms of our trade, and the nature of our different sorts of work, and all our various tools. In short, whatever I knew, Biddy knew. Theoretically, she was already as good a blacksmith as I, or better.

"You are one of those, Biddy," said I, "who make the most of every chance. You never had a chance that I know of, come here, and see how improved you are!"

Biddy looked at me for an instant, and went on with her sewing. "I am sure you are teacher enough; wasn't I?" said she, as she sewed.

"Biddy!" I exclaimed, in amazement. "Why, you are crying!"

"No, I am not," said Biddy, looking up and laughing. "What put that in your head?"

What could have put it in my head but the glistening of a tear as it dropped on her work? I sat silent, recalling what a drudge she had been until Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt successfully overcame that bad habit of living. So ugly did she able to be got rid of by some people. I recalled the hopeless circumstances by which she had been surrounded in the miserable little shop and the miserable little noisy evening-school, with that miserable old bandie of incompetence always to be dragged and shouldered. I recollected that even in those untoward times there must have been latent in Biddy what was now developed or developing; for in my first uneasiness and discontent I had turned to her, as a matter of course, to help me. Biddy sat quietly sewing, shedding no more tears, and while I looked at her, and thought about it all, it occurred to me that perhaps I had not been sufficiently grateful to Biddy. I might have been too reserved, and should have understood her quick mind (though I did not use that precise word in my meditations) with my confidence.

"Yes, Biddy," I observed, when I had done turning it over, "you were my first teacher, and that at a time when we little thought of ever being together like this, in this kitchen."

"Ah, a pity to say that," replied Biddy; and it was like her self-forgetfulness to transfer the remark to my sister, and to get up and be busy about her, making her more comfortable; "that's sadly true!"

"Well!" said I, "we must talk together a little more, as we used to do. I am not fit for you, suit you a little more, as I need to do. Let us have a quiet walk on the marshes next Sunday, Biddy, and we can chat."

My sister was never left alone now; but Joe more than readily undertook the care of her on that Sunday afternoon, and Biddy and I went out together. It was summer time and lovely weather. When we had passed the village and the church and the church-yard, and were out on the marshes and began to see the sails of the ships as they sailed on, I began to combine Miss Havisham and Estella with the prospect, in my usual way. When we came to the river-side and sat down on the bank, with the water rippling at our feet, making it all more quiet than it would have been without that sound, I resolved that it was a good time and place for the admission of Biddy into my inner confidence.

"Biddy," said I, after binding her to secrecy, "I want to be a gentleman."

"Oh, I wouldn't, if I was you!" she returned. "I don't think it would answer."

"Biddy," said I, with some severity, "I have particular reasons for wanting to be a gentleman."

"You know best, Pip; but don't you think you are happier as you are?"

"Biddy," I exclaimed, impatiently, "I am not at all sure that I am. I am disgusted with my calling and with my life. I have never taken to either since I was bound. Don't be absurd!"

"Was I absurd?" said Biddy, quietly raising her eyebrows; "I am sorry for that; I didn't mean to be. Only want you to do well, and to be comfortable."

"Well, then, understand once for all that I never shall or can be comfortable—or any thing but miserable—there, Biddy, unless I make myself in a very different sort of life from the life I lead now."

"That's a pity!" said Biddy, shaking her head with a sorrowful air.

Now, I too had so often thought it a pity, that, in the singular kind of quarrel with myself which I was always carrying on, I was half-inclined to shed tears of vexation and duress when Biddy gave utterance to her sentiment and my own. I told her she was right, and I knew it was much to be regretted, but still it was not to be helped.

"If I could have settled down:" I said to Biddy, plucking up the short grass within reach, much as I had once upon a time pulled my feet-tops out of my hair and kicked them into the brewery wall: "if I could have settled down and been but half as fond of the forge as I was when I was little, I know it would have been much better for me. You and I and Joe would have wanted nothing then, and Joe and I would perhaps have had partnership business out of my time, and I might even have grown up to keep company with you, and we might have sat on this very bank on Sunday, quite different people. I should have been good enough for you; shouldn't I, Biddy?"

Biddy sighed as she looked at the ships sailing on, and returned for answer, "Yes; I am not over particular." It scarcely sounded flattering, but I knew she meant well.

"Instead of that," said I, plucking up more grass and chewing a blade or two, "see how I am going on. Dissatisfied, and uncomfortable, and—I was going to say, a bad boy, but that's coarse and common, if nobody had told me so!"

Biddy turned her face suddenly toward mine, and looked for more than usually at me than she had looked at the sailing ships.

"It was neither a very true nor a very polite thing to say," she remarked, considering her eyes to the ships again. "Who said it?"

I was disconcerted, for I had broken away without quite seeing where I was going to. I was not to be shuffled off now, however, and I answered, "The beautiful young lady at Miss Havisham's, and she said it to me, and to others, over and over, and I admire her dreadfully, and I want to be a gentleman on her account." Having made which lunatic confession I began to throw my pebbles into the river, as if I had some thoughts of following it.

"Do you want to be a gentleman to spite her or to gain her over?" Biddy quietly asked me, after a pause.

"I don't know," I moodily answered.

"Because, if it is to spite her, Biddy pursued, "I should think—but you know best—that might be better and more independently done by saving money and working hard. And it is to gain her over, I should think—but you know best—she was not worth gaining over."

Exactly what I myself had thought many times. Exactly what I should have thought to me at the moment. But how could I, a poor dazed village lad, avoid that wonderful inconsistency into which the best and wisest of men fall every day?

"It may be all quite true," said I to Biddy, "but I admire her dreadfully, for all that."

In short, I turned over on my face when I came to that, and got a good grasp on the hair on each side of my head, and wrenched it well. All the while knowing the madness of my heart to be so very mad and misplaced, that I was quite conscious it would have served my face right if I had pitched it into the river. And I knocked it against the pebbles as a punishment for belonging to such an idiot.

Biddy was a good deal my senior, and she tried to reason no more with me. She put her hand, which was a comfortable hand though roughened by work, upon my two hands as they clenched her, and gently took them out of my hair. Then she softly patted my shoulder in a soothing way, while with my face turned away I became a little—exactly as I had done in the brewery yard—and felt vaguely convinced that I was very much ill-used by somebody, or by every body; I can't remember which.

"I am glad of one thing," said Biddy, "and that is, that you have felt you could give me your confidence, Pip, and that I am not of another thing, and that is, that of course you know you may depend upon my keeping it and always so far deserving it. Now, dear, dear, you don't get such a poor one, and so much in need of being taught herself!) had been your teacher at the present time, she would have been much tested. she would set. But it would be a hard one to learn, and you have got beyond her, and it's of no use now." So, with a quiet sigh for me, Biddy rose from the bank, and, with a fresh and pleasant change of voice, "Shall we walk a little further, or go home?"

"Biddy," I said, throwing up, putting my arm round her neck, and giving her a kiss, "I shall always tell you every thing."

"I'll just wish you joy," said Biddy.

"You know I never shall be, so that's always. Not that I have any occasion to tell you any thing, for you can see into every I know—as I told you at home the other night."

"Ah!" said Biddy, quite in a whisper, as she looked away at the ships. And then repeated, with her former cheerful change: "Shall we walk a little further, or go home?"

I said to Biddy we would walk a little further, and we did so, and the summer afternoon tended down into the summer evening, and it was very beautiful. I began to consider whether I was not more mannerly and wholesome company, after all, in these circumstances, than playing beggar my neighbor by candlelight in the room with the stopped clocks, and the shrouded by Estella. I thought it would be very good for me if I could get her out of my head, with all the rest of those remembrances and fancies, and could go to my forge cheerfully to relish what I had to do, and stick to it, and make the best of it. I asked myself the question whether I did not sorely know that if Estella were beside me at that moment instead of Biddy she would make me miserable? I was obliged to admit that I did know it for a certainty, and I said to myself, "Pip, what a fool you are!"

We talked a good deal as we walked, and all that Biddy said seemed right. Biddy was never insulting or capricious, or Biddy to-day and somebody else to-morrow; she would have desired only pain, and not pleasure, from giving me pain; she would far rather have wounded her own breast than mine. How could it be, then, that I did not like her much the better of the two?

"Biddy," said I, when we were walking homeward, "I wish you could put me right."

"I wish I could," said Biddy.

"If I could only get myself to fall in love with you—you don't mind my speaking so openly to such an old acquaintance?"

"Oh dear, not at all!" said Biddy. "Don't mind me."

"If I could only get myself to do it, that would be the thing for me."

"But you never will, you see," said Biddy.

It did not seem quite so unlikely to me that evening as it would have done if we had discussed it a few hours before. I therefore observed I was not quite sure of that. But Biddy said she was sure of it decisively. In my heart I believed her to be right; and yet I took it rather ill, too, that she should be so positive upon the point.

When we came near the church-yard we had to cross an embankment, and get over a stile near a sluice-gate. We came through the gate, or from the rushes, or from the ooze (which was quite in his stagnant way), old Orlick.

"Hollo!" he growled; "where are you two going?"

"Where should we be going, but home?"

"Well, then," said he, "I'm jiggered if I don't see you home!"

This penalty of being jiggered was a favorite suppositious case of his. It attached no definite meaning to the word that I am aware of, but used it, like his open pretended Christian name, to affront mankind, and convey an idea of something opprobrious. When I was younger, I had had a general belief that if he had jiggered me personally he would have done it with a hammer, or a red-hot hook.

Biddy was much against his going with us, and said to me in a whisper, "Don't let him come; I don't like him." As if I did not like him either, I took the liberty of saying that we thanked him, but we didn't want seeing home. He received the offer of our company with a yell of laughter, and dropped back, as came slouching after us at a little distance.

Curious to know whether Biddy suspected him of having had any hand in that murderous attack of which my sister had never been able to give any account, I asked her why she did not like him?

"Oh!" she replied, glancing over her shoulder as he slouched after us, "because I—I am afraid he likes me."

"Did he ever tell you he liked you?" I asked, indignantly.

"No," said Biddy, glancing over her shoulder again, "he never told me so; but he dances at me whenever he can catch my eye."

However novel and peculiar this testimony of attachment, I did not doubt the accuracy of the interpretation. I was very hot indeed upon old Orlick's daring to admire her: as hot as if I were an accepted lover of her own.

"But it makes no difference to you, you know," said Biddy, calmly.

"No, Biddy, it makes no difference to me: I only I don't like it; I don't approve of it."

"Nor I either," said Biddy. "Though that makes no difference to me."

"Exactly," said I; "but I must tell you I should have no opinion of you, Biddy, if he danced at you with your own consent."

I kept an eye upon him that night, and, whenever circumstances were favorable to his dancing at Biddy, got before him to observe that demonstration. But he struck root in Joe's establishment by reason of my sister's sudden fancy for him, or I should have tried to get him discharged. He said I never thanked and reciprocated my good intentions, as I had reason to know thereafter.

And now, as many my mind was not confused enough before, I complicated its confusion fifty thousand-fold, by having states and seasons when I was clear that Biddy was immeasurably better than Estella, and times when Estella's working life to which I was born had nothing in it to be ashamed of, but offered me sufficient reasons of self-respect and happiness. At those times I would decide conclusively that my dissatisfaction to dear old Joe and the forge was gone, and that I was growing up as a fit way to be partners with Joe and to keep company with Biddy, when all in a moment some confounding remembrance of the Havisham days would fall upon me like a destructive missile and scatter my wits again. Scattered wits take a long time picking up; and often, before I had got them well together again, they would be dispersed in all directions by one stray thought, that perhaps after all Miss Havisham was going to make my fortune when my time was out.

If my time had run out, it would have left me still at the height of my perplexities, I dare say. It never did run out, however, but was brought to a premature end, as I proceed to relate.

FORTRESS MONROE, VIRGINIA.

WE publish on page 68 a view of the sea battery at Fortress Monroe, Virginia. This fort, which is one of the strongest in the United States, constitutes the north point of the entrance of James River. It is one mile from Fort Calhoun, on the Rip Raps; the two works command the entrance to the River. In summer, the spot, which is known as Old Point Comfort, is a favorite resort for bathers. A few weeks ago considerable apprehension was felt for the safety of Fort Monroe; it is now understood that it is garrisoned by some 800 men, and that ample measures have been taken for its protection in case of serious trouble or popular outbreak.

Speaking of this fortress, a Virginian authority says:

"It is very large. The walls are more than a mile in circuit, very thick and high, surrounded by a moat, which is from sixty to one hundred feet wide, with eight feet of water, drawbridges, and outer batteries. It mounts some three hundred heavy guns, has quarters for three thousand men, and is capable of containing twice the number. Its walls are built of the finest granite, and are of such a height that the tops of the largest vessels, as they sail past, are on a level with the parapets. The ramparts are covered with grass, and command a fine view of the surrounding country. The fortress is a magnificent place. The walls inclose some seventy-five acres. In the centre is the parade-ground, and all around are the quarters for the troops. Live oak and other trees make it very pleasant in summer. Outside the moat is a fine walk, with a view of the sea."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Saturday, January 19, in the Senate a number of petitions, memorials, &c., in favor of the preservation of the Crittenden adjustment, were presented. The Senate was engaged upon the bill to admit Kansas into the Union, but final action was staved off through the efforts of Senator Green, of Missouri. The House resumed the Army Appropriation Bill and the Civil Service War Debt Bill. The first involves an appropriation to the amount of ten million dollars, and the latter four million.

On Monday, 21st, in the Senate, Senator Hunter, of Virginia, after reporting from the Committee on Indian Affairs the Indian Appropriation Bill, was excused from further service on the Committee, Senator Chandler has been Chairman for fifteen years. Several petitions for the passage of the Crittenden Compromise were presented. Senator Slidell, of Louisiana, called up the President's Message, in answer to his inquiries relative to the appointment of Mr. Holt as Secretary of War, and offered a resolution censuring the President for same, which was laid over. Senators Yulee of Florida, Clay of Alabama, and Davis of Mississippi successively announced the secession of those States from the Union, and their consequent withdrawal from the Senate. The bill for the admission of Kansas was taken up, and it was finally passed: yeas 33, nays 7. The Senate until the afternoon session.—In the House, Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, asked leave to present a memorial from Methodist ministers of that State, asking for protection from religious persecution: laid on the table. Letters from the Adjutant and Paymaster Generals, recommended their withdrawal. A bill was introduced by Mr. Colfax, of Indiana, and was referred to the Judiciary Committee, which provides for the suspension of all the postal laws in those States which have passed ordinances of secession, on the ground that the Federal laws can not be enforced. Mr. Quigley of Pennsylvania introduced a resolution directing the Committee of Thirty-three to take the necessary measures to carry into effect the Crittenden compromise. The Judiciary Committee was instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by legislation for the use so as to prevent the transportation of men and arms into a seceding State. Mr. Vandever, of Iowa, asked leave to offer resolutions declaring secession a crime, and that the Government do not interfere with Slavery in the States, and that any amendment of the Constitution is unnecessary. The Democratic members expressed a desire to vote on the resolutions immediately; but they were willing to wait a week for the report of the Committee of Thirty-three, which Mr. Corwin, of Ohio, Chairman, accompanied with a speech. He was followed by Mr. Millson, of Virginia, as the conclusion of whose remarks the House adjourned.

On Tuesday, 22d, in the Senate, on a motion to fix the vacancies in the Committee of Thirteen, Mr. Clay, of Alabama, from seceding States, the question of the exact relation between these members and the body from which they refuse to have withdrawn, arose. The question was not decided, consideration of the matter being postponed, and several others waived. The Kansas resolutions were then taken up, and debated until the adjournment.—In the House, Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, presented memorials from 17,000 citizens of that State, in favor of the passage of the resolutions adopted by the Border State Committee. He also gave notice that he should move these resolutions as an amendment to the propositions reported from the Committee of Thirty-three. Mr. Corwin reported from the Post-office Committee a bill for the stoppage of postal facilities in the seceding States. Mr. Brown, of North Carolina, reported a substitute, which Mr. Colfax declined to accept. Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, also reported a substitute, and further consideration of the bill was postponed, to make way for the report of the Committee of Thirty-three, and Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, and Mr. Burnett, of Virginia, addressed the House. The latter took very strong ground against disunion. Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, also made a speech, advocating his minority report.

On Wednesday, 23d, in the Senate, after the presentation of a number of memorials, principally in favor of the Crittenden Compromise, Senator Slidell, of Louisiana, made a motion, which was agreed to, that his resolution censuring the President for signalizing Mr. Holt as Secretary of War without consultation with the Senate, be referred to the Judiciary Committee. Senator Toombs, of Georgia, was excused from further service on the Committee on Claims. After considerable discussion, the Tariff Bill was taken up, and referred to a Special Committee of Five to be reported back to the Senate on 30th inst. A motion to take up the Kansas and Crittenden resolutions was then defeated, 27 to 24, and the Pacific Railroad Bill was considered in the adjourned session.—In the House, the Pacific Railroad Bill of last session, which then passed the House and was returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken up, and nearly all the amendments agreed to. A new one, offered by Mr. Kellogg, of Illinois, to make a specific, to which he consulted finance on the part of the Republicans. Mr. Montgomery, of Pennsylvania, offered a bill to prohibit that all the members of the present House should resign, in order that the Senate could be organized before the 4th of March, so that the exact sense of the people could be ascertained. No action was taken on the proposition, though several members showed a disposition to agree to it.

On Thursday, 24th, in the Senate, the Red River Raft bill was passed. A bill to admit Oregon was also passed by the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, providing for the removal of the raft, and the collection of tolls to defray the expenses. The Kansas bill was then taken up, after some objections from Senator Crittenden, who desired that his resolutions should be discussed. In the course of his remarks he took occasion to deny that he had entered caucus in secret sessions a few days since, as reported. What he did say was that he believed there had been a caucus of Senators, and that there might be cases in which it would be proper to use that term. The debate on the Pacific Railroad bill was interrupted by a motion to go into Executive session.—In the House consideration of the Post-route bill was resumed. An amendment was offered by Mr. Hamilton, of Texas, and accepted, to extend the existing contracts for Texas so as to connect with the Butterfield route. The morning hour having expired, the report of the Committee of Thirty-three came up, and was discussed by Messrs. Rust and Hindman of Arkansas, Dunn of Indiana, Gooch of Massachusetts, Farry of Connecticut, and others. During the debate a personal misunderstanding arose between Messrs. Rust and Dunn, which only just failed to a battle on lution, though it is hoped that this may be averted through the intervention of mutual friends, notwithstanding the fact that a challenge has passed from Mr. Tost to Mr. Dunn.

THE SECESSION OF GEORGIA.

On Saturday evening, 19th, the Georgia State Convention adopted the following secession ordinance by yeas 208, nays 89:

"An ordinance to dissolve the union between the State of Georgia and other States united with her under the compact of government entitled the Constitution of the United States.

"We, the people of the State of Georgia, in Convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the ordinances adopted by the people of the State of Georgia, in Convention, on the 25th day of the Constitution of the United States was assented to, ratified, and adopted, and also all acts and parts of acts of the General Assembly ratifying and adopting amendments to the said constitution, are hereby repealed, rescinded, and annulled.

"And we do further declare and ordain that the union now subsisting between the State of Georgia and other States, under the name of the United States, is hereby dissolved, and that the State of Georgia is in full possession and exercise of all those rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent State."

A motion to postpone the effect of the ordinance to 3d March was lost by 20 majority. Hon. Alex Stephens, Judge Johnson, and others—co-operationists—signed the ordinance after it passed. Resolutions of co-operation were adopted continuing the United States laws in force, maintaining the Postmaster, Collector, and other officials, and providing for the execution of sentences by the Federal Courts.

SECESSION OF LOUISIANA.

The State Convention assembled at Baton Rouge on Wednesday, January 23d, and organized after prayer. A Committee was appointed to draft an Ordinance of Secession. On 24th the committee, of fifteen, by their Chairman, John Perkins, Jun., reported an Ordinance dissolving the union between Louisiana and the United States; also a resolution recognizing the right of the free navigation of the Mississippi River to all friendly States bordering thereon, the ingress and egress of the mouth of the river by the same as heretofore enjoyed by those States, with a willingness to stipulate guarantees for the exercise of these rights.

A resolution sustaining the Governor in taking possession of the fortifications, arms, munitions, and eighteen to five. It was considered a test vote on secession.

ALABAMA PROVIDING AGAINST INVASION.

The Alabama House passed, on 19th, a bill to provide against the invasion of the State by the Black Republicans liable to fine and imprisonment who bring foreign vessels into the harbor of Mobile, and authorizing the commander of Fort Morgan to destroy the beacon and landmarks at his discretion. A resolution was also passed to make a contrast for the construction of a telegraph line to Point Clear, in order to effect a more rapid communication with Fort Morgan.

THE COUNTRY TO BE PLACED ON A WAR FOOTING.

Bills are being prepared by the Military and Naval Committees of the House, and by the Committee of Ways and Means, for immediately placing the country on a war footing. The President will be authorized to call for the enlistment of volunteers, and a considerable number of war steamers will be forthwith added to the navy-roll. The recent demonstrations in Southern ports show that we are defenceless in our naval force, and especially in our naval fight-draft vessels. Hence the recent necessity of employing an unarmed vessel—such, like the Star of the West, to go upon a warlike errand.

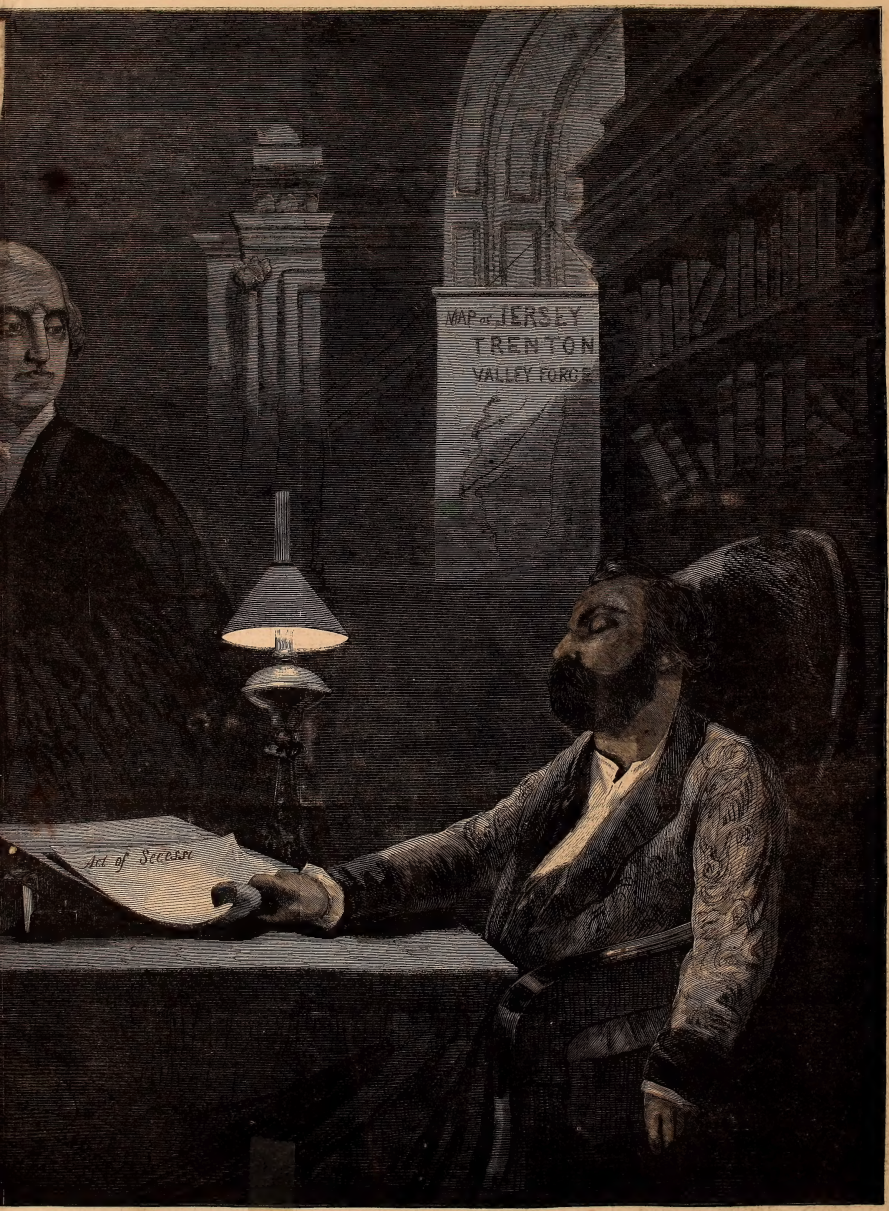
THE INAUGURATION BALL.

The Herald Washington correspondent writes: "Preparations are progressing for a grand Union Inauguration Ball, to come off in this city on the night of the 4th of March. It is designed to be in no sense a partisan affair, but one in which Union men of all sections and parties may join. Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott will head the list of Managers, assisted by the veteran Commodore Stewart. General Wool, and other prominent officers of the Army and Navy, Messrs. Crittenden, Seward, Douglas, and other Senators, and distinguished men of each of State of the Thirty-four, are expected to participate in the management. A special building will be erected expressly for the purposes of the ball upon Judiciary Square, adjoining the City Hall. It is designed to make the building five edifice such; and, for the greater convenience of the public, they will be on sale in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Memphis, New Orleans, and various other large cities. The Managers, representatives from all of which will probably be present. No effort will be spared to make the occasion a brilliant success in all respects."

THE EX-MEMBERS OF THE CABINET CHARGED WITH TREASON.

F. C. Treadwell, a lawyer of New York, on Saturday handed Chief Justice Taney an affidavit, in which he charges Governor Floyd, Howell Cobb, John B. Floyd, Jacob Thompson, Jeff. Davis, General Lane, of Oregon, and all the Secessionists delegates, except Mr. Toombs, with the greater part of the other Southern delegations in Congress, except Mr. Bodligny, by name, with treasonable misprision of treason, and prays that Winfield Scott, James Buchanan, Abraham Lincoln, and distinguished members of each of the State of the Thirty-four, be

THE DREAM OF A SECESSIONIST.—



VASHINGTON AND VALLEY FORGE.

THE GRAY WOMAN.

STRANGE to say, this roused me to instant vividness of thought. Till this moment I had almost forgotten Amante; now I planned with feverish rapidity how I could give her a warning not to return; or rather, I should say, I tried to plan, for all my projects were utterly futile, as I might have seen from the first. I could only hope she would hear the voices of those who were now busy in trying to kindle a light, swearing awful oaths at the miniad articles which would have enabled them to strike fire. I heard her step outside coming nearer and nearer; I saw from my hiding-place the line of light beneath the door more and more distinctly; close to it her footstep paused; the men inside—at the time I thought they had been only two, but I found out afterward there were three—paused in their endeavors, and were quite still—as breathless as myself, I suppose. Then she slowly pushed the door open with gentle motion, to save her flickering candle from being again extinguished. For a moment all was still. Then I heard my husband say, as he advanced toward her (he wore riding-boots, the shape of which I knew well, as I could see them in the light),

"Amante, now I ask what brings you here into my private room?"

He stood between her and the dead body of a man, from which ghastly head I had taken away as it almost touched me, so close were we all together. I could not tell whether she saw it or not: I could give her no warning, and make any dumb utterance of signs to bid her what to say—if, indeed, I knew myself what would be best for her to say.

Her voice was quite changed when she spoke; quite hoarse, and very low; yet it was steady enough as she said, what was the truth, that she had come to look for a letter which she believed had arrived for me from Germany, and, of course, to Amante. Not a word about me. M. de la Tourelle answered with a grim blasphemy and a fearful threat. He would have her know, from the plain promises; Madame should have her letters, if there were any, when he chose to give them to her, if, indeed, he thought it well to give them to her at all. As for Amante, this was her first warning, but it was also her last; and taking the candle out of her hand, he turned her out of the room, his companions discreetly making a screen, so as to throw the corpse into deep shadow. I heard the key turn in the door after her—I had ever had my thought of escape it was gone now. I only hoped that whatever was to befall me might soon be over, for the tension of nerve was growing more than I could bear. The instant she could be supposed to be out of hearing two voices began speaking in the most angry terms to my husband, upbraiding him for not having told them of the form of their speech was as if they were speaking to equals, yet in their tone there was something of fear. I am sure my husband had their superior, or captain, or somewhat. He replied to them almost as if he were scoffing at them, saying it was such an expenditure of labor having to do with fools; that, ten to one, the woman was only telling the simple truth, and that she was frightened enough by discovering her master in his room to be thankful to escape and return to her mistress, to whom he could easily explain on the morrow how he happened to return in the dead of night. But his companion fell to attacking me, and said that since M. de la Tourelle had been married he was fit for nothing but to dress himself fine and scent himself with perfume; that, as a man, he could have got him twenty girls prettier, and with far more spirit in them. He quietly answered that I suited him, and that was enough. All this time they were doing something—I could not see what —to the corpse; sometimes they were too busy raising the dead body, I believe, to talk; again they let it fall with a heavy, resistless thud, and took to quarreling. They taunted my husband with angry vehemence, enraged at his scoffing and scornful replies, his mocking laughter. Then, holding up his poor dead victim, the better to strip him of whatever he wore that was valuable, I heard my husband laugh as he said he would not risk exchanging repartees in the little salon of the Rupprechts at Carlsruhe. I hated and dreaded him from that moment. At length, as if as a last word of the subject, he said, with cool determination in his voice,

"Now, my good friends, what is the use of all this talking, when you know in your hearts that if I suspected my wife of knowing more than I chose of your plans she would not outlive the day? Remember Victorine. Because she merely joked about my affairs in an imprudent manner, and resented my advice to keep a prudent tongue—to see what she liked, but ask nothing and say nothing —she has gone a long journey—longer than to Paris."

"But this one is different to her; we knew all that Madame Victorine knew, she was such a chatterbox; but this one may find out a vast deal, and never breathe a word about it, she is so shy. Some fine day we may have the country raised, and the gens d'armes down upon us from Strasburg, and all owing to your pretty doll, with her cunning ways of coming over you."

I think this roused M. de la Tourelle a little from his contemptuous indifference, for he ground an oath through his teeth, and said, "Fool! this dagger is sharp, Henri. If my wife breathes a word, and I see such a fool as you to have stopped her mouth effectually before she can bring down gens d'armes upon us, just let that good steel find its way to my heart. Let her guess but one tittle —let her have but one slight suspicion that I am not a' grand propriétaire,' much less imagine that I am a chief of chauffeurs—and she follows Victorine on the long journey beyond Paris that very day."

"Shell outwit you yet, or I never judged women well. Those still, silent ones are the devil. Shell be off during some of your absences, having picked out some secret that will break us all on the wheel."

"Bah!" said his voice, and then in a minute he added, "I bet her go if she will. But where she goes I will follow; so don't cry before you're hurt."

By this time they had nearly stripped the body, and the conversation turned on what they should do with it. I learned that the dead man was the Sieur de Poissy, the leading gentleman from whom I had often heard of as hunting with my husband. I had never seen him; but they spoke as if he had come upon them while they were eating some Cologne merchant, torturing him after the cruel practice of the chauffeurs, by roasting the feet of their victims, in order to make them reveal any hidden circumstances connected with their wealth, of which the chauffeurs afterward made use; and this Sieur de Poissy coming down upon them, and recognizing M. de la Tourelle, they had killed him, and brought him hither after nightfall. I heard him whom I called my husband laugh the little light laugh as he spoke of the way in which the dead body had been strapped before one of the riders, in such a way that it appeared to any passer-by as if, in truth, the murderer were tenderly supporting some sick person. He repeated some mocking reply, of double meaning, which he himself had given to the man who stands in sentry. He enjoyed the play upon words, softly applauding his own wit. And all the time the poor, helpless, outstretched arms of the dead hung over to his dainty boot! Then another stooped (my heart stopped beating) and picked up a letter lying on the ground—a letter which had dropped out of Mr. de Poissy's pocket—a letter from his wife, full of tender words of endearment and pretty babblings of love. This was read aloud, with coarse, ribald comments on every sentence, each trying to outdo the previous speaker. When they came to some pretty words about a sweet Maurice, their little child, away with his mother in the country, they laughed at M. de la Tourelle, and told him that he would be hearing such woman's drivelling some day. Up to this moment I had not felt any fear, save fear for his unnatural, half-ferocious reply, made me hate him even more than I dreaded him. But now they came to the question of the murder; the jewels and watch had been apprized, the money and papers examined, and apparently there was nothing more to do but to bury the interred quietly and before daybreak. They had not dared to leave him where he had been for last people should come and recognize him, and raise the hue and cry upon them. For they had along spoke as if it was their constant endeavor to keep the immediate neighborhood of Les Rochers in the most entire freedom from suspicion, as never to give cause for visits from the gens d'armes. They disputed a little as to whether they should take the body out by the great gate through the gallery, and satisfy their hunger before the hasty interment, or afterward. I listened with eager, feverish attention to every word as something of their speeches reached my hot and troubled brain, for at the time the words they uttered seemed only to stamp themselves on my memory by my memory, so that I could hardly keep from repeating them aloud like a dull, miserable, unconscious echo; but my brain was numb to the sense of what they said, and I remember, as I remembered then, I suppose, some instinct of self-preservation stirred within me, and quickened my sense. And how I should have fainted, and wept my hands and limbs, beginning to twitch with convulsive movements, which, I feared, might betray me! I gathered that they had left the room, not knowing which proposal to wish for, but feeling that whatever was finally decided upon, my only chance of escape was when I was left alone. I decided but my husband should go to his bedroom before I had had that one chance, in which case he would most likely have perceived my absence. He said that his hands were soiled (I shuddered, for it might be with life-blood), and he would go and cleanse them; but some bitter jest turned his purpose, and he left the room, and I heard his step—left it by the gallery door—left me alone in the dark with the stiffening corpse!

Now, now was the moment, if ever; and yet I could not move. It was not my cramped and stiffened joints that crippled me; it was the sensation of that dead mass of humanity close to me—I shrieked —I almost fancy still—I heard the arm nearest to me move, lift itself up as if once more imploring, and fall in dead weight on the table from the edge —I almost fancy still—I heard in mad terror, and the sound of my own strange voice broke the spell. I never myself to the side of the table from which the corpse, with as much slow caution as if I really could have feared the clutch of that poor dead arm, powderless for evermore. I softly raised myself up, and crept, with trembling, cautious steps, the table, too dizzy to know what to do next. I nearly fainted, when a low voice spoke—when Amante, from the passage, the door, whispered, "Madame!" The faithful creature had been on the watch, had heard my scream, and having seen the three ruffians troop along the gallery and down stairs, and across the court to the offices in the other wing of the castle, she had stolen to the door of the room to listen, and had gathered from my voice gave me strength. I walked straight toward it, as one benighted on a dreary moor, suddenly perceiving the small steady light which tells of human dwellings. I found her there, and passed onward. Where I was—where that voice was—I knew not; but go to it I must, or die. The door once opened—I know not by which of us—I fell upon her neck, grasping her tight, till my hands ached with the tension of their hold. Yet she never uttered's word. Only she took me up in her vigorous arms and bore me to my own room, and laid me on my bed. I do not know more; as soon as I was placed there I left sense; I came to myself with a horrible dread lest my husband was by me, with a belief that he was in the room, in hiding, waiting to hear my first words, watching for the least sign of the terrible knowledge I possessed to murder me. I dared not breathe quicker; I measured and timed each heavy inspiration; I did not speak, nor move, nor even open my eyes, for long after I was in my full, my miserable senses. I heard some one treading softly about the room, as if with a purpose, not as if for curiosity or merely to beguile the time; some one passed in and out of the salon; and I still lay quiet, feeling as if death were inevitable, but wishing that the agony of death were over. The weariness stole over me; but just as I was sinking into the horrible feeling of nothingness, I heard Amante's voice close to me, saying,

"Drink this, Madame, and let us begone. All is ready."

I let her put her arm under my head and raise me, and pour something down my throat. All the time she kept talking in a quiet, measured voice, unlike her rough, so dry and authoritative. She told me that a suit of her clothes lay ready for me, that she herself was as much disguised as the circumstances permitted her to be, that what provisions I had left from my supper were stowed away in her pockets; and so she went on, dwelling on little details of the most commonplace description, as if intending for an instant to the fearful cause why flight was necessary. I made no inquiry as to how she knew or what she knew. I never once asked her, either then or afterward. I could not bear it. We kept our dreadful secret close. But I suppose she must have been in the adjoining corridor when I fainted.

In fact, I dared not speak even to her as if there were any thing beyond the most common event in life in our relations. I dared not leave the house of blood by stealth in the dead of night. She gave me directions—short, condensed directions, without reasons—such as you to a child; and like a child I obeyed her. She went often to the door and listened; and often, too, she went to the window and looked anxiously out. For me, I saw nothing but the room I knew so well. I took up eyes wander from her for a minute; and I heard nothing in the deep midnight silence but her soft movements, and the heavy throbbing of my own heart. At last she took my hand and led me in the dark, through the salon, once more into the terrible gallery, where across the black shadow the windows admitted pale, sheeted ghosts of light upon the floor. Clinging to her, I went, unquestioning—for she was human support—down the stairs, into the court by unspeakable terror. On we went, turning to the left instead of to the right, past my suite of sitting-rooms, where the gilding was not visible, and into that unknown wing of the castle that fronted the main road lying parallel far below. She guided me along the basement passages, to which we had now descended, by the light of a dim lamp, which she groped our way to an opening like a window, but which, instead of being glazed, was only fenced with iron bars, like which were loose, as Amante evidently knew, for she took them out with the ease of one who had performed the action often before, and then helped me to follow her out into the free open air.

We stole round the end of the building, and on turning the corner—she first—I felt her hold of me tighten for an instant, and the next step I to heard distant voices, and the blows of a spade upon the heavy soil, for the night was very warm and still.

We had not spoken a word; we did not speak now. Touch was safer and as expressive. She turned once more to the right, and I followed. I did not know the path; we stumbled again and again, and I was much bruised; so doubtless was she, but I knew not that then. At last we were on the plainer path of the high road.

I had such faith in her that I did not venture to speak, even when she paused as wondering to which hand she should turn. But now, for the first time, she spoke:

"Which way did you come when he brought you here first?"

I pointed. I could not speak.

We turned in the opposite direction; still going along the high road. Then we came on a new track up to the mountain-side, scrambling far up before we even dared to rest; far up and away again before we dared to speak. Then we looked about for some place of rest and concealment; and now we dared to speak in whispers. Amante told me that she had arranged for some communication between his bedroom and mine, and, as in a dream, I was aware that she had also locked and brought away the key of the door between the latter and the salon.

"He will have been too busy this night to think much about you—he will suppose you are asleep—I will be there to be sure—but they will only just now be discovering our loss."

I remember those last words of hers made me grasp to get more out of the dim, losing precious time in thinking either of rest or concealment; but she hardly replied to me, so busy was she in seeking out some place of refuge. At length, giving it up in despair, we proceeded onward a little way; the mountain-side sloped downward rapidly, and in the full moonlight we saw ourselves in a narrow valley, made by a stream which forced its way along it. About a mile lower down there rose the pale blue smoke of a village, a mill-wheel was lashing its way with a will at hand, though out of sight. Keeping under the cover of every sheltering tree or bush, we worked our way down past the mill, down to a one-arched bridge, which doubtless formed part of the road between the villages and the mill.

"This will do," said she; and we crept under the space, and climbing a little way up the rough stone-work, we seated ourselves on a projecting ledge, and crouched in the deep damp shadow. Amante sat a little above me, and made me lay my head on her lap. Then she fed me and took some food herself; and opening out her great dark cloak, she covered up every light-colored speck about us; and thus we sat, shivering and shuddering, yet feeling a kind of rest through it all, simply from the fact that motion was no longer imperative, and that during the daylight our only chance of safety was to be still. But the damp shadow in which we were sitting was blighting, from the circumstance of the sunlight never penetrating there; and I dreaded lest, before night and the time for exertion again came on, I should feel illness creeping all over me. To add to our discomfort it had rained the whole day long, and the stream, fed by a thousand little mountain brooks, began to swell and travel, rushing over the stones with a perpetual and dizzying noise.

Every now and then I was wakened from the painful state into which I continually fell by a sound of horses' feet over our head—a strangely lumbering heavily as if dragging a burden, sometimes rattling and galloping, and with the sharper cry of men's voices coming cutting through the roar of the waters. At length day fell. We had to drop into the stream, which came above our knees as we waded to the bank. There we stood, stiff and shivering. Even Amante's courage seemed to fail.

"We must pass this night in shelter somehow," said she. For indeed the rain was coming down pitilessly. I said nothing. I thought that surely the end must be coming on some time; and I only hoped that to death might not be added the terror of the cruelty of men. In a minute or so she had resolved on her course of action. We went up the stream to the mill. The familiar sounds, the scent of the wheat, the flour whitening the walls—all reminded me of home, and it seemed to me as if I must struggle out of this nightmare and waken, and find myself once more a happy girl by the Neckar-side. They were long in unbarring the door at which Amante had knocked, and that an old feeble voice inquired who was there, and what was sought? Amante answered shelter from the storm for two fugitives; but the old woman replied with suspicious hesitation, that she was sure it was a man who was asking for shelter, and that she could not open the door. But at last she satisfied herself, and unbarred the heavy door, and admitted us. She was not an unkindly woman, but her thoughts were fixed in one channel. She said was, that her master, the miller, had told her on no account to let any man into the place during his absence on business; that he did not know if he would not think two women as bad; and yet that, as we were not men, no one could say she had disobeyed him, for it was a shame to let a dog be out such a night as this. And then with ready tact she left Amante let no one know that we had taken shelter there that night, and that then her master could not blame her; and that she was the most discreet fellow as well as the brown mantle that had covered us both, before the great store which warmed the room with the effectual heat that the old woman's failing vitality required. All this time the poor creature was discussing with herself as to whether she had disobeyed orders, in a kind of garrulous way that made me fear much for her capability of retaining any thing secret if she was questioned. By-and-by she wandered away to an unnecessary revelation of her master's wherewithal, to pose to help in the search for his landlord, the Sieur de Poissy, who lived at the château just above, and who had not been heard of since the day before; so the intendant imagined he might have met with some accident, and had summoned the neighbors to look for him in the forest and fields. She told us much besides, giving us to understand that she would gain most with a place as housekeeper where there was no mistress and no children. As her life here was very lonely and dull, especially since her master's son had gone away—gone to the Paris. She was not sorry for supper, which was evidently apportioned out to her with a sparing hand, as, even if the ides had come into her head, she had not enough to offer us any. Fortunately warmth was the chief requisite for sleep. Thanks to Amante's cares, was returning to our chilled bodies. After supper the old woman grew drowsy, and she seemed disposed to sit all night in the act of going to sleep and leaving us still in the house. Indeed, she gave us pretty broad hints as to the propriety of our going to bed, and said we were safe and stormy night; but we begged to be allowed to stay under shelter of some kind, and at last a bright idea came into my head, and she was rummaging by a ladder to a kind of loft, which went half over the lofty mill-kitchen on which we had entered from the yard. She did—and found ourselves in a spacious floor, without any safeguard or wall, boarding, or railing, to keep us from falling over into the kitchen in case we went too near the edge. It was, in fact, the store-room or garret for the household. There was bedding piled up, boxes and chests, mill sacks, the winter store of apples and nuts, baskets of old clothes, broken furniture, and many other things. No sooner were we up there than the old woman dragged the ladder by which we had ascended away with a chuckle, as if she was now secure that we could do no mischief, and sat herself down again once more to doze and await her master's return. We pulled out some bedding, and gladly laid ourselves down in our dried clothes and in warm warmth, hoping to have a sound sleep; but so much needed to refresh us and prepare us for the next day. But I could not sleep, and I was aware from her breathing that Amante was equally wakeful. We could both see through the crevices between the boards that formed the flooring into the kitchen below, very partially lighted by the common lamp that hung against the wall near the stove on the opposite side to that on which we were.

Far on in the night there were voices outside reached us in our hiding-place; an angry knocking at the door, and we saw through the chinks the old woman rouse herself up to go and open it for her master, who came in, evidently half drunk. To my sick horror he was followed by Lefebvre, apparently as sober and wily as ever. They were talking together as they came in, disputing about something; but the miller stopped the conversation to swear at the old woman for having fallen asleep, and with the very anger, and even with blows, drove the poor old creature out of the kitchen to bed. Then he and Lefebvre went on talking—about the Sieur de Poissy's disappearance. It seemed that Lefebvre had been out all day, along with other of my husband's men, ostensibly assisting in the search; in all probability trying to blind the Sieur de Poissy's followers by putting them on a wrong scent, and also, I fancied, from one or two of Lefebvre's sly questions, combining the hidden purpose of discovering us.

Although the miller was tenant and vassal to the Sieur de Poissy, he seemed to me to be much more in league with the people of M. de la Tourelle. He was evidently aware, in part, of the life which Lefebvre and the others led; although, happily, I do not suppose he knew or imagined one-half of their crimes; and also, I think, he was seriously interested in discovering the fate of his master, little suspecting Lefebvre of murder or violence. He kept talking himself, and letting out all sorts of thoughts and opinions; watched by the keen eyes of Lefebvre doubting out below his shaggy eyebrows. It was evidently not the cue of the latter to let out that his master's wife had escaped from that vile and terrible den; but though he never breathed a word relating to us, not the less was I certain he was thirsting for our blood, and lying in wait for our return of every hour. Presently he got up and took his leave; and the miller bolted him out and stumbled off to bed. Then we fell asleep and slept sound and long.

The next morning, when I awoke, I saw Amante, half raised, resting on one hand, and eagerly gazing—with straining eyes, into the kitchen above. I looked too, and both heard and saw the miller and two of his men eagerly and loudly talking about the old woman's bed not appearing to have stood to make the fire in the stove, and prepare her master's breakfast, and who now, late on in the morning, had been found dead in her bed; whether from the effect of her master's fury the night before, or from natural causes, who can tell? The miller's conscience upbraided him a little, I should say, for he was eagerly searching for its value in the landlord, and repeating how often she had spoken of the happy life she led with him. The men might have their doubts, but they did not express them to the miller, and all agreed that the necessary steps should be taken for a speedy funeral. And so they went out, leaving the house in peace, but so close, that, for the first time almost, we ventured to speak freely, though still in a hushed voice, pausing to listen cautiously; and we both took a more cheerful view of the whole occurrence than I did. She said that, had the old woman lived, we should have had to depart that morning, and that this quiet departure would have been the best thing we could have had to hope for, as, in all probability, the housekeeper would have told her master of us and of our resting-place, and this fact would, sooner or later, have been brought to the knowledge of those from whom we most desired to keep it concealed; but that now we had time to rest, and a shelter to rest in, during the first hot pursuit, which we knew to a fatal certainty was being carried on. The remnants of our food, and the dried-up fruit, would supply us with provision; the only thing to be feared was, that something might be required from the loft, and that the miller, or some one else, would go in search of it. But even then, with a little arrangement of boxes and chests, one part might be so kept in shade that we might yet escape observation. All this comforted me a little; but, I asked, how were we ever to escape? The ladder was taken away, which was our only means of descent. But Amante said that she could make a sufficient ladder of the rope lying coiled among other things, to drop us down the ten feet or so—with the advantage of its being portable, so that we might carry it away, and thus avoid all betrayal of the fact that any one had ever been hidden in the loft.

During the day, when that involved terror we did escape, Amante made good use of her time. She looked into every box and chest during the man's absence, and found among one in one box an old suit of man's clothes, which had probably belonged to the miller's absent son, she put them on to see if they would fit her; and, when she found that they did, she cut her own hair to the shortness of a man's, made me clip her black eyebrows as close as though they had been shaved, and by cutting up old cord into pieces such as would go into her cheeks, she altered both the shape of her face and her voice to a degree which I should not have believed possible.

All this time I lay like one stunned; my body resting, and renewing its strength, but I myself in an almost dreamy state, and unable to realize what had taken the stupid interest which I remember I did in all Amante's energetic preparations for disguise.

I also slept a great deal, and awoke with a smile coming over my stiff face as some new exercise of her cleverness proved a success.

But terror returned when she required me too to exert myself; and then all my heavy despair returned. I let her dye my fair hair and complexion with the decaying shells of the stored-up walnuts, I let her blacken my teeth, and even voluntarily broke a front tooth the better to effect my disguise. But through it all I had no hope of evading my terrible husband. The third night of the funeral was over, the drinking ended, the guests gone; the miller put to bed by his men, being too drunk to help himself. They stopped a little while in the kitchen, talking and laughing about the new housekeeper likely to come; and they too went off, shutting, but not locking the door. Every thing favored us: Amante had tried her ladder on one of the two previous nights, and could, by a dexterous throw from beneath, unfasten it from the hook to which it was fixed, when it had served its office; she made up a bundle of worthless old clothes in order that we might the better preserve our characters of a traveling peddler and his wife; she stuffed a lump on her back, she thickened my figure, she left her own clothes deep down beneath a heap of others in the chest from which she had taken the man's dress which she wore; and with a few francs in her pocket—the sole money we had either of us had about us when we escaped—we let ourselves down the ladder, unhooked it, and passed into the old darkness of night again.

How we wandered—not daring to ask our way—how we lived, how we struggled through many a danger and still more terrors of danger, I shall not tell you now. I will only relate two of our adventures before we reached Frankfort. The first, although fatal to my innocent baby, was yet, I believe, the cause of my safety; the second I shall tell you that you may understand why I did not return to my former home, and that I hoped to find a way in the miller's loft, and I first became capable of grasping after an idea of what my future life might be. Once, I remember, we must have been about three weeks wearily walking through unfrequented ways, day after day, not daring to make inquiry as to our whereabouts, and, as I believe, hopeless in our wanderings—we came to a kind of lonely road-side farrier's and blacksmith's. I was so tired that Amante insisted that, come what might, we would stay there all night; and accordingly she entered the house, and boldly announced herself as a traveling tinker, ready to do any odd jobs of work that might be required for a night's lodging and food for herself and wife. She had adopted this plan once or twice before, and with good success; for, in the north part of France, in Rouen, and as a girl she had often helped him with his work, and knew the tailors' slang and habits, down to the very last nicette and cut with which France could so much to those of a trade. The early November afternoon was closing into evening as we sat down on the ground to eat our scanty meal in the blacksmith's kitchen, drawn close to the window, I close behind her, sewing at another part of the same garment, and from time to time well scolded by my seeming husband. All at once she turned round to speak to me. It was only one word—"Courage!" I had no—nothing; I sat out of the light; but I turned sick for an instant, and then I braced myself up into a strange strength of endurance to go through I knew not what.

(TO BE CONCLUDED IN ONE NEXT NUMBER.)

TRIMMING THE CHURCH.

JEANIE SHERMAN, looking out of the front parlor windows of her father's country-house, through a little aperture she had rubbed in the beautiful frost-traceries of the pane, one day in December, saw the well-known figure of Fay Howard, well wrapped in furs, coming up the gravel walk.

An expression of mischievous delight passed over her pretty blonde face, and she hastened to admit him, beating the snow from his back and shoulders—she had to stand on tip-toe to reach them—with much unnecessary violence.

"Spare me, my dear!" cried Fay; "leave me a little breath, for I've got something very important to say."

"For the first time in your life, then! Come in and warm your large hands while you tell me what it is."

She pretended to assist him in removing his great-coat but hindered him very considerably, in reality, and she knew it, by little flirtations with his sleeve, adroitly transferred it to his neck, when, spite of his gymnastic contortions, it gradually and artfully caused him cold shivers of an unpleasant lengthiness.

For this trick he endeavored to punish her with a kiss. She submitted in the most lamb-like manner, apparently unaware that he had come about to meet, when she dexterously slipped away from him, and ran into the parlor laughing like Tyll Eulenspiegel.

Fay, who would have liked for once in his life to get a reasonable and sincere reception from his little tormentor, followed her, and threw himself on his face. She noticed it, and after the manner, I grieve to say, of young maidens generally, determined to punish him for it.

"You must know," said he, "that I met Sedgwick and his cousin last night, and they told me that there was to be a grand trim-ation on Wednesday evening. It will be moonlight. Sedgwick's big sleigh will be on hand, with a farm-wagon body on the bottom; lots of straw, and blankets, and shawls, and things; lots of pretty girls; lots of good fellows; lots of fun; Old Cæsar, with his fiddle; the new road to the Three-Mile Tavern; the old road back; dancing, oysters, singing, and other luxuries all the way there and back!"

"Dancing all the way?"

"No; dancing at the tavern; the other luxuries on the road."

"Oysters on the road?"

"Don't be absurd. What I want is to ask you to go with me. It will be, oh, splendid!"

"Wednesday night?"

"Yes."

"What time?"

"Start at about half-past seven or eight."

"Who is going?"

"The Sedgwicks, and Waynes, and that set. Fifteen in all, or maybe sixteen."

"Who is to drive?"

"Sedgwick's man."

"John?"

"No, Robert."

"Well, I can't go!"

"What! can't go!"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I'm engaged for Wednesday night."

"Oh no; are you?"

"I said I was."

"What engagement?"

"To go to ride, Mr. Curiosity!"

Howard bit his lip and colored a little.

"May I ask with whom?"

"With a gentleman."

"Won't he go with us?"

"I haven't inquired."

"Now this is very perfidious! and I half promised to bring you."

"Without consulting me at all? Thank you."

He arose, with a strong air of vexation.

"Well, I suppose what can't be cured must be endured, but I wish it hadn't happened so. If I can get them to postpone the straw-ride till Thursday, will you go?"

"I can not promise."

He looked unutterably into her eyes, and held out his hand rather coolly.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"Down to Sedgwick's to tell them you won't come. Good-by."

"What is the use of going so soon? You're dutifully warm yet."

"Never mind. I don't care for outside cold!"

"Now, Fay—are you angry?"

The sideways turn of her head, and the half-grieved, half-coquettish tone of her voice, were indescribably charming; but the young man's pride was a little touched, and he withstood every thing.

There was quite a little scene of petulant, mingled perhaps with fear, on the pretty blonde face, as she watched the retreating figure of her lover through the same frost-traceried window-pane whence she had observed his approach.

The fact was, she had gone a little too far, and found it out too late. She loved Fay with her whole heart; but somehow when they were together, she could not resist the temptation of tormenting him. Her engagement to go to ride with a gentleman, which she had audaciously given as a reason for declining Fay's invitation, consisted merely of an offer her brother—a lad of nineteen—had made to take her out in his sleigh 'any fine night while the moon lasted—any next Wednesday.' What she desired was to make her lover a little jealous, and her many earnest appeals on his part to tell him the truth of the case, and laugh him into good-humor.

He did not visit her again for a day or two, and when he did, preserved a most exasperating air of independence. She hoped he would say something further about the straw-ride, so that she could draw him into repeating his station; but he did not mention it until the morning of Wednesday, when he met her in the street.

"Morning, Jeanie," he said, "see what a splendid day it is! We shall have a delicious night for the ride."

"Are you going, then?"

"Going? Of course! I invited Susie Mitchell. Sorry you couldn't have gone, though."

"Susie Mitchell!"

This simple exclamation contained a volume of comments, unspoken, but easily understood. Perhaps I often wonder a well-evident statement—a truism—in saying that these comments were not of a nature calculated to endear Miss Mitchell to Jeanie, had she known of them.

Every body said that Fay Howard outdid himself on Wednesday night. He was always an excellent man for a merry-making, but on this occasion he was unusually vivacious. Nobody danced so indefatigably, nobody sang so hilariously, nobody laughed so heartily, nobody said so many funny things, and, in short, nobody seemed to enjoy the affair so thoroughly as Fay.

Meanwhile, Jeanie, terribly out of humor, held her brother's hand, and took a dreary ride of a few miles, returning cold, regretful, and almost cynical, but with an inward resolve never to strike with her lover again.

The next salutation that passed between Susie Mitchell and she was a study for a social philosopher.

Some little time afterward, when the whole matter had been explained, forgiven, and forgotten, with all the due forms and ceremonies incidental to a lover's reconciliation, Fay Howard sat in his office engaged upon a labor of love.

In his professional capacity of architect he was called on once to experiment in the trimming of the village church with evergreens—a pious task that, from time immemorial, had devolved upon the youths and maidens of Ingleton. Every Christmas some tasteful and clever hand drew plans for the decorations, while others sought quantities of evergreen logs in the woods. The church was then ransacked, and a vast chaos to make wreaths, stars, and festoons, which were finally arranged around the gallery, over the pulpit and organ, about the windows, and along the walls, presenting a most picturesque and Christmas-like coup-d'œil.

Fay's plans were nearly finished, and pleased him. He fancied, justly, that the decoration he had composed for the organ-loft, facing the pulpit, was really artistic; and he was in a condition of sublime good-nature and satisfaction with all this, therefore.

"Come in!" cried he, in answer to a gentle knock at the door.

"Come in!" shouted he; but the visitor was timid, and did not enter.

Fay arose, and, opening the door, found Miss Susie Mitchell standing hesitantly outside, doubtfully examining the little sign that announced the name and profession of the occupant in medieval letters.

"Ah, Miss Susie!" said he, cheerily. "I'm glad to see you. Come in."

The young lady entered, and accepted the best chair, which Fay politely offered her.

"I heard," she said, after a moment of silence, "that you had finished the plans for the church-trimming, and so I thought I would drop in, as I was passing, to look at them, if you would let me."

Fay, touched in a vulnerable point by this little evidence of appreciation, hastened to lay his drawings before her, and explained them with considerable enthusiasm, in which she had tact enough to join.

This young lady, by reason of long residence in New York, had claims to a higher degree of refinement and social knowledge than the maidens of Ingleton aspired to. She was greatly given to reading poetry—not always very well selected; to having special admirers in her piano—not always very well executed; to conversing on a variety of fashionable topics—not always very well understood. In short, she had set up to be the æstheticine (if I may coin a word where none either will answer) of the village. Rather pretty, with her long black ringlets, shadowy brown eyes, clear white complexion, and graceful carriage, she attracted all who met her for the first two or three times. After that her incompleteness began to appear; she exhausted her little stock of cheap accomplishments, and fell proportionately in the estimate of her companions.

Still, she was a cousin of the Sedgwicks—the wealthiest young men in Ingleton—and had enough judgment to make the best use of the little power she possessed in her. There was nothing radically wrong or unpleasant about her; and when she praised Fay's designs, especially that for the organ-loft, he was disposed to treat her with great courtesy.

Her attention being attracted by some of the young architect's water-color sketches that ornamented the walls—little landscapes, bashful, knightly combats, illustrations of his favorite authors, etc., hastily, but cleverly done—she proceeded to find in them certain evidences of great artistic talent, if not genius, and went quite into raptures over a weird, effective bit of light and shade, with a few lines from "The Lady of Shalatt" written beneath it:

> "Often through the silent nights
> A funeral, with plumes and lights,
> And music, went to Camelot."

All this by no means displeased Fay, and they became very merry and sociable together. So much so, indeed, that they did not hear another knock at the door, thrice repeated. The one outside, however, heard Fay speaking, and fancied he said "Come in!" so she entered.

Fate is always amusing herself in a manner more or less cruel to young folk, and to young lovers particularly. In this instance, it was a cruel contrivance of Fate to send Jeanie Sherman to Fay Howard's office just when Susie Mitchell was there, and they were in the most sociable time of it. They say that the blonde type is the angelic temperament; but I can tell you that Jeanie Sherman had her angelic when she saw who was Fay's visitor.

"I came, Fay," said she, with any amount of quiet vivacity in her voice, "to see your designs for the church; but if you are occupied, I'll call another time!"

Fay cast an imploring glance toward her, and, pretending not to hear the last part of the sentence, showed her the drawings with astonishing alacrity.

Miss Susie was dignified and polite to an awful degree; Jeanie was crimson of cheek and glittering of eye; poor Fay was worse embarrassed than Captain Molineux ever dreamed of being in his two "dear charmers;" and, altogether, the scene would have been inexpressibly funny to any body who might have been present save the three personages concerned.

With that tender love for each other's companionship that the young ladies must have felt they departed together, leaving the architect in some doubt as to whether he could lunch on sandwiches or hydrocyanic acid. Fortunately for my story, the former prevailed.

That night he called upon Jeanie, to reassure her of his entire devotion to her, but she had gone to pass the evening elsewhere, and he was disappointed. On the following day affairs assumed a darker complexion when before. Walking from his lodgings to the office he overtook Miss Susie, who immediately entered into conversation with him, and accompanied him as far as he was going. On the next day Jeanie, Susie, Fay, Sedgwick, and the manner with which she bade them good-morning showed that she drew the most serious inferences from these unlucky accidents.

Of course that divine and humanizing old institution, village gossips, soon got hold of the morsel thus afforded. Some said Fay was to blame, some said Jeanie, but all agreed in making the facts look twice as bad as they were. New causes of quarrel grew up through the exaggerations of Miss Catherine Grundy, and, finally, two days before Christmas, when Fay wrote a short, touching note, praying Jeanie to see him, and hear his explanations from his own lips, she sent back word that she would lovingly side by side on the decorations of the church, she returned the billet unopened.

The next day Fay packed up his trunks and departed, to the immense surprise and great sorrow of half Ingleton, for New York.

Never having been similarly situated, I can not be expected to tell how Jeanie felt when she heard of it and I do know, however, that she grew very pale and thin, and during the two months that followed his sudden exodus, and was not seen at any of the numerous festive occasions for which Ingleton is rather famous in winter. She no longer seemed to care for any thing, and moped about the house in such a sad, weary, but uncomplaining way, that her parents were much alarmed.

De facto, she felt that she had lost Fay very badly. After all, there was no positive evidence that his affections had changed from her to Miss Susie. Circumstances certainly looked questionable; but that letter might have settled all difficulties, she thought, and many and bitter were the tears she wept in repenting her severity. She firmly expected him to write again when she returned his note, but had calculated too strongly on his love, and not strongly enough on his pride, making the same error as on the occasion of the straw-ride.

But tears, and paleness, and apathy were of no avail. He had gone, and gone in anger. The gossips had their nine days of idle talk, of praise and blame, ill conceived and worse spoken. The young people sighed for their light-hearted and pleasant friend for a while, and then, intent on their own little comedies, let him pass to a sort of easy half-oblivion.

A year rolled around, and shortly before Christmas young Sedgwick received a packet from New York, which, being opened, proved to contain a wonderfully elaborate and beautiful set of designs, somewhat similar, but decidedly superior, to those that Fay Howard had executed the year before. A brief note accompanied them:

"DEAR SEDGWICK,—I have amused myself, in spare moments, by designing the Xmas decorations for your church, which I inclose to you. Ask our friends to accept them in the name of FAY HOWARD."

There was no address given, no clew by which a communication could have been made to reach him; and when Jennie Sherman read the note she felt how completely she and Fay were separated, and shed more tears, and wore a sadder, paler face than ever.

Through the snowy and moonlit village, with its vista of white-roofed houses, walked Fay Howard, well wrapped in his great-coat, with the red light of his cigar glimmering periodically from under his mustache.

He took his way directly to the hotel, where the landlord looked in wonderment upon him, and "wanted to know" a good deal more than Fay told him.

"What is that light in the church windows?" asked the young man, as soon as he had arranged his external toilet a little.

"They're trimming it, Sir, with Christmas-green."

"Ah, I thought so. Give me the key to my room. I'll be back late, perhaps."

He took the key, and recrossed the common to the little church, pausing a moment to glance over the ancient churchyard, beneath whose snow-capped gravestones slept the Ingleton dead of nearly two centuries. Then he ascended the steps, noiselessly entered the vestibule, and stood with his hand upon the latch of the baize-covered door.

A demon of unrest had haunted him ceaselessly ever since the cold Christmas weather had set in. It had seemed to him that he must see Jennie once more at that blessed season, or die before the New Year was born. Pursued by this idea, and a mysterious prescience of coming joy, he had hastened back to Ingleton. Here he was at the church door, and he knew that she must be inside. He entered, trembling.

There was much joy among the young folk, and many were the greetings he received—many and warm. Last of all came Jennie Sherman, worn and weary-looking, but no longer pale. The riotous blood, knowing that neither voice nor eye could find strength to welcome him, rushed up into her cheeks and dyed them crimson, as a signal of the great joy she could not otherwise express. Their words were few, and merely kind, without reference to the past or the future. Each marked the changes sorrow had wrought in the other, but neither mentioned them, and after a brief space, when all the commonplaces of welcome were over, Fay went quietly to work, explaining the more intricate portions of his designs, and assisting his friends to arrange the evergreens.

The chains that are stronger than links of steel and bands of iron soon worked their simple miracle, and brought Fay and Jennie side by side. It was a little embarrassing at first, and they kept silence. At length he spoke: "Had you forgot-

THE OLD MAN AND HIS SONS

An old Man had many Sons, who were often quarreling with one another. When the father had exerted his authority, and used other means to reconcile them, but all to no purpose, he at last had recourse to this expedient: he ordered his Sons to be called before him, and a short bundle of sticks to be brought; then commanded them each to try if, with all his might and strength, he could break it. They all tried, but to no purpose; for the sticks being closely and compactly bound up together, it was impossible for the force of man to do it.

After this, the father ordered the bundle to be untied, and gave a single stick to each of his Sons, at the same time bidding him try to break it; which when each did with all imaginable ease, the father addressed them to this effect: "O, my Sons, behold the power of unity: for if you, in like manner, would but keep yourselves strictly conjoined in the bonds of friendship, it would not be in the power of any mortal to hurt you; but when once the ties of brotherly affection are dissolved, how soon you become exposed to every injurious hand that assaults you!"

ten me, Jeanie?"—really a very absurd question, and quite malapropos.

"No, indeed!"

"I thought you would"—really a very untrue statement.

"Did you? Oh, Fay!"

"I thought you wished to."

"And you hated me?"

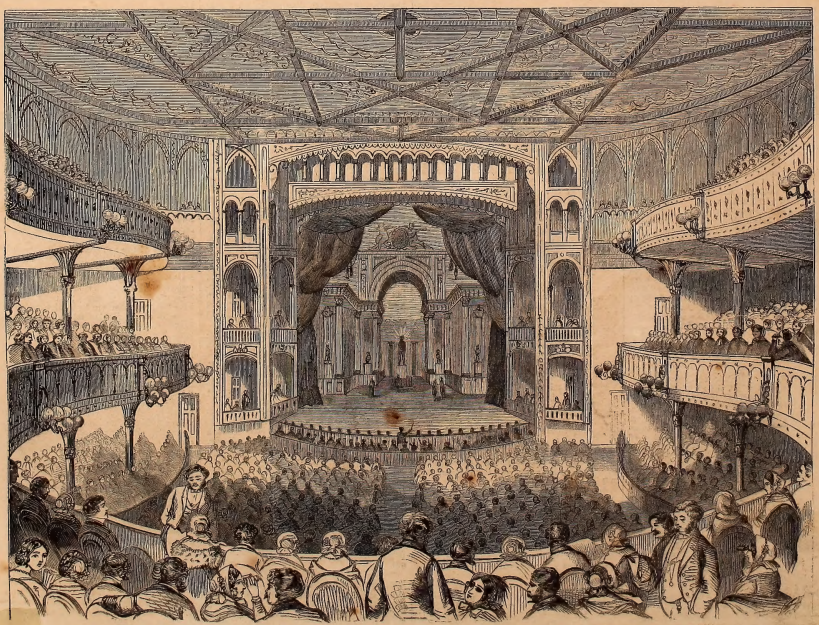
"No, Jeanie, just the opposite—always!"

"And you could forgive me?"

"I hardly know which should forgive the other, Jeanie; but here, in this place, where we have so often listened together to the words of peace, is it not well for us to make our peace?"

She gave him her hand, quickly and silently, as they bent over their evergreens, and the spirit of the olden time came back to them, hallowed, chastened, and made earnest by the grief through which they had passed.

On Christmas morning all the good people of



THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—INTERIOR. OPENING CONCERT ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1861.—[SEE PAGE 78.]

Ingleton were loud in their praises of the manner in which the church was trimmed. Nothing, it seemed to them, could be more beautiful than the decorations, so artistically planned, so deftly arranged.

But there was something more beautiful. It was a group of young girls—fresh, rosy, and clad in spotless white—attended by intelligent and courtly companions. In the midst of these were Fay Howard and Jeanie Sherman, arrayed in the garb of hymeneal festivity. They entered at the close of the service, and, taking their places before the venerable pastor, were the joined in that bond which makes two hearts one—the highest, holiest, of all human sacraments.

"Love," saith the Apostle, "is the fulfilling of the law."

HON. D. F. JAMIESON.

THE Hon. D. F. JAMIESON, of whom we this week present our readers a faithful portraiture, was born some fifty-two years ago in Orangeburg District, South Carolina. His ancestors, a few generations back, were Scotch and German. Some of them acquired a local distinction as partisan leaders in the Revolution. Mr. Jamieson inherited from his parents a handsome property, enough for independence. He is a graduate of South Carolina College. Shortly after leaving college he was admitted to the bar, but soon retired from practice. He was then elected to the State Legislature, and continued to be returned to his seat, year after year. For many years held the commission of Brigadier-General in the State Service, and had command of a splendid brigade of cavalry, in which branch of the military service he took delight.

In literature Mr. Jamieson has an honestly earned though necessarily limited reputation. In their time he was a frequent contributor to the Southern Quarterly, to the Southern and Western, and to Russell's Magazine. To the second-named magazine he contributed a series of papers setting forth the Scripture argument in defense of slavery. For the past three years his attention has been engaged upon a work entitled "A History of the Life and Times of Bertrand de Guesclin," the well-known hero of France, and, in his day, the best representative of its chivalry.

In 1860 Mr. Jamieson removed from Orangeburg to Barnwell District, and became the next-door neighbor of the distinguished Southern poet, historian, and novelist, W. Gilmore Simms. On the 6th day of December last the people of Barnwell elected him to be their representative in the Sovereign Convention of South Carolina. That Mr. Jamieson was chosen President of that memorable body, and now holds the position of Secretary of War to the Palmetto Republic, are facts so well known that we need not dwell upon them here.

Mr., or, as he is more commonly called, General Jamieson, is a cotton planter, and has a fine estate of two thousand acres, worked by some seventy negroes. As a man he is gentle, unaffected, and earnest. He has an extensive course of reading he possesses resources which make him quite at home in all topics of literature, politics, and sociology. He has a clear, vigorous, and comprehensive mind; but, lacking in brilliancy, his logic seldom calls for aid to the faculties of fancy and imagination. With morals unstained by reproach, with a character guiltless of blemish, no man is more highly esteemed by all who know him than General D. F. Jamieson.

THE WASHINGTON ARTILLERY AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

WE publish on page 76, from a photograph kindly sent us from Charleston, South Carolina, a picture of the Washington Artillery of that city.

This is the largest and most efficient corps in this branch of the service among the citizen soldiers of Charleston, having a roll of 150 active members. A detachment of this corps is at present stationed at Fort Moultrie, where, in the late attack upon the steamship Star of the West, they gave strong evidence of what may be expected at their hands should Charleston be besieged. When the ordinance of secession was passed this corps was the first to offer its services to the State. Their arms are six brass field-pieces, and Minié muskets with Maynard primers.

THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

ON Tuesday 15th and Thursday 17th inst., the Brooklyn Academy of Music was formally opened by a concert and a ball, and we take this opportunity of presenting our readers with two views of it—one showing the interior, the other the exterior.

Some three years have elapsed since the project of an Academy of Music in Brooklyn began to assume reality. Several enterprising citizens of Brooklyn, dissatisfied with the want of a suitable room for concerts, canvassed their friends, and found that people were willing to subscribe money for the purpose of erecting an academy that should be worthy of the city. Prominent among these were Mr. Luther B. Wyman, S. B. Chittenden, E. Whitehouse, John J. Ryan, etc. A sum of 50,000 was at once subscribed, and this was subsequently increased to $200,000; the work was placed in the hands of experienced architects; and so, now, after many weary months of waiting and disappointment, the Brooklyn Academy is placed in the hands of its owners, complete, perfect, and free of debt.

The building is of brick, with decorations of Dorchester stone. The windows, which are Gothic, are faced with stone, with a large brick inserted into the centre of their arched stone cappings. There are seven entrances, the chief of which are through a portico whose arches and pillars combine massive strength with lightness and grace. The exterior of the building is said to be finer than that of any other Academy of Music in the world.

The interior comprises a theatre, a concert-hall, dressing and chorus rooms, a green-room, a kitchen, store-rooms, etc., etc. The theatre will seat 2200 people, every one of whom can see the stage conveniently. There are no less than twelve proscenium boxes. The whole theatre is elaborately decorated in the Gothic style, and the effect, when lit up by gas and filled with handsome women and brave men, is very striking. The concert-hall is 89 feet long by 43 wide and 45 high—a very beautiful room indeed. The smaller rooms are convenient; the kitchen baronial, and suggestive of such feasts as our ancestors used to have in the days of the Tudors. Space compels us to curtail this description, which might be prolonged to any length. Our Brooklyn neighbors have certainly achieved a triumph in their Academy; and the effect of such a building on the study of music and the popularity of lectures—both powerful agents of civilization—can not fail to be felt.

TOO LATE.

HUSH! speak low; tread softly;
Draw the sheet aside;
Yes, she does look peaceful;
With that smile she died.

Yet stern want and sorrow
Even now you trace
On the wan, worn features
Of the still white face.

Restless, helpless, hopeless,
Was her bitter pain;
Now—how still the Violets
Lie upon her Heart!

She who toiled and labored
For her daily bread;
See the velvet hangings
Of this stately bed.

Yes, they did forgive her;
Brought her home at last;
Strove to cover over
Their relentless past.

Ah, they would have given
Wealth, and home, and pride,
To see her just the happy
Once before she died!

They strove hard to please her,
But, when death is near,
All you know is deadened,
Hope, and joy, and fear.

And besides, one sorrow
Deeper still—one pain
Was beyond them: healing
Came to day—in vain!

If she had but lingered
Just a few hours more;
Or had this letter reached her
Just one day before!

I can almost pity.
Even him to-day;
Though he let this anguish
Eat her heart away.

Yet she never blamed him;
One day you shall know
How this sorrow happened;
It was long ago.

I have read the letter;
Many a weary year,
For one night and every day
There are thousands here.

If she could but hear it,
Could but understand;
See—I put the letter
In her cold white hand.

Even these words, so longed for,
Do not stir her rest;
Well—I should not murmur,
For God judges best,

She needs no more pity;
But I mourn his fate,
When he hears his letter
Came a day too late.

A BITTER THOUGHT.

I HAVE a bitter Thought, a Snake
That used to sting my life to pain.
I strove to cast it far away,
But every night and every day
It crawled back to my heart again.

It was in vain to live or strive,
To think or sleep, to work or pray;
At last I bade this thing accursed
Gnaw at my heart, and do its worst,
And so I let it have its way.

Thus said I: "I shall never fall
Into a false and dreaming peace,
And then awake, with sudden start,
To feel it biting at my heart,
For now the pain can never cease."

But I gained more; for I have found
That such a snake's envenomed charm
Must always, always find a part,
Deep in the centre of my heart,
Which it can never wound or harm.

It is coiled round my heart to-day.
It sleeps at times, this cruel snake,
And while it sleeps it never stings:—
Hush! let us talk of other things,
Lest it should hear me and awake.

A DAY'S RIDE:
A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.

"WELL, what next? have you bethought you of any thing more to charge me with?" cried a large full man, whose angry look and manner showed how he resented these chentings.

I staggered back sick and faint, for the individual before me was Crofton, my kind host of long ago in Ireland, and from whose hospitable roof I had taken such an unceremonious departure.

"Who are you?" cried he, again. "I had hoped to have paid every thing and every body. Who are you?"

Wishing to retire unrecognized, I stammered out something very unintelligibly indeed about my gratitude, and my hope for a pleasant journey to him, retreating all the while toward the door.

"It's all very well to wish the traveler a pleasant journey," said he, "but you innkeepers ought to bear in mind that no man's journey is rendered more agreeable by roguery. This house is somewhat dearer than the Clarendon in London, or the Hôtel de Rhin at Paris. Now, three might be perhaps some pretext to make a man pay smartly who travels post, and has two or three servants with him, but what excuse can you make for charging some poor devil of a foot traveler, taking his humble meal in the common room, and, naturally enough, of the commonest fare, for making him pay eight florins—eight florins and some kreutzers—for his dinner? Why, one dinner here for two people was handsomely paid at six florins ahead, and yet you bring in a bill of eight florins against this poor wretch."

I saw now, that, what between the blinding effects of his indignation, and certain changes which time and the road had worked in my appearance, the chances were probable I should escape undetected, and so I affected to busy myself with some articles of his luggage that lay scattered about the room until I could manage to slip away.

"Touch nothing, my good fellow!" cried he, angrily; "touch not my own property, I beg of these things. Let my courier come here—or my valet."

This was too good an opportunity to be thrown away, and I made at once for the door, but at the same instant it was opened, and Mary Crofton stood before me. One glance showed me that I was recognized, and there I stood, speechless with shame and confusion. Rallying, however, after a moment, I whispered, "Don't betray me," and tried to pass out. Instead of minding my entreaty, she set her back to the door, and laughingly cried out to her brother,

"Don't you know whom we have got here?"

"What do you mean?" exclaimed he.

"Can not Frank recognize an old friend, notwithstanding all his efforts to cut us?"

"Why—what—surely it can't be—it's not possible—eh?" And by this time he had wheeled me round to the strong light of the window, and then, with a loud burst, he cried out, "Potts, by all that's ragged! Potts himself! Why, did you not think you could trust to my acting to escape us?" and he wrung my hand with a cordial shake that at once brought the blood back to my face, while his sister completed my happiness by saying,

"If you only knew all the schemes we have planned to catch you, you would certainly not have tried to avoid us."

I made an effort to say something—any thing, in short—but not a word could come. If I was overjoyed at the warmth of their greeting, I was no less overwhelmed with shame; and there I stood, looking very pitiably from one to the other, and most thankful that I might faint outright, and so finish my misery.

With a woman's fine tact Mary Crofton seemed to read something of my sufferings, and, whispering one word in her brother's ear, she stepped away and left us alone together.

"Come," said he, good-naturedly, as he drew his arm inside of mine, and led me up and down the room, "tell me all about it. How have you come here? What are you doing?"

I have not the faintest recollection of what I said. I know that I endeavored to take up my story from the day I had last seen him, but it must have proved a very strange and bungling narrative, from the questions which he was forced occasionally to put, in order to follow me out.

"Well," said he, at last, "I will own to you that, after your abrupt departure, I was sorely puzzled what to make of you, and I might have remained longer in the same state of doubt, when a chance visit that I made to Dublin led me to Dycer's, and there, by a mere accident, I heard of you—heard who you were, and where your father lived. I went at once and called upon him, my object being to learn if he had any tidings of you, and where you then were. I found him no better informed than myself. He showed me a few lines you had written on the morning you left home, stating that you would probably be absent some days, and might be even weeks, but that since that date nothing had been heard of you. He seemed vexed and displeased, but not uneasy or apprehensive about your absence, and the same tone I observed in your college tutor, Doctor Tobin. He said: 'Potts will come back, sir, one of these days, and not a whit wiser than he went. His self-esteem as to his capacity is in the reduplicate ratio of the inverse proportion of his ability, and he will be always a fool.' I wrote to various friends of ours traveling about the world, but none had met with you, and at last, when about to come abroad myself, I called again on your father, and found him just re-married."

"Re-married!"

"Yes! he was lonely, he said, and wanted companionship, and so on; and all I could obtain from him was a note for a hundred pounds, and a promise that, if you came back within the year, you should share the business of his shop with him."

"Never! never!" said I. "Potts may be the fool they deem him, but there are instincts and promptings in his secret heart that they know nothing of. I will never go back. Go on."

"I now come to my own story. I left Ireland a day or two after and came to England, where business detained me some weeks. My uncle had died and left me his heir—not, indeed, so much as I had expected, but very well off for a man who had passed his life on very moderate means. There were a few legacies to be paid, and one which he especially intrusted to me by a secret letter, to a lady and her, by delicate and judicious management, I might be able to persuade the person in whose interest it was bequeathed to accept. It was a delicate, a task of no common difficulty, the legatee being the widow of a man who had, by my uncle's cruelty, been driven to destroy himself. It is a long story, which I can not now enter upon; enough that I say it had been a trial of strength between two very wilful minds—the dead man which should crush the other, and my uncle being the richer, and not from any other reason, conquered.

"The victory was a very barren one. It embittered every hour of his life after, and the only reparation in his power he attempted on his death-bed, which was to settle an annuity on the family of the man he had ruined. I found out once where they lived, and set about effecting this difficult charge. I will not linger over my failure—but it was complete. The family was in actual distress, but nothing would induce them to listen to the proposed settlement; and, in fact, the indignation compelled me to retire from the attempt in despair. My sister did her utmost in the cause, but equally in vain, and we prepared to leave the place, much depressed and cast down by our failure. It was on the last evening of our stay at the town of the little village, a townsman of the place, whom I had employed to aid my attempt by his personal influence with the family, asked to see me and speak with me in private.

"He appeared to labor under considerable agitation, and opened our interview by bespeaking my secrecy as to what he was about to communicate. It was to this purport: A friend of his own, engaged in the Baltic trade, had just declared to him that the widow and her only person I alluded to, working as a common porter on the quay at Riga, that he traced him to his lodging, but, on learning that he was absent, that he was not to be found, and it was then ascertained that he had left the city. W. was, it would seem, a man easily recognized, and the other declared that there could not be the slightest doubt of his identity. The question was a grave one how to act, since the assurance company with which his life was insured were actually engaged in discussing the propriety of some compromise by paying to the family a portion of the money, and a measure of grants arose out of this contingency; for while it would have been a great cruelty to have conveyed hopes to the family that might, by possibility, not be realized, yet, on the other hand, to have induced them to adopt a course on the hypothesis of his death when they believed him still living, was almost as bad.

"I thought for a long while over the matter, and with my sister resumed to aid her. I determined that we should come abroad and seek out this man, trusting that, if we found him, we could induce him to accept of the legacy which his family rejected. We obtained every clew we could think of to his detection. A perfect description of him, in voice, look, and manner; a copy of his portrait, and a few specimens of his handwriting; and then we bethought ourselves of interesting you in the search. You were rambling about the world in that idle and desultory way in which any sort of a pursuit might be a boon, as often in the by-paths as on the high roads you might chance to hit off this discovery in some remote spot, or, at all events, find some clew to it. In a word, we grew to believe, that, with you to aid us, we should get to the bottom of this mystery, and now that by lucky chance we have met you, our hopes are all the stronger."

"You'll think it strange," said I, "but I already know something of this story; the man you allude to was Sir S——."

"How on earth have you guessed that?"

"I came by the knowledge on a railroad journey, where my fellow-passengers talked over the event, and subsequently traveled with Sir S——'s daughter, who came abroad to fill the station of a companion to an elderly lady. She called herself Miss Herbert."

"Exactly! The widow renamed her family name after W.'s suicide—if it were a suicide."

"How singular to think that you should have chanced upon this link of the chain! And do you know her?"

"Intimately; we were fellow-travelers for some days."

"And where is she now?"

"She is, at this moment, at a villa on the Lake of Como, living with a Mrs. Keates, the sister of her Majesty's Envoy at Kahlbratzenstadt."

"You are marvelously accurate in this narrative, Potts," said he, laughing; "the impression made on you by this young lady can scarcely have been a transient one."

I suppose I grew very red—I felt that I was much confused by this remark—and I turned away to conceal my emotion. Crofton was too delicate to take any advantage of my distress, and merely added:

"From having known her, you will naturally devote yourself with more ardor to serve her. May we then count upon your assistance in our project?"

"That you may," said I. "From this hour I devote myself to it."

Crofton at once proposed that I should order my luggage to be placed on his carriage and start off with them; but I firmly opposed this plan. First of all, I had no luggage, and had no fancy to confess as much; secondly, I resolved to be at least one day for Vicenza's arrival—I'd have given a month rather than come down to the dreary thought of his being a knave, with Lucile a cheat! In fact, I felt that if I were to begin any new project in life with so black an experience that every step I took would be clouded with distrust, I was tarnished with suspicion. I therefore pretended to Crofton that I had given rendezvous to a friend at Lindau, and could not leave without waiting for him. I am not very sure that he believed me, but he was most careful in not dropping a word that might show incredulity; and once more we addressed ourselves to the grand project before us.

"Come in, Mary!" cried he, suddenly rising from his chair at a knock at the door. "Come in, and help us by your good counsel."

It was not possible to receive me with more kindness than she showed. Had I been some old friend who came to meet them there by appointment, her manner could not have been more courteous and easy; and when she had learned from her brother how warmly I had associated myself in this plan she gave me one of her pleasantest smiles, and said,

"I was not mistaken in you."

With a great map of Europe before us on the table we proceeded to plan a future line of operations. I agreed to take certain places, each of us, and to meet at certain others, to compare notes and report progress. We scarcely permitted ourselves to order any great confidence of success, but we all concurred in the notion that some lucky hazard might do for us more than all our best-devised schemes could accomplish; and, at last, it was settled that, while they took Southern Germany and the Tyrol, I should ramble about through Savoy and Upper Italy, and our meeting-place be at Genoa, on exactly that day three months. The great railway centers, where Englishmen of every class and gradation were much employed, offered the best prospect of meeting with the object of our search, and these were precisely the sort of places such a man would be certain to resort to.

Our discussion lasted so long that the Crofton pair left their guests to their following day, and we dined all together very happily, never wearied of talking over the plan before us, and each speculating as to what share of assistance he could contribute to the common stock of investigation. It was when Crofton left the room to search for some map of Whalley that Mary sat down at my side, and said:

"I have been thinking for some time over a project in which you can aid me greatly. My brother tells me that you are known to Miss Herbert. Now I want to write to her; I want to tell her that there is one who, belonging to a family from which you have suffered heavily, desires to expiate so far, maybe, the great wrong, and, if she will permit it, to be her friend. What can I say in a letter explain what I feel on this score, I am well aware how much aid it would afford me to have the personal corroboration of one who could say, 'I know,' writes this is not altogether unworthy of your affection; do not reject the offer she makes you, or, at least, reflect well and long before you refuse it.' Will you help me so far?"

My heart bounded with delight as I first listened to her speech. It was only a moment that I remembered how difficult, if not impossible, it would be for me to approach Miss Herbert once more. How or in what character could I seek her? To appear before her in any feigned part would be, under the circumstances, ignoble and unworthy, and yet, was I, out of any merely personal consideration, any regard for the poor creature Potts, to forego the interests, maybe the whole happiness, of one so immeasurably better and worthier? Would not any amount of shame and exposure to myself be a cheap price for even a small quantity of benefit bestowed on her? What signified it that I was poor and ragged—unknown, unrecognized—if she were to be the gainer? Would not, in fact, the very sacrifice of self in the affair be ennobling and elevating to me, and would I not stand better in my own esteem for this one honest act, than I had ever done after any mock success or imaginary victory?

"I think I can guess why you hesitate," cried she; "you fear that I will say something indiscreet—something that would compromise you with Miss Herbert—but you need not dread that; and, at all events, you shall read my letter."

"Far from it," said I; "my hesitation had a very different source. I was solely thinking whether, if you were aware of how I stood in my relations to Miss Herbert, you would have selected me as your advocate; and though in my pain me to make a full confession, you shall hear every thing."

With this I left her all—all, from my first hour of meeting her at the railway station to my last parting with her at Schaffhausen. I tried to make my narrative as grave and commonplace as might be, but, do what I would, the figure in which I was forced to present myself overcame all my attempts at seriousness, and she laughed immoderately. If it had not been for this burst of merriment on her part, it is more than probable I might have thought down my history to the very moment of telling, and narrated every detail of my journey with Vincenza and Timothée. As it was, however, warned by these circumstances, and concluded in time to save myself from this new ridicule.

"From all that you have told me here," said she, "I only see one—which is, that you are deeply in love with this young lady."

"No," said I; "I was so once, I am not so any longer. But this is not the place to call the chronic stage, and I feel myself her friend—only her friend."

"Well, for the purpose I have in mind this is all the better. I want you, as I said, to place my letter in her hands, and so, as far as possible, entirely to remove from it all, as it were, the impression that it may have derived from ample means is dashed with remembering what power it has been attended with to that poor family. If you urge that one theme forcibly, you can scarcely fail to touch it."

"And what are your intentions with regard to her?" asked I.

"They will take any shape she pleases. My brother would either enable her to return home, and, by persuading her mother to accept an annuity, live himself under per. my roof; or she might—if the idea of independence fires her—she might yet use her influence over her mother and sister to carry our proposals more readily; or she might come and live with us, and this I would prefer to all; but you must read my letter, and more than once, too. You must possess yourself of its details, and, if there be any thing to which you object, there will be time enough still to change it."

"Here he is, with a portrait of our lost sheep," said Crofton, now entering with a miniature in his hand. It represented a bluff, bold, almost insolent boy of about fifteen, with a face not improbably catching an additional expression of vulgar pride from the fact that the likeness was taken in the dress of Cupid—a greatness when he first took the chair as chief magistrate of his town.

"Not an over-refined sort of fellow to deal with, I should say," remarked Crofton. "There are some stern lines here about the corners of the eyes, and certain very suspicious-looking indentations near the mouth."

"His eye has no forgiveness in it," said his sister.

"Well, one thing is clear enough, he ought to be easily recognized; that broad forehead, and those wide-spread nostrils and deeply divided chin, are traits not to be forgotten. Come, I can not give you this," said Crofton to me, "but I'll take care to send you an accurate copy of it as half a dozen favorable moments, while, make yourself master of its details, and try if you can not carry the resemblance in your memory."

"Disabuse yourself, too," said she, laughing, "of all this accessorial grandeur, and bear in mind that you'll not find him dressed in ermine, or surrounded by a court and halberds. Not very like his daughter, I'm sure," whispered she in my ear, as I continued to gaze steadfastly at the portrait. "Is there no trace of softness?"

"Not the very faintest; she is beautiful," said I, "and her whole expression is gentleness and delicacy."

"Well, certainly," said Crofton, shutting up the miniature, "these are not the distinguishing traits of our friend here, whom I should call a hard-minded, keen, calculating fellow, with great self-reliance, and no great trust of others."

"I was just thinking," said I, "that were I to come up with such a man as this, what chance would my poor, frail, yielding temperament have in influencing the rugged granite of his nature? Really, I am at sea."

"Not when your object was a good and generous one," said Miss Crofton. "You might well enough be afraid to confront such a man as this if your aim was to overreach and deceive him; but bear in mind the fable of the man who had the courage to take the thorn out of the lion's paw. The operation, we are told, was a painful one, and there might have been an instant in which the patient felt disposed to eat his doctor; but, with no thought of such a thing, a good purpose, the surgeon persevered, and by his skill and his courage made the king of the beasts his fast friend for life. The lesson is worth remembering."

I was still pondering over this apophthegm when Crofton aroused me by pushing across the table a great heap of gold. "This is all yours, Potts," said he; "and remember, that as you are now my agent, traveling for the house of Crofton & Co., that you journey at my cost."

Of course I would not listen to this proposal, and although urged by Miss Crofton with all a woman's tact and delicacy, I persisted so firmly in my refusal that they were obliged to yield. I now had a hundred pounds all my own, and though the sum be not a very splendid one, I remember some French writer—I'm not sure it is not Jules Janin—saying, "Any man who can put his hand into his pocket and find five Napoleons there, is rich;" and he certainly supports his theory with considerable sophistry and cleverness, mainly depending on the assumption that any of the ordinary daily necessities of life, even in a luxurious point of view, are attainable with such means. Now, although a hundred pounds would not very long supply resources for such a life, yet as I am not a Frenchman, nor living in Paris, still less had I habits or tastes of a costly kind, I might very well eke out three months pleasantly on this sum, and in these three months what might not happen? Is it a hundred to 1 the great Napoleon crushed the whole might of the Austrian empire, and secured an emperor's daughter for his bride; and in another hundred days' he made the tour of France, from Cannes to Rochefort, and lost an empire by the way! Wonderful things might then be compassed within three months.

"What are you saying about three months, Potts?" asked Crofton, for unwittingly I had uttered these words aloud.

"I was observing," said I, "that in three months from this day we should arrange to meet somewhere, and what shall we say?"

"Geneva is very central; shall we name Geneva?"

"Oh, on no account. Let our rendezvous be in Italy. Let us say Rome."

"Rome be it, then," cried Crofton. "Now for another point: I'll make a wager as to who first discovers the object of our search. I'll bet you twenty Napoleons, Potts, to ten—for, as we are two to one, so should the wager be."

"I take you," cried I, entering into his humor, "and I feel as certain of success as if I had your money in my hand."

"Will you make the same wager with me?" whispered Mary Crofton, as she came behind my chair. "It is, that you'll not persuade Miss Herbert to write to you after you say 'No.'"

"I'll bet my life on it," said I, taking the opal ring she drew from her finger, as she spoke.

"I'm in that moment confidence now, I feel there is nothing I could not promise."

"If so then, Potts, let me have the benefit of this favorable moment, and ask you to promise me one thing, which is, not to change your mind more than twice a day; don't be angry with me, but hear me out. You are a good-hearted fellow, and have excellent intentions; I don't think I know one less really selfish, but at the same time you are so fickle of purpose, so undecided in every thing, that I do not be less astonished to hear, when we asked for you to-morrow at breakfast-time, that you had started for a trip to Norway, or on a voyage to the Southern Pacific."

"And is this your judgment of me also, Miss Crofton?" said I, rising from my seat.

"Oh no, Mr. Potts. I would only suspect you of going off into the Tyrol, or the Styrian Alps, and coming at last about us, amidst the glaciers and the cataracts."

"I wish you a good-night, and a better opinion of your humble servant," said I, bowing.

"Don't go, Potts—wait a minute—come back. I have something to tell you."

I closed the door behind me, and hastened off, not, however, perfectly clear whether I was the injured man, or one who had just achieved a great outrage.

THE SECEDING ALABAMA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE SECEDING ALABAMA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.

BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK, the senior Senator from the State of Alabama, is, by the vote of his associates, President, pro tempore, of the Senate, which would give him the position of Vice-President should Mr. Breckinridge be called to the highest position in the republic. He was born in Georgia, in June, 1802, and was left an orphan at an early age, with no other educational advantages than those afforded by the "old field school" near his rural home. In 1815 he emigrated, with an elder brother, to the fertile valley of the Alabama River, then being settled, and where he has since resided. Prosecuting his studies, he read law, and in 1821 was admitted to the bar, where he soon so distinguished himself that he was elected District-Attorney, and re-elected in 1825, and again in 1829. Application to the arduous duties of this position injured his health, and he retired to a plantation, where he has since given decided proofs of agricultural information and practical skill. In 1840 he was nominated as a Presidential Elector on the Democratic ticket, and succeeded in stemming the popular tide by giving the vote of Alabama to Martin Van Buren. In 1841 he was elected Governor of the State, which position he occupied to 1845. In 1852 Governor Collier appointed him Senator in Congress to fill the vacancy occasioned by the election of W. R. King, which appointment the Legislature confirmed. Since then he has been prominent in the Senate, not only personally (for he is a large, fine-looking gentleman), but as a working member, who rarely intrudes his opinions, but who never fails to record his vote in a manner acceptable to his constituents. Governor Fitzpatrick was nominated on the ticket with Mr. Douglas, but declined the honor; and has since headed the "co-operationists," who advocate the co-operation of all the Slave States in the establishment of a Southern Confederacy.

CLEMENT CLAIBORNE CLAY, Alabama's favorite son and Senator, is already known to the readers of Harper's Weekly, in which his biography has appeared. The son of that noble-hearted Virginian, George Clay, who filled the sheriff-service office in his adopted State of Alabama, and the husband of one of the most accomplished daughters of the same family, Senator Clay is a Representative man of that fertile land which the wandering red-men called "Alabama," or "Here we rest." 1806. Mr. Moore was a planter, and owned a few raised companies, and served a twelvemonth on the Rio Grande, and subsequently in Scott's forces at Vera Cruz, Alvarado, Tampico, and Chapultepec. On his return, in 1847, he was made Brigadier-General of Militia; and in 1857 he was elected to Congress, where he has taken a rather conservative course, and was, we believe, the author of some extended remarks, the next day: "I do not profess to belong to the class of disunionists, if there be such a class in the Southern States who dream of death! I come from a State which is, and has at all times been ready to take Constitution, but which will be as ready to take ground for dissolution of this Union, in case the rights guaranteed to us under the Constitution are infringed, as any State in the Union."

A graduate of the University of Alabama, and the Law-school of the University of Virginia; the successful editor of the Flag of the Union newspaper; noted as an able lawyer and as a vigilant District-Attorney; an active member of the Alabama Legislature for several years; and an able judge of the circuit-court—he was well qualified, in 1853, to occupy the Senatorial seat which his father had adorned. Since then, his course has been unwavering in bringing about the independent position of Alabama now just taken; and he has ever enjoyed the personal respect and esteem of his associates, even of those who have regarded him as their uncompromising political foe, as he has stood before them the champion of his constituents. "Identified as I am," said he, "with Alabama by my birth, education, interest, and affection—regarding her as the nursing mother and my grave"—indebted to her for the highest honors and greatest trusts she could bestow, and standing here as one of her ambassadors in this grand Exchange of sovereign States, I feel it my duty, as well as privilege, to justify or excuse, as far as I can, all her acts relating to her sister States and to the Federal Government." . . . If she yields to Republican control, "she will deserve to suffer all the wrong and all the shame you can and will accumulate upon her head. But as honor, interest, self-preservation—all that is dear to freemen—all urge her to maintain her individuality and equality as sovereign States, either within or without the Union, I trust she will give you full demonstration of her courage and self-reliance, by refusing any the least concession to your demands, and by resenting your menaces and repelling your attempts at coercion in such manner as will prove that the spirit of the fathers, in Southern States and in New Orleans, consummated in triumph our two wars of independence, yet lives in her sons."

JAMES A. HOLLYWOOD, who represents the first or Mobile District in the House of Representatives, was born in Concush County, Alabama, on the 7th of April, 1822. After having received an academical education he studied law, passed a high examination, and has since enjoyed a lucrative practice. He was twice elected District-Attorney for the circuit in which he resides, and was a member of the State Legislature from 1845 to 1848. After having been defeated by the Know Nothings, he was, in 1857, elected to Congress, where he is a universal favorite, ever ready with an anecdote or a repartee, yet none the less determined in maintaining the rights of his native State.

JAMES L. PUGH, the Representative from the second Congressional District of Alabama, was born in Bartow County, Georgia, in 1820, and received his education at the La Grange Academy, of which Otis Smith was the distinguished principal. Removing to Alabama, he commenced the practice of law, and is said to have no equal in the State before a jury. He was an unsuccessful candidate for Congress in 1849, when Henry W. Hilliard defeated him by a small vote, and left the Whig party in 1850, since when he has been a thorough-going secessionist. Since he has been in Congress he has taken no part in the transaction of business, having expressed his "solemn conviction that no amount of effort, however well directed and praiseworthy, can ever rescue the Constitution from the perils which surround it, or restore the government to its original purity, or perpetuate it in that form." The Territorial action of Judge Douglas, in his opinion, was such that the Southern Democracy could not indorse it without stultifying themselves; and he urged, in January, 1860, a speedy termination of the Union in case the Republicans carried the Presidential election, saying: "The truest conservatism and wisest statesmanship demand a speedy termination of all association with such confederates, and the formation of another union of States, homogeneous in population, institutions, interests, and pursuits. Such a confederacy (said he) would be impregnable, and present to the world a contented, happy, prosperous, powerful people, in the enjoyment of the highest perfection of civilization and free government."

DAVID CLOPTON, the Representative from the Tuskegee District of Alabama, was born in Putnam County, Georgia, about 1820, and graduated at Oxford College, in that State; after which he removed to his present residence, where he commenced a highly lucrative practice at the bar. After filling several responsible positions at home, he was elected a member of the Provisional Congress, where he has distinguished himself as a reformer of the printing abuses. Mr. Clopton has always been a State Rights man, and, when he could not preserved power of secession as the only remedy of sectional differences. "We do not desire war," said he, in a speech delivered during the struggle for the Speakership of the Thirty-sixth Congress; "the policy of the South would be peace. But whenever this Government, in the opinion of the Southern people, shall have failed to accomplish the ends for which it was instituted, the Southern States, exercising their right, will abolish it, and institute a new Government, laying its foundation in such principles, and organizing it in such forms, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. To this end we are prepar to exercise these rights, then, if war comes, it must come from the North. If war must come, let it come."

SYDENHAM MOORE, the Representative from the Greensborough District, was born in Rutherford County, Tennessee, where he was a boy at parents removed to Alabama, where he received an academical education, and afterward completed his studies at the State University. Studying law, he was admitted to the bar, and rose in a short time appointed Judge of the Green County Court, where he presided for six years, when he was transferred to the Circuit Bench of that County. No sooner were volunteers called for to reinforce General Taylor, after his gallant victories at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, than Mr. Moore hastened to tender a regiment of mounted volunteers, which was mustered into service in June, 1846. Mr. Moore was elected to one of the seats in the Rio Grande, and subsequently in Scott's forces at Vera Cruz, Alvarado, Tampico, and Chapultepec. On his return, in 1847, he was made Brigadier-General of Militia; and in 1857 he was elected to Congress, where he has taken a rather conservative course, and was, we believe, the author of some extended remarks, the next day: "I do not profess to belong to the class of disunionists, if there be such a class in the Southern States who dream of death! I come from a State which is, and has at all times been ready to take Constitution, but which will be as ready to take ground for dissolution of this Union, in case the rights guaranteed to us under the Constitution are infringed, as any State in the Union."

GEORGE S. HOUSTON, the Representative from the Athens district, is one of the most prominent members of the House, where his commanding form and stentorian voice are always to be seen and heard when an attempt is made to smuggle through appropriations not strictly constitutional or economical. Mr. Houston is a Georgian by birth, but has resided near his present home since his boyhood, occupying a high position at the bar, and having repeatedly been honored with seats in the State offices. He was first elected a Representative to Congress in 1841, and has served since, with the exception of the Thirty-first Congress. This long service has rendered him thoroughly familiar with "parliamentary tactics," and given him a commanding position as a party-leader, in whom honesty, courage, and experience, and relentless hostility to the schemes of the lobby, all have confidence. While acknowledging the importance and magnitude of the questions growing out of African slavery, he has taken a great interest in the tariff and other practical issues, and has steadfastly opposed extravagant expenditures.

WILLIAMSON R. W. COBB, who represents the most populous district in Alabama, was born in Ray County, Tennessee, in 1807, and the next year was taken by his parents to the State of Georgia, in Madison County, where he was brought up on a farm, receiving a good common-school education. In 1825 he was sent to Franklin College, Athens, and at the close of his term, in 1847, was elected to the National House of Representatives, where he has since served, and is now the "oldest member." During this long term of service he has ever taken the part of "the people;" and to him other legislators have been content to leave gratefull for the Bounty Land Bill of 1850. He also "engineered" the Graduation Bill of 1854, which other legislators assumed the credit to have fit the laboring classes; but he has been pre-eminent as an advocate of the Union. In 1849 he introduced a series of resolutions into the House that were the first steps taken in the compromise of the ensuing year; and since then it has been his boast that he has, to use his own words, "battled against the wildest fanaticism, and for the widest Union sentiments, and —thank God!—triumphed."

JABEZ L. M. CURRY, the Representative from the Talladega District, was born in Lincoln County, Georgia, June 5, 1825, and removed with his father to his present residence in 1838. After graduating at the University of Georgia, in 1843, he went to Harvard College, where he went through a course of legal studies, and after receiving his diploma returned to Alabama, where he at once entered upon an extensive practice. When the war with Mexico began, in 1846, he joined the Texan Rangers, but was forced to return on account of ill health; and was the following year elected to the State Legislature, to which he was re-elected in 1803 and in 1855. In 1857 he was elected to Congress, where he has taken a commanding position as a statesman and as an orator. Nature has endowed him with a mind so active that he can apparently discover, by a glance so rapid as to seem intuition, those truths which common capacities struggle hard to comprehend, while his genius enables him to enforce by argument, and his accomplishments to illustrate, those topics upon which he addresses the House. While he believes that each State "has the right of secession, the right of interposition for the arrest of evils within its limits," and while he boldly asserts the sovereignty of the State to which he owes his "first and last allegiance," he has never failed to recognize "the true and loyal men in Congress, and in the North, who are ready to lock shields with the South in defense of the Constitution and the Union, which is its creature; and to hope that, in the irrepressible conflict which may be here or elsewhere, the issue may be able to rescue the Constitution of our country from the polluting touch of those who would destroy it."

THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE official report of the commerce of the United States for the fiscal year ending 30th June last has been published, and reveals some interesting facts. The fiscal year 1859–'60 was, both in regard to imports and exports, the most active in our history. We imported $362,163,941 of foreign goods; and exported $400,122,296 of domestic and foreign produce, leaving a balance in favor of the United States equal to $37,958,355. This balance is the secret of the extraordinary decline in foreign exchange which we have witnessed during the past few weeks.

We place on record, for purposes of future reference, a few figures showing the progress of our foreign trade:

OUR FOREIGN IMPORTS.
1855–'56	$214,639,042
1856–'57	360,890,141
1857–'58	282,613,150
1858–'59	338,768,130
1859–'60	362,163,941

The year 1859–'60 is slightly in excess of 1856–'57, the year preceding the crisis of 1857; all other years fall considerably below. The foreign imports in 1860–'61 will not probably exceed those of 1859–'60 more goods were imported than the country could take; hence a reduction of orders; and besides, the revolution at the South shuts off that market.

OUR EXPORTS OF DOMESTIC PRODUCE.
1855–'56	$278,941,664
1856–'57	275,156,566
1857–'58	288,944,990
1858–'57	302,960,682
1857–'58	324,644,421
1858–'59	342,979,401
1859–'60	382,188,663

It will be noticed that 1859–'60 is considerably in advance of any previous year. Our exports of cotton that year were unusually heavy, and the export of bullion was also above the average. The export of breadstuffs was quite light, the European crop in 1859 having been good, and our own less than an average. The returns of 1860–'61 will show a remarkable contrast to those of 1859–'60. It is probable that our cotton exports will be less than in that year, but our export of food will be the largest ever recorded. As, however, we are sending no specie abroad, it is probable that the total export of domestic produce in 1860–'61 will not exceed that of 1858–'59.

We need hardly observe that the above table does not include foreign goods re-exported, and that our total exports for 1859–'60 were $20,000,000 in excess of the aggregates therein given.

So much is thought and said about specie and the specie movement, that it is worth while to give the figures of that also. It is generally reckoned that California produces about $55,000,000 of specie annually, and that a further sum of nearly $10,000,000 is received from the gold-mines of the Carolinas, Georgia, and Fike's Peak. The following table will show how much, if any, of the gold taken from our soil is retained in the country:

THE SPECIE MOVEMENT.
Years.	Imports.	Exports.	Net Exports.
1852–'54	$6,363,764	$41,488,488	$34,624,723
1854–'55	4,950,812	56,007,853	51,057,031
1855–'56	4,997,693	45,745,488	41,597,893
1856–'57	12,461,710	68,156,952	55,675,152
1857–'58	19,374,496	57,633,147	38,258,651
1858–'59	7,484,759	66,043,398	58,459,639
1859–'60	8,850,153	66,546,239	58,396,154

A SOUTHERN TRANSATLANTIC STEAM LINE.

We have reason to believe that negotiations are on foot which may lead to the establishment of a line of ocean steamers between Norfolk, Virginia, and Havre, France, touching at New York going and coming. The political troubles in the Southern States seem to have thrown obstacles in the way of the usual outgoing of cotton from Southern ports. Some of the leading planters and their financial agents have, consequently, begun to examine the facilities afforded by Northern ports for the out-let of the staple.

The advantages of New York as a shipping port naturally strike the eye at once. We have the capital, the apparatus, the ships, the harbor, and the internal communications. Cotton can be sent from points south of Memphis to Liverpool, via New York, about as cheaply as via New Orleans. Such is the rivalry among our railroads, in fact, that if the trade became brisk perhaps this route would prove the cheapest.

But if Norfolk or Baltimore entered into the competition, they would enjoy advantages over New York. By the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad Norfolk is now in direct connection with Memphis. If a line of steamers were established between Norfolk and Havre, they could rely upon a full cargo of cotton each trip eastward; and there is every reason to believe that they would come westward heavily freighted with French goods for New Orleans and St. Louis. At present New York receives all the European goods for the Southwestern cities. They could be imported more cheaply via Norfolk, if only a steam line were established to Norfolk; Memphis being the distributing point for the Upper and Lower Mississippi. We understand that arrangements have already been made with the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, and with the Mississippi steamers, by which passengers and freight can be sent through from Havre to New Orleans or St. Louis, via the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad and the Mississippi River, at a considerable reduction from the present rate via New York.

The subject has been laid before the leading steamship men of this city, and is now under consideration. The chief difficulty in the way seems to be the doubt whether Virginia will be a member of the Federal Union at the time matters are ready for the establishment of the ocean service. If Virginia goes out of the Union, steamship proprietors apprehend difficulties about clearances and foreign alliances, which might seriously interfere with the success of the enterprise. Their apprehensions may be gratuitous; but capital is proverbially timid. If it were certain that Virginia and Tennessee were going to remain in the Union, we think it morally certain, from what we know, that the transatlantic line from Norfolk would be in operation by the 1st of April next.

THE FUGITIVE-SLAVE CASE IN CANADA.

A VERY striking law case, which may shed some light on the political status of the British Provinces, is at present occupying public attention.

Some seven years ago a slave named Anderson, owned in Missouri, in attempting to escape from bondage, was stopped by a planter named Seneca Digges, and, in a struggle to avoid being again stabbed Mr. Digges to death. Anderson escaped to Canada. In 1860 he was recognized there. The proper affidavits were laid before the Missouri courts, and the Governor of that State claimed the fugitive under the Extradition Treaty. The Court of Queen's Bench at Toronto, Sir John Robinson presiding, held the case proven, and directed the return of Anderson. An appeal was taken to the Judges sitting in error. Since then the Secretary of the British Anti-Slavery Society, the famous Mr. Chamerowzow, has applied to the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster Hall, London, England, for a writ of habeas corpus, directing the Canadian Sheriff to produce the body of Anderson at Westminster, and the case has granted the writ.

The case is unprecedented, so far as Canada is concerned. Cases have occurred in which criminals in the Islands of Jersey and Man have been brought before the Courts at Westminster under writs of habeas corpus. But fais is the first case in which a Canadian court has been interfered with by Westminster Hall. The issue will shed light on the nature of the independence which Canada enjoys. It has always been supposed that the British courts had no jurisdiction in Canada, except on appeal to the British Privy Council from judgments of the highest judicial tribunal in the Provinces. The new decision goes to prove that the British courts enjoy original as well as appellate jurisdiction in Canada.

We may notice, in connection with this subject, the singular delusion under which some of our journals and politicians seem to be laboring with regard to Canada. They seem to think that, in the event of a separation between the Northern and the Southern States, Canada would leap into the arms of the former. They evidently know very little about Canada or the Canadian people. Canadians are intensely loyal to their Sovereign; and intensely hostile to America in and American institutions. They are just as likely to accept the rule of Napoleon the Third as to enter the Northern Confederacy. No doubt they are very wrong. But just now our own Government is not working well enough to justify us in abusing them for declining to join us. In Canada they have a Government.

THE REAL CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

We willingly give place to the following letter, which explains itself:

"MACON, GEORGIA, Jan. 24, 1861.

"MESSRS. HARPER AND BROTHERS,—Permit me to address you a few lines, as a friend, and from an old association of feeling, from having worked in your office in 1821 and 1822. I have favorable associations connected with it, when the elder associate was married, and Wesley and Fletcher Harper were apprentices. I helped to move your office on a cold morning, in 1822, from the north to the south side of Pearl Street, over the bookstore of Collins & Hannay, and completed my portion of the work so as to distribute a handful of letter before breakfast. I do not think, from what I saw three years ago, that your office could now be removed in so short a time. But the above is not the object of my writing. I have taken your Monthly and Weekly, since the commencement of their publication, through our bookstores—I have noticed many articles in your Weekly, as news items, with regard to Southern affairs—scarcity of provisions and their prices, etc., which are either highly exaggerated or entirely false. I know the state of the country well, and it does not admit of any such assertions as I see in your columns. I will only say that, although our grain crops were very middling last year, we have plenty in our State to produce bread, and from home and not abroad. Also, that very few are out of employment who are disposed to work; and in a short time there will be more labor than laborers to perform it. It is true, that there is some stagnation in business here, and the usual amount of fine goods have not been imported by our merchants for a short time past. This is all very well for them as the stock now on hand is sufficient for the next two years—and may tend for a time to check past extravagance with the ladies who think they can't 'get nothing to eat or nothing to wear,' while all that is necessary is in abundance about them. Such items as I have alluded to are calculated to create a sensitive people in the political ferment we are undergoing. Yours, respectfully, S. ROSE."

We will only remark that the paragraphs alluded to by our correspondent were taken from the Macon correspondence of the New York Herald, a journal not generally supposed to be unfair to the South. Some other paragraphs which have appeared in our news columns, and which have led to some abuse of this journal in the New Orleans Delta and other Southern papers, were taken from the same source, or others of equal responsibility. Our object in compiling our summary of news is to present the truth to our readers: when, in following our daily contemporaries, we are led into error, it will always afford us pleasure to be set right.

THE LOUNGER.

A PAINTER'S STUDIO.

THE student of the history of American Art will never fail to be struck with the fact that Washington Allston, after living a dozen years in Italy and Europe, returned to America and settled himself quietly in the village, or town, or city of Cambridgeport, one of the populous neighborhoods in which the solid city of Boston ravels out into country, and precisely the last spot that the imagination would hold for propitious nurture for the forms of art. That in the vicinity of a few miles dwells the most cultivated society of the region is very probable; but still you feel that the artist who sits down for life in Cambridgeport has a profound faith in himself and his art.

Somehow our artists gravitate to Broadway. There are good ones and true in Philadelphia, but they have not the same kind of audience and prestige which are secured in New York. And the other day, Mr. Thomas Cole, a painter of this day—stumbling through streets mealy with snow and crowded with hurrying people, a party of three friends, like good Mr. James's two horsemen, might have been seen making their way to a studio. To a studio in Boston? Say, rather, to the heart of Italy and Spain. Winter, Boston, disunion, hurry, disappeared; and we were all golden lilies once more in youth and Italy. That is the delight and secret power of the studio in America. We pretend to be busy pictures or to sit for a portrait; but it is really that we may travel back again toward morning, and the hour "of glory in the grass, of splendor in the flower."

The charm of Hamilton Wild's studio is not only that the subjects of the pictures are Spanish or Italian life and scenery, but that the spirit and treatment of them are so likewise; and they are Italian in the sense that the Italian painting is the truest painting of all. Like Page, Wild is a Venetian, in no imitative sense, but because he believes the school of Venice to have been the greatest in the world, and Titian, Tintoretto, Giorgione, and their friends to have been, in the strictest sense of the words, the greatest painters. He has studied them and Veronese has studied Chaucer, Shakespeare, and Milton; and with what sympathy he has studied, the remarkable development of his power since he went away, seven or eight years ago, attests.

Upon an easel stood a curtained picture. We talked of Venice and the artist threw the curtain back. The picture was Venice and Italy as Titian's portraits are. The first profound impression as the eye fell upon it was that of sumptuousness, richness, and passionate sadness. Then came the outline of the story of the picture, and then the study of the mechanical treatment, the manipulation upon the costly, exquisitely wrought frame which held the picture, as a fit casket a ruby, was graved in German text, La belle dame sans mercis. You remember the line in Keats's "Eve of St. Mark," and his ballad in Leigh Hunt's "Indicator."

"All what can all thee, wretched wight!
So haggard and so woebegone,
The squirrel's granary is full,
And harvest's done."

It is not that lady. It is not Keats's lady at all. It is its own conception, its own poem. A lady attired as poets see, in green velvet, and full sleeves caught with jewels, and buttoned with pearls, lightened with muslin and heavy with costly texture, holds an apple and a lute of ebony and ivory and box-wood. The face, smaller than life, looks straight at you, straight and calm and sawy of cold, with heavy black hair waving low along the clear, pale forehead, and glittering eyes that tune your eyes away. It is snow, dazzling, serene, pure. But it is not snow that ever melts into impetuous torrents and dashes headlong. Just behind her as she sings leans a youth of the inexpressible tawny beauty of the Italian peasant, his eyes drooping in a dreamy, far-off gaze, beholding her at his side, yet inaccessible forever.

The painting of the picture is masterly. The wood is wood, the ivory ivory, the velvet velvet, and the hair hair. The skill of the hand waits upon the poetic brain—otherwise, quoth an artist, there is no painter.

What, then, is a painter? I asked.

He who sees pictorially and who can make pictures; or, again, he who sees pictures and has the susceptible of adequate representation under the conditions of painting, and who is master of those conditions. A poet without an eye for color could not be a painter. A poet who has the color, but no hand for it, is no more a painter than the other. To indicate with chalk or charcoal or color that you have a fine eye for color is pathetic, is not to be a painter. If Titian had drawn the Presentation in crayon, it would not have been a great picture.

While we talked, Wild placed another picture upon the easel—a woman of Albano looking intently from a window into a warm Italian landscape, with Soracte upon the horizon and the stone pines, that of themselves are Italy. The profile is perfect, the face shadowless, the complexion a wonder of cool gray and rose, the dress with a square neck—all simple, tranquil, beautiful. The beauty of the face is in curious contrast with that of the other picture, which is full of the rose drop of passion, and an alluring inward loveliness.

There was a smaller picture of a Spanish girl, and studies of Spanish and Italian heads painted in Spain and Italy. There was also a reminiscence of a villa near Sienna—a morning-reading under the cypresses—which Old Walter Savage Landor, Robert Browning, and Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and Story, the sculptor of the Zenobia of Rome, will instantly identify.

As Mr. Wild's pictures are seen, his remarkable merit will be conceded. The dullest eye can not be blind to the richness of color, and the most delicate imagination will find in the pure, true poetic sentiment. It will be the loss of all of us if he does not exhibit at the Academy this year.

TO LITERARY ASPIRANTS.

"SIR,—A person who has unfortunately no acquaintance among editors or publishers, would like to make an engagement to furnish an occasional article for a paying paper or magazine. Will you have the kindness to say a few words equivalent for the encouraging.

"If, Sir, you can make it convenient and agreeable to add a stranger by your influence in the matter, you will confer a lasting obligation upon one who is quite ashamed of the request—which is made in a spirit of desperation, as a forlorn hope.

"An early answer would very much oblige,

"Yours, with much respect,

This is the kind of note which every newspaper man or literary man receives. It is sad to read it: sad to think of the weary heart that must have penned it. There is something so uncertain in the nature of literary success that nothing is more natural than that a man who has a taste for it should say, "Well, perhaps I am an author." The same person would not think of applying for employment at a bookseller's, or at a publication office, book-binding; nor at a shoe-factory, if he knew nothing of shoe-making; nor would he seek any employment for which special skill and training and knowledge and familiarity. No—nor would he try the publisher, if he could only know just what is required. But how can he, he argues, until he tries?

No one, if he has not been familiar with periodicals, thinks of the enormous number of failures in such publications. Each is to be rendered a very little goes by favor, and necessarily; for the editor of a Magazine contracts with the public to supply it with articles, and he is not to exhibit his own literature. If he insert what he knows to be poor, to gratify a friend, or from any personal motive, what happens? The public, which is the employer of the publisher, because he was to furnish what seemed to him essentially good, and upon that understanding the publisher risked the enterprise. Second, he has a perfect contract with the public. Third, he helps destroy his own reputation as an editor.

It can not be too often stated for the benefit of literary aspirants that a personal introduction to an editor is never necessary. If your object is to submit a manuscript, you prefer not to see you. He wishes to judge your work impersonally, and to be spared the possible confusion of a personal application. It is easier and shorter for him to write to you than to say to you, "Dear Sir, your paper does not suit." An editor can not give reasons. In such matters he acts by instinct. "This is good for the public: this is bad for the public," is the method of his ratiocination.

And let him not fear that his MS. will be overlooked. Manuscripts are not overlooked. If any thing is sent to a paper or magazine which seems serviceable it is accepted and used. It is sad for the author to reflect that his work does not appear because it is not considered suitable. But that is the reason, and not because it has been lost or overlooked.

These words will be read by a great many persons who have tried, or will one day try their luck at sending manuscripts to publishers. Let them send those manuscripts to the editor of the paper or magazine selected, and trust them to their own merits, for that is the test that will be ultimately applied to them by the editor.

THE VASSAR COLLEGE.

It is not long since we were talking of the singularly fascinating autobiography of Doctor Marie Zakrzewska, who, under remarkable difficulties, has gradually pushed up to a high and honorable and beloved position. But America means to be kinder to others than any country has been hitherto. As various duties are perfectly performed by them, the question whether they can possibly do them, and the imbecile sneer at "learned women," will sink into the proper contempt.

Here, for instance, is Matthew Vassar, a successful brewer, who has amassed wealth. He endowed a college for women with the princely sum of four hundred thousand dollars. It is to be near Poughkeepsie, a site has been selected, and the plans of a proper building approved. When the charter is obtained and the trustees selected the work will go forward, and every generous heart will cry, God speed!

It is not to be a charity school exclusively, but there will be payment required of all who are able to pay, and the establishment will have the others from the disadvantage of being considered charity scholars. This is a point that may be reconsidered. But the college so nobly endowed would be that all courses shall be open to all comers, upon the payment of an honorary fee. The best teachers will be comprehensive and various studies are included in the plan. Physiology, anatomy, as well as the natural sciences, mathematics, and languages, with their true value. In fact, it is intended that nothing shall be assumed about women's capacity or incapacity, but that the whole question shall demonstrate itself.

Mr. Vassar, like Mr. Cooper, does not leave his design to be executed after he is gone, but will himself see his plan develop as he intends. That his approach to perfection is nothing less than a University for women, and upon the most munificent foundation; and such are the monuments that are great benefactors of their species, and such the arguments by which the question, Whether art and literature and science can flourish without the patronage of the State? is answered. The City of New York, in the Astor Library and the Cooper Institute, and in the Central Park, has three answers to the question. The Smithsonian's gift to Baltimore and his institution at Danvers are further indications. The Lawrence School at Cambridge is another, and the Lowell Institute in Boston.

There is as yet no advantage to the individual citizen proved to be peculiar to any monarchical system; and he must have a dull view of the necessary intelligence of the system who does not see that it is precisely the one in which the most of every kind is secured to every person. It is the royal road and not the royal hand, that lays the corner-stones of so many of our most human enterprises.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE SYMPATHY OF HOLINESS.

On New-Year's Day the Pope received the French officers, and made some remarks to them which are of no consequence. But Henry Bulwer home informs us that "His Holiness also said that, in defending Gaeta, the French fleet serves a pious and holy cause."

The Pope's Holiness has heretofore always been regarded as something peculiar. He never by his own showing is of pretty much the same nature as the Holiness of the Bourbon dynasty of Naples. All right! The Holiness of the Inquisition does not by its own showing differ from the Holiness of the torture-chamber.

THE PARTING BETWEEN WISDOM AND FOLLY.

"It is a very strange thing, but has been true than singular—true, we may say, to a hair—that if a man puts his hair down the middle, we are unchastity apt to look upon him as a fool. But if he parts his hair down the side, we are generally inclined (and with equal want of charity, perhaps) to put him down as a clever woman.

"COUGH NO MORE!"

That a cough is very often made in the treatment of coughs, colds, and sessions quite as present as they are burdensome in families. The medicines prescribed for the relief of these distressing affections are generally sweetened, and, as a matter of consequence, nauseous. This is a great mistake. Instead of that, a cough mixture, especially if intended for children, ought to be rendered as nauseous as possible. Take of Compound Decoction of Aloes, Infusion of Senna, Tincture of Senna, Vinegar of Squills, and Tincture of Assafœtida equal parts. Mix. A teaspoonful or two of this mixture is to be taken whenever the cough is troublesome. Such is the influence of the human mind over the body, that if this mixture is rightly and rigorously administered, the most troublesome cough will, in many instances, very soon cease from troubling.

INNOCENCE.

We copy the following from a recent number of The Grandmother's Gazette: "A pretty little child, being asked by her godpapa where eaten grew, replied, with the greatest simplicity, in gentlemen's ears."

A TREMENDOUS BURST OF WIT.—A wretched plumber, trying to mend the plumber, says, in a fool-note, "Piping times, these!"

THE PRINCIPAL ORNAMENT that LADIES SHOULD WEAR AT A RIFLE BALL.—Bullets.

MOTTO FOR A HOMŒOPATHIC PHYSICIAN.

Nec sana, nec entira cura.
I neither understand, nor cure—eh! (Freely translated.)

Ned Shutter thus explained his reason for preferring to wear his stockings with holes to having them darned: "A hole," said he, "may be the accident of a day, and will pass upon the best gentleman; but a darn is premeditated poverty."

CROSS PROVERBS.—Prov. The more the merrier. Cross. Not so; one hand is enough in a purse. Prov. Nothing is hard to a willing mind. Cross. Yes, to get money. Prov. None so blind as they that will not see. Cross. Yes, they that can not see. Prov. Nothing but is good for something. Cross. Not so; nothing is not good for any thing. Prov. The world is a long journey. Cross. Not so; the sun goes it every day. Prov. It is a great way to the bottom of the sea. Cross. Not so; it is but a stone's cast.

WHY DON'T YOU RIDE, MISTER OUT?—A man, very much intoxicated, was taken to the station-house. "Why did you not hail him out?" inquired a by-stander of a friend. "Did him out?" exclaimed the other; "why, you could not pump him out!"

The importance of preserving a good reputation for truth and honesty is quite strikingly set forth in the following: A mortal fever prevailed on board ship at sea, and a negro man was pronounced by the doctor the bodies of those who died in a short time overboard. One day, when the captain was on deck, he saw the negro dragging out of the forecastle a sick man, who was violently struggling to extricate himself from the negro's grasp, and remonstrating very bitterly against the cruelty of which he feared mercy. "What are you going to do with that man, you black rascal?" said the captain. "Going to throw him overboard, massa, 'cause he dead."—"Dead, you scoundrel!" said the captain: "I tell you he is not dead, and speaks!"—"Yes, massa, I know he says he no dead, but he always lie so, nobody ever know when to believe him."

At a party a few evenings since, as a young gentleman passed Fruit was eating an apple in a quiet corner by himself, a young lady came up and gayly asked him why he did not share it with her. He good-naturedly handed her the, which was not bitten toward her, saying, "Here, take this apple."—"Oh, no, thank you," she exclaimed, backing all him archly. "I would rather have one that is not bitten."—"Then," said he, cut off to join the company, leaving poor Frost with a thaw in his heart.

A JOURNEY DOWN-HILL.—A gentleman lying on his death-bed was visited by his coachman, who had an old servant, and said, "Ah, Tom! I am going a long and rugged journey, John."—"I am sorry you drove me, Sir," said Sir," replied the fellow (he having been an indifferent musician), "never let that discourage you, for it's all downhill."

A NICE DISTINCTION.—A witness on a recent trial in one of the inferior courts testified that she had seen the respondent "tipsy," but denied that she had seen her "drunk." Upon being asked to define the difference between the two expressions, she said, "Why, a man is tipsy when he's very stupid," but tipsy only meant "not bright."

LORD ELDON.—It was the habit of Lord Eldon, when Attorney-General, to say, "It requires more than ordinary talents to be a successful counsel." Please your honor, I don't understand you."—"I say," what has she got?"—"Child and favor, please yer honor."

"IT BURNS ON THE BLOOD!"—A certain king had a son born to him. The astrologers predicted that he would lose his sight if he were permitted to see either the sun or a woman before he had completed his tenth year; on which account the king had him watched and brought up in dark caverns. As the years were elapsed he caused him to be brought out, and shown him the world, and placed before him many fine jewels and fair damsels—telling him the names of every thing, and that the damsels were demons. Being asked when he liked the best, he replied, "The damsels please me more than all the rest." The king then marveled greatly, saying, "What a powerful thing is hereditary!"

A blind man, led by a dog, while wandering in the streets of Paris, had his dog seized by some one passing; humanity opening his eyes he gave chase, overtaking the thief, cudgeled him severely; after which he closed his eyes and fell to begging again.

On one occasion, in the neighborhood of Hampstead Heath, a refractory driver was pommeling a miserable horse-laden knife-boree. Lord Erskine's sympathy provoked him to a remonstrance. "Why," said the fellow, "it's my own; mayn't I use it as I please?" And as he spoke, he raised a fresh shower of blows on the raw back of the beast. Lord Erskine, excessively irritated, laid on his walking-stick sharply over the shoulders of the offender, who, crouching and grumbling, asked him what business he had to break his stick. "Why," replied Erskine, to whom the opportunity of a joke was irresistible, "it is my own; mayn't I use it as I please?"

WIT AND WEALTH.

As Beauty's door of glass,
As Wit and Wealth once stood,
They asked of her which was most fair
She answered, "He who could."
Wit laid his key to Wealth's door,
To pass, but Wealth not do;
While Wit in a trice got in before,
And cut his bright way through.

"I'd just like to see you," as the blind man said to the policeman when he had him by the wrist to take him to the station-house if he did not move on.

A reverend sportsman was once boasting of infallible skill in finding a hare. "If," said a Quaker, who was present, "I were a hare, I would run into the field where I should be sure of not being disturbed by thee from the first of January to the last of December."

"Why, where would you go?"

"Into thy stable."

Talbots may not be a very terrible act of human beings, but we have seen many a military officer, who, although void of all conscious, is Quixotic's look his tailor's bill.

A boy not fond of fun and frolic may possibly make a tolerable man, but he is an intolerable boy.

THE LAW'S DELAY.—A few years ago a cargo of ice was imported into England from Norway. Not having such an article on the Custom-house schedules, application was made to the Treasury to the Board of Trade, and, after some little delay, it was decided that the ice should be entered as "dry goods;" but the whole cargo had melted before the decision was obtained.

SIMPLICITY.—A little girl of four years old was recently called as a witness in the Durham police-court, and, in answer to the question as to what became of the child who told lies, she innocently replied that they were sent to bed.

REFINED PHRASEOLOGY.—"You know, Madam, that you can not make a purse out of a sow's ear."—"Oh, Sir, please fan me. I have intimations of a swoon. When you use that odious expression of vulgarity again elucidate it in refined phraseology. Just say it is impossible to fabricate a pecuniary receptacle from the auricular organ of the soft sex of the genus swine."

Many persons are in advance of their age, but an old sould generally manage to be about ten years behind here.

ON THE LADIES' POND.

LIKE swallows darting through the sky,
Now here, now there, now far beyond,
Before the following wind we fly,
And skim along the Ladies' Pond.

Bright arabesques of eyes and hair
Around us ever changing wheel,
And the ice glitters every where
With fairy feet and twinkling steel.

From fur-caps, where rich tassels sweep,
And hoods with fluttering ribbons dressed,
Bright, glowing girlish faces peep
Like robin redbreasts from a nest.

And all is gayety and mirth—
The women's laughter sounds like song;
And I'm the happiest man on earth
As side by side we sweep along.

One small hand to my shoulder clings,
My arm around her waist I fold;
The friendly wind that follows flings
Across my cheek her curls of gold.

I see my rival by the gate—
He follows us with sullen eye;
I care not for his futile hate,
I do not heed his scowl—not I.

For not an hour ago I heard
One sweet, sweet word, and felt a hand
That, timid as a little bird,
Crept into mine—you understand.

So let him scowl—I do not mind;
I'm far too happy now to hate.
Come, dearest, on before the wind,
And leave him standing by the gate.

CAPTAIN J. G. FOSTER, ENGINEER CORPS U.S.A., ON DUTY AT FORT SUMTER.

CAPTAIN FOSTER, U.S.A.

We give above, from a photograph, a portrait of Captain JOHN G. FOSTER, United States Army, second in command at FORT SUMTER, Charleston, South Carolina.

The family of JOHN G. FOSTER has ever been distinguished for its patriotism and valor. His grandfather, in company with the gallant Benjamin Pierce (father of ex-President Pierce), then quite young, was among the first to join the Massachusetts line in the War of the Revolution, and was often commended for his noble conduct on the field of battle. His father, Major Perley Foster, was in active service during the war of 1812, and was in the battle of Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain. The subject of our sketch was born in Whitefield, New Hampshire, May 27, 1833, from which place his family moved to Nashua when he was eight years of age. He early evinced a passionate love for the profession of arms, and formed and commanded a "juvenile artillery company." In 1849 he entered West Point, where he graduated with distinguished honors in his class, in 1846, as Brevet Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers. In January, 1847, he was ordered to Mexico, with General Scott, as a Lieutenant in a Company of Sappers and Miners, and was in all the engagements from "Vera Cruz" to "Molino del Rey." At the latter place he was severely wounded while leading a division of the storming party in the deadly assault on "Casa Mata," where two-thirds of the entire command were cut down, and where he narrowly escaped death from the Mexican bayonet, by the memorable charge of the gallant Cadwalader. For his gallant conduct in Mexico he received three brevets—the first at Contreras, the second at Churubusco, and the last at Molino del Rey, where he was brevetted as captain.

The severity of his wound was such that amputation was thought to be necessary, as a large escopet ball had struck him below the knee, in front, fracturing the bone, and lodging beneath the skin on the opposite side; but he stoutly persisted in retaining his limb, which, though greatly injured, is still sufficient to enable him to do active service. After recovering somewhat from his injuries he was ordered to Fort Carroll (Baltimore); from thence to Washington City, in Coast Survey Office.

From this position he was sent to West Point, as Assistant-Professor in Engineering; and subsequently to the Government works on Sandy Hook. Two years ago he was ordered to Charleston, South Carolina, as Engineer in charge of the forts in Charleston harbor and vicinity, to repair and complete the same.

After the evacuation of Fort Moultrie by Major Anderson, Captain Foster spiked the guns, burned the carriages, and blew up the flag-staff. When the fort was taken possession of by the South Carolina troops he was allowed to make a peaceable departure for Fort Sumter, in a boat, with the laborers under his direction.

Captain Foster is thirty-seven years of age, light complexion, blue eyes, over six feet in height, and weighing over two hundred pounds.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE "NIAGARA" AT JEDDO, JAPAN.

WE publish herewith a picture of the arrival of the United States steamer Niagara in the harbor of Jeddo, Japan, on 10th November ult., with the Japanese Embassy on board. A letter from Jeddo, dated 14th, says:

"The Japanese Embassy have arrived, all well. The United States steamer Niagara, Captain W. W. McKean commanding, which left New York on the 20th of June with the Japanese Embassy, arrived at this port on the 10th inst., one hundred and thirty-two days from New York, including thirty days' stoppage at the different ports on the way. She stopped two days at Puerto Grande, nine at Lunalo, ten at Batavia, and nine at Hong Kong; making her actual running time one hundred and two days, besides fourteen hours gained by the 214 degrees of longitude made since leaving New York.

"Soon after the Niagara anchored, the United States steamer Sanjonne came up from Kanagawa and went some two miles nearer shore, and anchored in three fathoms water, being about as far as Captain Schenck dared to go. During the morning all the men of the ship were engaged in hoisting out Japanese baggage, which was put into Japanese boats, and, along with its owners, taken on shore. By eleven o'clock nearly all the heavy and valuable baggage was out, and all the Japanese except the ambassadors and three of the lower officials were on shore.

"Now commenced the ceremony of the ambassadors leaving the ship, which was first by the sailors taking off their jackets and manning the yards. The marines were drawn up on the quarter-deck, opposite the starboard gangway, the captain and all the officers, with their swords, cocked hats, epaulets, etc., were arranged from the gangway down to the poop deck, when the ambassadors came out of their cabin, came down the steps off the poop, and walked along according to their rank, Simme-Bujen ahead, shaking hands with each officer as they passed along, the marines presenting arms, and the band playing 'Auld Lang Syne,' as they went over the gangway.

"When the boat, which was called the imperial barge, but which was a poor specimen of royalty, was leaving, a minister's salute (seventeen guns) was fired; at the last gun the sailors on the yards gave three hearty cheers, which was responded to by the ambassadors in the boat by waving their fans three times.

"The Japanese went ashore in their own boats and in their own way, at their request; the ship offered to take them ashore in its own boats, but they declined."

THE OLD INDIAN AGENCY AT DES MOINES, IOWA.

"To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"DES MOINES, IOWA, January 15, 1861.

"I SEND you, as a historical relic peculiar to the West, an ambrotype, by M. H. Bisbard, of the old Indian Agency building, which is about to be torn down because it comes in the way of the extension of one of our streets. This building is a log-cabin of a 'story and a half' high, weather-boarded, and containing two rooms below and one above. Here all the business with the Indians was transacted during the three years intervening between the time of the treaty at Agency (which was near the western line of the first cession of land made by the Sac and Fox Indians after the Black Hawk war), when their remaining lands in Iowa were ceded to the general government, till their title expired.

"The house is now within the corporate limits of Des Moines, formerly Fort Des Moines, and stands about a mile from the city, at the southeastern limit of the grove in which it (the city) is located. It is situated on elevated ground, on the south side of the road leading to Iowa City, the former capital of the State, and faces to the northwest. The ground falls abruptly, just back of the building, a short distance, and then slopes to the shore of Spring Lake, beyond which the prairie extends eastward three miles to a belt of timber (the extreme back-ground of the picture), known as Four-Mile Timber, from a stream of that name along which it grows. The white streaks across the picture back of the house show the snow on the places where the fire last fall burned off the weeds and grass, whereby the snow is permitted to be seen in all its unflecked whiteness.

"Many of our citizens would be glad to see this relic enshrined in the pages of the Weekly, so that themselves and children in the future may be able to see the resemblance of one of the landmarks which bore so important a part in the early history of our city and the surrounding territory."

CHAPTER XVII.

IT was in the fourth year of my apprenticeship to Joe, and it was a Saturday night. There was a group assembled round the fire at the Three Jolly Bargemen, attentive to Mr. Wopsle as he read the newspaper aloud. Of that group I was one.

A highly popular murder had been committed, and Mr. Wopsle was imbrued in blood to the eyebrows. He gloated over every abhorrent adjective in the description, and identified himself with every witness at the Inquest. He fainly moaned, "I am done for," as the victim, and he barbarously bellowed, "I'll serve you out," as the murderer. He gave the medical testimony, in pointed imitation of our local practitioner; and he piped and shook as the aged turnpike-keeper who had heard blows, to an extent so very paralytic as to suggest a doubt regarding the mental competency of that witness. The coroner, in Mr. Wopsle's hands, became Timon of Athens; the beadle, Coriolanus. He enjoyed himself thoroughly, and we all enjoyed ourselves, and were delightfully comfortable. In this cozy state of mind we came to the verdict, Wilful Murder.

Then, and not sooner, I became aware of a strange gentleman leaning over the back of the settle opposite me, looking on. There was an expression of contempt on his face, and he hit the side of a great forefinger as he watched the group of faces. "Well!" said the stranger to Mr. Wopsle, when the reading was done, "you have settled it all to your own satisfaction, I have no doubt?"

Every body started and looked up, as if it were the murderer. He looked at every body coldly and sarcastically.

"Guilty, of course?" said he. "Out with it. Come!"

"Sir," returned Mr. Wopsle, "without having the honor of your acquaintance, I do say Guilty." Upon this we all took courage to unite in a confirmatory murmur.

"I know you do," said the stranger; "I knew you would, I told you so. But now I'll ask you a question. Do you know, or do you not know, that the law of England supposes every man to be innocent until he is proved—proved—to be guilty?"

"Sir," Mr. Wopsle began to reply, "as an Englishman myself, I—"

"Come!" said the stranger, biting his forefinger at him. "Don't evade the question. Either you know it or you don't know it. Which is it to be?"

He stood with his head on one side, and himself on one side, in a bullying, interrogative manner, and he threw his forefinger at Mr. Wopsle—as it were to mark him out—before biting it again.

"Now!" said he. "Do you know it, or don't you know it?"

"Certainly I know it," replied Mr. Wopsle.

"Certainly you know it. Then why didn't you say so at first? Now I'll ask you another question;" taking possession of Mr. Wopsle, as if he had a right to him. "Do you know that none of these witnesses have yet been cross-examined?"

Mr. Wopsle was beginning, "I can only say—" when the stranger stopped him.

"What? You won't answer the question, yes or no? Now I'll try you again. Throwing his finger at him again. "Attend to me. Are you aware, or are you not aware, that none of these witnesses have yet been cross-examined? Come, I only want one word from you. Yes or no?"

Mr. Wopsle hesitated, and we all began to conceive rather a poor opinion of him.

"Come!" said the stranger, "I'll help you. You don't deserve help, but I'll help you. Look at that paper you hold in your hand. What is it?"

"What is it?" repeated Mr. Wopsle, eying it, much at a loss.

"Is it," pursued the stranger in his most sarcastic and suspicious manner, "the printed paper you have just been reading from?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Undoubtedly. Now turn to that paper and tell me whether it distinctly states that the prisoner expressly said that his legal advisers instructed him altogether to reserve his defense?"

"I read that just now," Mr. Wopsle pleaded.

"Never mind when you read just now, Sir; I don't ask you when you read. You may read the Lord's Prayer backward, if you like—and, perhaps, have done it before to-day. Turn to the paper. No, no, no, my friend; not to the top of the column; you know better than that; to the bottom, to the bottom." (We all began to think Mr. Wopsle full of subterfuge.) "Well? Have you found it?"

"Here it is," said Mr. Wopsle.

"Now follow that passage with your eye, and tell me whether it distinctly states that the prisoner expressly said that he was instructed by his legal advisers wholly to reserve his defense? Come! Do you make that of it?"

Mr. Wopsle answered, "Those are not the exact words."

"Not the exact words!" repeated the gentleman, bitterly. "Is that the exact substance?"

"Yes," said Mr. Wopsle.

"Yes" repeated the stranger, looking round at the rest of the company with his right hand extended toward the witness, Wopsle. "And now I ask you what you say to the conscience of that man who, with that passage before his eyes, can lay his head upon his pillow after having pronounced a fellow-creature guilty, unheard?"

We all began to suspect that Mr. Wopsle was not the man we had thought him, and that he was beginning to found out.

"And that same man, remember," pursued the gentleman, throwing his finger at Mr. Wopsle heavily; "that same man might be summoned as a juryman upon this very trial, and, having thus deeply committed himself, might return to the bosom of his family and lay his head upon his pillow, after deliberately swearing that he would well and truly try the issue joined between Our Sovereign Lord the King and the prisoner at the bar, and would a true verdict give according to the evidence, so help him God?"

We were all deeply persuaded that the unfortunate Wopsle had gone too far, and had better stop in his reckless career while there was yet time.

The strange gentleman, with an air of authority not to be disputed, and with a manner expressive of knowing something secret about every one of us that would effectually do for each individual if he chose to disclose it, left the back of the settle, and came into the space between the two settles, in front of the fire, where he remained standing: his left hand in his pocket, and he biting the forefinger of his right.

"From information I have received," said he, looking round at us as we all quailed before him, "I have reason to believe there is a blacksmith among you, by name Joseph—or Joe—Gargery. Which is the man?"

"PIP'S A GENTLEMAN OF FORTUN', THEN," SAID JOE, "AND GOD BLESS HIM IN IT!"

"Here is the man," said Joe.

The strange gentleman beckoned him out of his place, and Joe went.

"You have an apprentice," pursued the stranger, "commonly known as Pip? Is he here?"

"I am here!" I cried.

The stranger did not recognize me, but I recognized him as the gentleman I had met on the stairs on the occasion of my second visit to Miss Havisham. His appearance was too remarkable for me to have forgotten. I had known him the moment I saw him looking over the settle, and now that I stood confronting him with his hand upon my shoulder, I checked off again in detail, his large head, his dark complexion, his deep-set eyes, his bushy black eyebrows, his large watch-chain, his strong black dots of beard and whisker, and even the smell of scented soap on his great hand.

"I wish to have a private conference with you two," said he, when he had surveyed me at his leisure. "It will take a little time. Perhaps we had better go to your place of residence. I prefer not to anticipate my communication here; you will judge as much or as little of it as you please to your friends afterward; I have nothing to do with that."

Amidst a wondering silence we three walked out of the Jolly Bargemen, and in a wondering silence walked home. While going along, the strange gentleman occasionally looked at me, and occasionally bit the side of his finger. As we neared home, Joe, vaguely acknowledging the occasion as an impressive and ceremonious one, went on ahead to open the front door. Our conference was held in the state-parlor, which was feebly lighted by one candle.

It began with the stranger gentleman's sitting down at the table, drawing the candle to him, and looking over some entries in his pocket-book. He then put up the pocket-book, and set the candle a little aside: after peering round it into the darkness at Joe and me, to ascertain which was which.

"My name," he said, "is Jaggers, and I am a lawyer in London. I am pretty well known. I have unusual business to transact with you, and I commence by explaining that it is not of my originating. If my advice had been asked, I should not have been here. It was not asked, and you see me here. What I have to do, as the confidential agent of another, I do. No less, no more."

Finding that he could not see us very well from where he sat, he got up, and threw one leg over the back of a chair, and leaned upon it; thus having one foot on the seat of the chair, and one foot on the ground.

"Now, Joseph Gargery, I am the bearer of an offer to relieve you of this young fellow, your apprentice. You would not object to cancel his indentures, at his request and for his good? You would not want any thing for so doing?"

"Lord forbid that I should want any thing for not standing in Pip's way!" said Joe, staring.

"Lord forbidding is pious, but not to the purpose," returned Mr. Jaggers. "The question is, Would you want any thing? Do you want any thing?"

"The answer is," returned Joe, sternly, "No."

I thought Mr. Jaggers glanced at Joe as if he considered him a fool for his disinterestedness. But I was too much bewildered between breathless curiosity and surprise to be sure of it.

"Very well," said Mr. Jaggers. "Recollect the admission you have made, and don't try to go from it presently."

"Who's a going to try?" retorted Joe.

"I don't say any body is. Do you keep a dog?"

"Yes, I do keep a dog."

"Bear in mind, then, that Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Bear that in mind, will you?" repeated Mr. Jaggers, shutting his eyes and nodding his head at Joe, as if he were forgiving him something. "Now I return to this young fellow. And the communication I have got to make is, that he has great expectations."

Joe and I gasped, and looked at one another.

"I am instructed to communicate to him," said Mr. Jaggers, throwing his finger at me, sideways, "that he will come into a handsome property. Further, that it is the desire of the present possessor of that property that he immediately removed from his present sphere of life and from this place, and be brought up as a gentleman—in a word, as a young fellow of great expectations."

My dream was out; my wild fancy was surpassed by sober reality; Miss Havisham was going to make my fortune on a grand scale.

"Now, Mr. Pip," pursued the lawyer, "I address the rest of what I have to say to you. You are to understand first, that it is the request of the person from whom I take my instructions, that you always bear the name of Pip. You will have no objection, I dare say, to your great expectations being encumbered with that easy condition. But if you have any objection, this is the time to mention it."

My heart was beating so fast, and there was such a singing in my ears, that I could scarcely stammer I had no objection.

"I should think not! Now you are to understand, secondly, Mr. Pip, that the name of the person who is your liberal benefactor remains a profound secret until the person chooses to reveal it. I am empowered to mention that it is the intention of the person to reveal it at first hand by word of mouth to yourself. When that intention may be carried out I can not say; no one can say. It may be years hence; even many years. Now, you are distinctly to understand that you are most positively prohibited from making any inquiry on this head, or any allusion or reference, however distant, to any individual whomsoever as the individual in all the communications you may have with me. If you have a suspicion in your treacherous breast, keep that suspicion in your own breast. It is not the least to the purpose what the reasons of this prohibition are; they may be the strongest and gravest reasons, or they may be mere whim. That is not for you to inquire into. The condition is laid down. Your acceptance of it, and your observance of it as binding, is the only remaining condition that I am charged with, by the person from whom I take my instructions, and for whom I am not otherwise responsible. That person is the person from whom you derive your expectations, and the secret is solely held by that person and by me. Again, not a very difficult condition with which to encumber such a rise in fortune; but if you have any objection to it, this is the time to mention it. Speak out."

Once more I stammered with difficulty that I had no objection.

"I should think not! Now, Mr. Pip, I have done with stipulations." Though he called me Mr. Pip, and began rather to make up to me, he still could not get rid of a certain air of bullying suspicion; and even now he sternly shut up both his eyes and threw his finger at me while he spoke, as much as to express that he knew all kinds of things to my disparagement, if he only chose to mention them. "We come next to mere details of arrangement. You must know that, although I have used the words 'expectations' more than once, you are not endowed with expectations only. There is already lodged in my hands a sum of money amply sufficient for your suitable education and maintenance. You will please consider me your guardian. Oh! I'll make you a handsome allowance, I'll tell you at once I am paid for my services, or I shouldn't render them. It is considered that you must be better educated in accordance with your altered position, and that you will be left to my discretion as to the character of the establishment for that advantage."

I said I had always longed for it.

"Never mind what you have always longed for, Mr. Pip," he retorted; "keep to the record. If you have any to say, you may say so. Am I answered that you are ready to be placed at once under some proper tutor? Is that it?"

I stammered, yes, that was it.

"Good. Now your inclinations are to be consulted. I don't think that wise, mind, but it's my trust. Have you ever heard of any tutor whom you would prefer to another?"

I had never heard of any tutor but Biddy and Mr. Wopsle's great-aunt; so I replied in the negative.

"There is a certain tutor, of whom I have some knowledge, who I think might suit the purpose," he said this Jaggers, "if I could recommend him, observe; because I never recommend any body. The gentleman I speak of is one Mr. Matthew Pocket."

Ah! I caught at the name directly. Miss Havisham's relation. The Matthew whom Mr. and Mrs. Camilla had spoken of. "The Matthew whose place was to be at Miss Havisham's when she lay dead in her bride's dress on the bride's table."

"Now, what's the name?" said Mr. Jaggers, looking shrewdly at me, and then shutting up his eyes while he waited for my answer.

My answer was, that I had heard of the name.

"Oh!" said he, "You have heard of the name. But the question is, what do you say of it?"

I said, or tried to say, that I was much obliged to him for his recommendation—

"No, my young friend!" he interrupted, shaking his great head very slowly. "Recollect yourself!"

Not recollecting myself, I began again that I was much obliged to him for his recommendation—

"No, my young friend," he interrupted, shaking his head and frowning and smiling both at once; "no, no, no; it's very well done, but it won't do; you are too young to fix me with it. Recommendation is not the word, Mr. Pip. Try another."

Correcting myself, I said that I was much obliged to him for his mention of Mr. Matthew Pocket—

"That's more like it!" cried Mr. Jaggers.

—And (I added,) I would gladly try that gentleman.

"Good. You had better try him in his own house. The way shall be prepared for you, and you can see his son first, who is in London. When will you come to London?"

I said (glancing at Joe, who stood looking on in moderation), that I supposed I could come directly.

"First," said Mr. Jaggers, "you should have some new clothes to come in, and they should not be working clothes. Say this day week. You'll want some money. Shall I leave you twenty guineas?"

He produced a long purse, with the greatest coolness, and counted them out on the table and pushed them over to me. This was the first time he had made his leg from the chair. He got sat astride of the chair when he had pushed the money over, and sat swinging his purse and eyeing Joe.

"Well, Joseph Gargery? You look dumbfoundered?"

"I am," said Joe, in a very decided manner.

"It was understood that you wanted nothing for yourself, remember?"

"It were understood," said Joe. "And it are understood. And it ever will be similar according."

"But what," said Mr. Jaggers, swinging his purse, "what if it was in my instructions to make you a present, as compensation?"

"As compensation what for?" Joe demanded.

"For the loss of his services."

Joe laid his hand upon my shoulder with the touch of a woman. I have often thought him since like the amiable hammer, rather than a man or pat an egg-shell, in his combination of strength with gentleness. "Pip is that hearty welcome," said Joe, "to go free with his services to honor and fortun', as no words can tell him. But if you think as Money can make compensation to me for the loss of the little child—what comes to me forge—and ever the best of friends!" O dear, good Joe, whom I was so ready to leave and so unthankful to, I see you now, with your muscular blacksmith's arm before your eyes, and your broad chest heaving, and your voice dying away. O dear good faithful tender friend, I feel the loving trouble of your hand upon my arm as solemnly this day as if it had been the rustle of an angel's wing!

But Joe resented Joe at the time. I was lost in the mazes of my future fortunes, and could not retrace the by-paths we had trodden together. I laughed Joe to be contemned, for (as he said) we had ever been the best of friends, and (as I said) we ever would be so. Joe scooped his eyes with his disengaged wrist, as if he were going to use gardening tools, but said not another word.

Mr. Jaggers had looked on at this as one who was recognized in Joe the village idiot, in me his keeper. When it was over, he said, weighing in his hand the purse he had ceased to swing, "Now, Pip, is there anything more to be said? your last chance. No half measures with me. If you mean to take a present that I have it in charge to make to you, say so, and you shall have it. If, on the contrary, you mean to say—I Here, to his great amazement, he was stopped by Joe's suddenly working round him with every demonstration of a determination to speak.

"Which I meantersay," cried Joe, "that if you come into my place bull-baiting and badgering me, comes Pip's fortun' or comes not, comes if you're a man, come on! Which I meantersay that what I say I meantersay, and stand or fall by it!"

I drew Joe away, and he immediately became placable; merely stating to me, in an obliging manner, and not at all addressing any notice to any one whom it might concern, that he was not a-going to be bull-baited and badgered in his own place. Mr. Jaggers had risen when Joe demonstrated, and was standing at the door. Without exercising any inclination to come in again, he there delivered his valedictory remarks. They were these:

"Well, Mr. Pip, I think the sooner you leave here—as you are to be a gentleman—the better. Let a stand for this day week, and you shall receive my printed address in the mean time. You can take a hackney-coach at the stage-coach office in the village, and come straight to me. Understand that I express no opinion, one way or other, on the trust I undertake. I am paid for undertaking it, and I do so. Now, understand that, finally, I make no stipulations!"

He was throwing his finger at both sides, and I think would have gone on, but for his seeming to think Joe dangerous if provoked.

Something came into my head which induced me to run after him, as he was going down to the Blue Boar, and overtake him as he was getting into a chaise.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Jaggers."

"Halloa!" said he, facing round, "what's the matter?"

"I wish to be quite right, Mr. Jaggers, and to keep to your directions; so I thought I had better ask. Would it be my obligation to keep my taking leave of any one I know about here before I go away?"

"No," said he, looking as if he hardly understood me.

"I don't mean in the village only, but up-town."

"No," said he. "No objection."

I thanked him and ran home again, and there I found that Joe had already locked the front door, and was standing sentinel in the forge-work before the fire, and Joe sat next Biddy, and I sat next Joe in the corner opposite my sister. The more I looked into Joe's face, and took the more incapable I became of looking at Joe; the longer the silence lasted the more unable I felt to speak. At last I brought I got out, "Joe, have you told Biddy?"

"No, Pip," returned Joe, still looking at the fire, and holding his knees tight, as if he had private information that they intended to make off somewhere, "which I left it to yourself, Pip."

"I would rather you told, Joe."

"Pip's a gentleman, sure-ly!" said Joe, "and Joe's blest him in it!"

Biddy dropped her work and looked at me. Joe held his hands and looked at me. I looked at both of them. After a pause they both heartily congratulated me; but there was a certain touch of coldness in their congratulations that I rather resented.

I took it upon myself to impress Biddy (and through Biddy, Joe) with the grave obligation I considered my friends under, to know nothing and say nothing about the maker of my fortune. It would all come out in good time, I observed, and in the mean while nothing was to be said save that I had come into great expectations from a mysterious patron. Biddy nodded her head thoughtfully at the fire as she took up her work again, and said she would be very particular; and Joe, still detaining his knees, said, "Ay, ay, I'll be elevatedly partickler, Pip;" and then they congratulated me again, and went on to express so much wonder at the notion of my being a gentleman that I didn't half like it.

Infinite pains were then taken by Biddy to convey to my sister some idea of what had happened. To the best of my belief those efforts entirely failed. She laughed and nodded her head a great many times, and even repeated after Biddy the words "Pip" and "Property." But I doubt if they had any meaning in them than an election cry, and I can not suggest a darker picture of her state of mind.

I never could have believed it without experience, but as Joe and Biddy became more at their cheerful ease again I became quite gloomy. Dissatisfied with the share of course I could not be; but it is possible that I may have been without quite knowing it, dissatisfied with myself.

Any how, I sat with my elbow on my knee and my face upon my hand, looking into the fire, as those two talked about my going away, and about what they should do when I was gone, and all that. And whenever I caught one of them looking at me, though never so pleasantly (and they often looked at me tenderly enough), I felt in a manner offended: as if they were expressing some mistrust of me. Though Heaven knows they were welcome to all I had.

At those times I would get up and look out at the door; for our kitchen door opened at once upon the road, and was often open on summer evenings to air the room. The very stars to which I then raised my eyes, I am afraid I took to be fine enough for my fortunes. Glittering on the rustic objects among which I had passed my life.

"Saturday night," said I, when we sat at our supper of bread-and-cheese and beer. "Five more days, and then the day before the day! They'll soon go."

"Yes, Pip," observed Joe, whose voice sounded hollow in his beer mug. "They'll soon go."

"Soon, soon go," said Biddy.

"I don't like to be thinking, that when I go down town on Monday, and order my new clothes, I shall tell the tailor that I'll come and put them on there, and that I'll have them sent to Mr. Pumblechook. It would be very disagreeable to be stared at by all the people here."

"Mr. and Mrs. Hubble might like to see you in your new clothes, Pip," said Joe, industriously cutting his bread, with his cheese on it, in the palm of his left hand, and glancing at my mistaken aspect of mind for the time when he used to compare slices. "So might Wopsle. And the Jolly Bargemen might take it as a compliment."

"That's just what I don't want, Joe. They would make such a business of it—such a coarse and common business—that I couldn't bear myself."

"Ah, that indeed, Pip!" said Joe. "If you couldn't abear yourself—"

Biddy asked me here, as she sat holding my sister's plate, "Have you thought about when you'll show yourself to Mr. Gargery, and your sister, and Biddy. You will show yourself to us, won't you?"

"Biddy," I returned, with some resentment, "you are unusually quick that it's difficult to keep up with you."

("She always were quick," observed Joe.)

"If you had waited another moment, Biddy, you would have seen for yourself that I shall bring my clothes here in a bundle one evening—most likely on the evening before I go away."

Biddy said no more, and I felt sorry for giving her, I soon exchanged an affectionate good-night with her and Joe, and went up to bed. When I got into my little room, I found that it looked like a mean little room that I should soon be parted from and raised above, forever. I was furnished with fresh young remembrances too, and even at the same moment I fell into much the same confused division of mind between it and the better rooms to which I was going, that I had felt often between the forge and Miss Havisham's, and Biddy and Estella.

The sun had been shining brightly all day on the roof of my attic, and the room was warm. As I put the window open and stood looking out, I saw Joe come softly forth at the dark door below, and take a turn or two in the air; and then I saw Biddy come and bring him a pipe and light it for him, and then recommence her work. and it seemed to hint to me that he wanted comforting, for some reason or other.

He presently stood at the door immediately beneath me, looking down at it, and Biddy stood there too, quietly talking to him, and I knew that they talked of me, for I heard my name mentioned in a loving tone by both of them more than once. I would not have listened for more, if I could have heard more; so I drew away from the window when I had seen my pipe smoked out, and sat down in my chair by the bedside, feeling it very sorrowful and strange that this first night of my bright fortunes should be the darkest I had ever known.

Looking toward the window, I saw light wreaths from Joe's pipe floating there, and I fancied it was like a blessing from Joe—not obtruded on me or paraded before me, but pervading the air we shared together. I put my light out and crept into bed; and it was an uneasy bed now, and I never slept the old sound sleep in it any more.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Friday, 25th January, the Senate was engaged on private bills.——In the House, the report of the Special Committee of Thirty-three again occupied attention. Messrs. Nelson of Tennessee, and Leake of Virginia, making the principal speeches. Mr. Branch of Mr. Nelson was replied to by Mr. Taylor.

On Saturday, 26th, the Senate not being in session, in the House leave was granted to Mr. Grow to introduce a resolution instructing the Select Committee of Five to inquire as to the existence of any secret organization in the District of Columbia, the object of which is the seizure of the Capitol and other Federal buildings, and whether any officer of the city or of the Federal Government is a member thereof. The resolution met with considerable opposition, but it finally passed under the operation of the previous question. Mr. Thomas, of Tennessee, presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of that State, in favor of the Crittenden Compromise, and Mr. Morgan, of New York. They assert that the people of Tennessee will unite with the South in resisting invasion at all hazards. Consideration of the report by the Committee of Thirty-three was then resumed, and speeches were made by Messrs. Clark of Missouri, Adams of North Carolina, and Alley of Massachusetts. Mr. Gilmer made a telling speech in favor of a new convention of the Missouri Compromise.

On Monday, 28th, in the Senate, various petitions and memorials in reference to the national troubles were presented. Senator Brown, of Georgia, then announced the secession of his State from the Union, and the consequent withdrawal of himself and his colleague from the Senate. Senator Bigler presented the resolutions of the State of Pennsylvania in reference to the crisis; after which a message was received from the President, accompanying the resolutions of the State of Virginia, tendered with a view to making a motion to print the Message, made a speech in reference to the proposition of Virginia to act as a mediator between the North and the South, in which he deprecated the present spirit of recrimination. He was followed by Senator Hemphill, of Texas, who introduced upon the part of his State to leave the Union, notwithstanding the peaceful character of the Message, which he admitted.——In the House a crowd of petitions was presented relating to the crisis. The Committee on the District of Columbia was instructed, on motion of Mr. Hughes, of Maryland, to inquire into the expediency of reincorporating a portion of the District of Columbia to that State. Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, introduced a bill, which was referred to the Judiciary, under a suspension of the rules, more effectually to organize the militia of the States of the Union. After some time the House was instructed to consider the expediency of repealing the 3d section of the 1st article of the Supreme Court rules. Thirty-three was then considered, and Mr. Pryor, of Virginia, made a long and able speech in vindication of the right of secession. At the conclusion of his remarks the House went into committee, on motion of Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, and the Kansas bill was finally passed over. The Senate immediately entering the lows of the United States, besides locally inapplicable, are the new State, and establishing a judicial district. The Special Committee of five on the President's Message, on the 29th inst., were given permission leave to sit during the recess of the House, and to report from time to time such matters as they deem of sufficient importance.

On Tuesday, 29th, in the Senate, the Pacific Railroad Bill took another important step forward. Amendments proposed were acted upon, and the bill was reported complete. The most important amendment proposed yesterday was one offered by Senator Gwin, of California, to provide for a central route only, which was lost—25 to 12. In the House, Mr. Pike introduced a bill authorizing the Government to employ volunteers, and Mr. Wilson, the militia of the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Military Committee.——The House was principally occupied in consideration of the report of the Committee of Thirty-three, and speeches were made by Messrs. Stevens of Pennsylvania, Hardin of Maryland, Winslow of North Carolina, and Van Wyck of New York.

On Wednesday, 30th, in the Senate, the Pacific Railroad bill was read a third time, and passed by a vote of 34 against 14. A number of petitions and memorials relating to the national troubles were presented. The bill to provide for a territorial government for the Territory of Jefferson was taken up and occupied attention until the adjournment. A motion to change the name to Idaho was adopted.——In the House, the Speaker presented a communication from Mr. Clingman, of Alabama, announcing the passage of the Secession Ordinance by that State. Mr. Cobb did not leave at the same time with his colleague a few days since, but protracted his visit until he received a certified copy of the Ordinance of Secession. He was present in the House yesterday, and made a forcible speech, in which he appealed to the Republicans to do something to remedy the evils. After some further unimportant consideration of the report of the Special Committee of Thirty-three on the crisis, and speeches were made by Messrs. Conkling of New York, Stevenson of Kentucky, Diamond of Ohio, and Morris of Pennsylvania, in the midst of Mr. Conkling's remarks a message was received from the President, announcing that he had signed the bill for the admission of Kansas. Mr. Martin F. Conway, the Representative from Kansas, then subsequently made his appearance, presented his credentials, and took the oath of allegiance.

On Thursday, 31st, in the Senate, Senator Seward gave another expression to his views in regard to the condition of the country, on the occasion of the presentation by him to the Senate of the memorial petition from the citizens of New York, praying for the preservation of the Union in its difficulties. The petition is signed by 63,000 persons, and is very numerously attached, each sheet having thereon the Senate Chamber. His remarks were of a conciliatory character. Senator Seward was followed by Senator Mason, in a speech in which he accused the former of advocating coercion. Senator Seward responded, and a somewhat lengthy colloquy ensued between the gentlemen. Senators Douglas, Hale, Nicholson, and others followed.——In the House a bill was presented by Mr. Morehead, of Pennsylvania, to prevent the counterfeiting of private stamps, labels, etc. The Judiciary Committee was instructed to inquire whether Mr. Conway, of Kansas, has been legally elected to Congress. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were considered in Committee of the Whole. After reporting the bill back to the House, the establishment of a Naval coaling station at Chirriqui was debated for some time. But no vote was taken, the subject being referred to allow Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, to make a speech on the part protected. Adjourned over Thursday.

THE COMMERCIAL STATUS OF SECEDING PORTS.

Lord Lyons and other foreign ministers at Washington having written to the British Government to inquire whether duties can be paid to and clearances issued by the Government of South Carolina, Mr. Black, on the 24th inst., replied to Lord Lyons, and sent a copy of his letter to Messrs. Dallas and Adams. He said he did not feel called upon to communicate before the President, who would deeply regret that any step should happen to the exclusion of open or friendly nations, and especially that the British subjects and interests should be affected by the secession of those existing there. Secretary Black quotes from the laws to show that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government to impose duties on goods entered into the United States and collect the duties is exclusive. Whether the state of things will justify the interference of war he will not decide, but a sufficient reason for not executing the penalties incurred by the British subject, is a seeming doubt that there is no necessity for raising until it practically arises. Such duties are now collected in the peaceful ports. Secretary Black regrets that this consideration compels him to decline giving any opinion on the point presented. The Treasury Department, he says, will give public information as to the condition in which South Carolina has put the coast.

CAN A SECEDING MEMBER USE THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE?

Mr. Ashmore, member of Congress from South Carolina, has addressed a letter to acting Postmaster General King asking if he has the right to exercise the franking privilege, as he has some ten or twelve hundred documents upon which he does not feel willing to pay postage, and which documents would be useless unless he can frank them.

Postmaster King replied that according to the theory of the administration South Carolina was still in the Union, and hence he has a right to frank until the first Monday in December next. If, however, he regards South Carolina as out of the Union, it is a question with himself whether he can consistently exercise that privilege, the use of which could be an admission that he does not in his conscience consider that she is out of the Union, and that he is still a member of the Congress of the United States.

DISHONORABLY PUNISHMENTS TO BE REMOVED.

The following letter has been published:

"POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, APPOINTMENT OFFICE, }
January 15, 1861. }

"SIR,—In answer to the inquiry in your letter of the 15th to the Postmaster-General, he instructs me to inform you that you were removed from the office of Postmaster at Paducah because you announced yourself as 'decently in favor of Disunion;' and it is not considered prudent to retain in the service of the Government men openly seeking its overthrow.

"I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"A. HUGH KERR, ESQ., } "First Assistant Postmaster-General.
"John C. Noble, Esq., Paducah, Kentucky."

THE POSTAL SERVICE IN THE SECEDING STATES.

Applications continue to be received at Washington from postmasters in the seceded United States for supplies of stamps, blanks, wrapping-paper, etc.; but these are forbidden on the condition that the postmasters will acknowledge and conform to the laws affecting the postal service.

THE REVENUE CUTTERS.

When General Dix entered office he ordered immediate precautions to save the revenue cutters in the South from being seized by secessionists, as far as practicable. Orders were sent that the line under repair at Gatewood should be blown up in case it could not be successfully defended. If attacked. Instructions concerning the Robert M. Lee-land, which is under the control of the Collector at New Orleans, and one of the finest in the service, were prevented its seizure and conversion against the Government.

THE SECESSION OF LOUISIANA.

A telegram, dated Baton Rouge, January 26, states: "The delay ordinance, moved to be substituted for the secession ordinance reported by the Committee of Fifteen, was voted down yesterday by an immense majority. Commissioners Manning, of South Carolina, and Wilson, of Alabama, made eloquent appeals in favor of immediate secession. There was an animated debate last night on the resolution for submitting the secession ordinance to ratification to the people. The advocates of immediate secession maintained that it did debase, as there was no extreme opposition to the ordinance.

"The vote on submitting the ordinance to the people was taken this morning—ayes 85, nays 54. John Perkins addressed the Convention in the pass against the secession ordinance. The debate closed, and a vote was ordered. The galleries and lobbies were immediately crowded, and a deathlike silence prevailed. On the call of the roll many members were in tears. The Chief Justice announced the votes—ayes 113, nays 17—and the President declared Louisiana a free and sovereign republic.

"Judge Bullard has entered the Convention with a Pelican flag, accompanied by Governor Moore and staff, and put the flag in the hands of the President amidst tremendous excitement. A solemn prayer was then offered, and a hundred guns fired. The Convention adjourned sine die to meet in New Orleans on the 29th inst.

"Before the Convention adjourned the resolution accompanying the ordinance, declaring the right of free navigation of the Mississippi and the common use of it to all friendly States, and the right of egress and ingress to boats of the Mississippi valley, to Seceded States and Powers, was unanimously. A gold pen was given each member with which to sign the ordinance of secession.

"The State Convention has adjourned, to reassemble in New Orleans."

A CONVENTION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

A telegram, dated Raleigh, North Carolina, January 30, says: The House concurred to-day in the Senate's amendments to the bill calling a State Convention. The bill, therefore, has finally passed both Houses. It puts the question of "Convention or No Convention" to the people. Delegates are to be elected at the same time. Federal affairs are left out, and the election is ordered to take place on the 28th of February.

THE GEORGIA CONVENTION.

A telegram, dated Milledgeville, January 29, says: The Convention refused to reconsider the revenue ordinance adopted yesterday. Resolutions were introduced giving the Governor power, under certain circumstances, to grant letters of marque and reprisal, and authorizing the issue of the citizens of the State and the world, giving the causes of Georgia's secession, was adopted. An ordinance declaring it to be the right of the people to be guaranteed the security of all the States was adopted. The Convention adjourned to meet at Savannah at the call of the President.

THE LEGISLATURE OF TEXAS.

A telegram, dated New Orleans, January 30, says: "Dates from Austin, Texas, to the 26th inst., are received. The Texas Legislature had remained firm, and Governor Houston had sent in his Message. He favors the calling of a State Convention. Both Houses had voted to repeal the Kansas Resolutions passed by the Legislature in 1858. The House took up and passed Senate bill directing the Governor to proceed to Washington and receive $10,000 due the State. A resolution had unanimously passed the House that the Federal Union Government has no power to coerce a sovereign State after pronouncing for secession from the Union. The Senate will pass the same resolution by a similar vote. The Legislature favors the secession of Texas by nearly a two-thirds majority of three to one."

Another letter, dated Austin, January 24, says:

"The Legislature to-day passed resolution repudiating the idea of using force as a means to secure existing State rights, and asserting that any such attempt would be resisted to the last extremity.

"Only one-fifth of the members of the House opposed immediate secession. It is expected that the question of secession will be referred to the people."

THE ALABAMA CONVENTION ON THE SLAVE-TRADE.

The Alabama Convention has adjourned until the 4th of March. Previous to the adjournment, it is understood, the Convention, by a large majority, passed resolutions instructing the delegates to the Montgomery Convention to oppose the reopening of the African Slave-trade.

THE ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

At ten minutes past two o'clock, on January 30, the Private Secretary of the President announced to the United States House of Representatives that the name of James Buchanan had been appended to the bill admitting Kansas into the Federal Union as a State. A deputy minister of then Martin F. Conway, representative-elect from the new State, was in attendance with the pen and took his seat. He was immediately congratulated by Mr. Parrish, delegate from the Territory, whose seat ceased where Mr. Conway's commenced, and by other members. The new member then telegraphed the fact of assent to Kansas, and the State Government will go into immediate operation.

The following are the State officers of Kansas elected under the Wyandotte Constitution, and who will assume to administer the new State Government: Governor, Charles Robinson, formerly of Massachusetts; Lieutenant-Governor, J. P. Root, formerly of Connecticut; Secretary of State, C. W. Babcock, formerly of Pennsylvania; Treasurer, William Tholen, formerly of New York; Auditor, George W. Hillyer, formerly of Ohio; Superintendent of Public Instruction, W. R. Griffith, formerly of Illinois; Chief Justice, Thomas Ewing, Jun., formerly of Ohio; Associate Justices, Samuel A. Kingman, formerly of Connecticut, and Lawrence Bailey, formerly of New Hampshire.

SEIZURE OF THE MARINE HOSPITAL AT NEW ORLEANS.

Information was received by the Government on 30th, from the Collector at New Orleans, stating that the barracks about two miles below New Orleans, now occupied as a marine hospital, were taken possession of on the 11th by Captain Bradford, of the State Infantry, in the name of the State of Louisiana.

There were two hundred and sixteen invalids and convalescent patients in the hospital at the time it was seized. The officer in charge of the station immediately removed the sick to the convalescents, and those who were confined to their beds as soon as practicable. This action on the part of the authorities of that State was regarded by the Government as most outrageous and inhuman. The Government had no authority or means to make provision for these poor creatures, who were thus thrown upon the cold charities of the people of that State. The reason assigned for this transaction was, that the authorities there wanted the quarters for their own troops.

REMONSTRANCE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The following is Secretary Dix's letter to the Collector of New Orleans, dated 29th ult.:

"SIR,—I did not receive until the 26th inst. news of the 14th, informing me that Captain Bradford had taken the city of New Orleans, which have for several months been occupied as a marine hospital, and its cannon upon the mission of in the name of the State of Louisiana. I found inclosed a copy of the letter of Captain Bradford of the 1st Louisiana Infantry, advising you that he had taken possession of the barracks; that they would be required for the Louisiana troops, and requesting you to immediately remove those patients who are convalescent, and as to those who are unable to do the relief surgeon, it may be practicable and humane, then take who are now under the charge.

"It also states that the barracks contained 216 invalid and convalescent patients in this transaction, as an outrage to the public authority, I have no occasion to say that I have not been authorized to communicate in any manner with the character of the people of the United States, and that you are not authorized to do more than hold the station of the Government of Louisiana. I send a telegraphic dispatch to you yesterday, and had a conversation with him against the inhumanity of Captain Bradford's order, and to ask him to retract it. But if he should decline to interfere, I instructed you in regard to the removal and treatment of the sick and wounded. I trust you will carry out my instruction; not merely with "economy," but with a careful regard to their helpless condition. The order is given, and there was no occasion for any delay in the instant. Captain Bradford's letter is dated the 13th, and reaches me at the end of the 26th, and you are subject until the 26th. I infer from the newspaper paragraphs you have published that you have not received the public order matter show to be of a later date than your letter, that the letter was not dispatched from Baton Rouge on the 13th. I hope I am mistaken, and that the cause of that delay is to be found in the unwillingness of persons in the way. It should otherwise have great reason to be dissatisfied that the instructions of the Government are not communicated. From the tone of the newspaper paragraph you inclosed, it is evident that the State authorities are not aware of the usage of humanity, which in open war between contending nations, and even in the most revengeful civil wars between kindred races, always have been held sacred from disturbance as edifices dedicated to the care and comfort of the sick. I fear this is not the case, but I wish to be respected. You will, therefore, have no more money expended on the barracks than is necessary to make valid for repairs, until I can have the assurance that she will not be seized or occupied in any way that will interfere with service of those who are seeking to break up the Union, and overthrow the Government. I am, very respectfully,

Secretary Dix, in reply to his telegraphic dispatch, has received the following reply from Collector Haich:

"NEW ORLEANS, January 29, 1861.

"Affairs satisfactorily arranged; barracks retained; see my letter of 24th."

THE FORTS AT THE TORTUGAS.

Captain Meigs, who commands the United States forces in the fort at Tortugas, writes to the Government that he is now sufficiently reinforced to defy any power.

While the Government continues to send troops and supplies, the steamer Galveston, of New Orleans, with a force on board, left Key West on the morning of the 24th, bound upon discovering the steamer, and probably understanding the object of her visit, she returned to port without any demonstration other than to put shoes and disappear.

It is also stated that Fort Taylor, at Key West, is well manned and provisioned.

FORT MONROE.

A telegram, dated Richmond, January 29, says: Recent proceedings at Fort Monroe have exhibited public feeling. The following was adopted at a large meeting last night:

Whereas, the Legislature has formally declared that any act of coercion against a seceding State will be regarded by Virginia as an act of war, and resisted with all the means at her command:

Resolved, That the attention of the Legislature be hereby called to the fact of the threat of coercion now actually being perpetrated at Fortress Monroe.

THE DEFENSE OF PENSACOLA.

A Washington correspondent says: "The steamer Brooklyn has probably joined the Macedonian at Pensacola. She should attack be made on Fort Pickens, which is not now improbable within a short time, considering the advice of portion distant from the scene, those vessels will co-operate with Lieutenant Slemmer in the defense. Although it is supposed here he would be able successfully to maintain his position without such assistance."

SEIZURE OF ANOTHER REVENUE CUTTER.

A New Orleans correspondent telegraphs that the revenue cutter Lewis Cass has been seized by the State Louisiana secessionists.

THE BLOCKADE OF CHARLESTON HARBOR.

The Government has issued the following official notice of "blockade" of Charleston harbor:

"NOTICE TO MARINERS.

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT OFFICE, LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD, }
January 26, 1861. }

"Information has been received at this office that the light-vessel at Charleston bar has been withdrawn; that the lights on Morris Island and at the entrance into the port of Charleston, including the Ship Channel, are extinguished; the buoys removed, and the main channel so obstructed as to be unsafe for navigation. By order,

"A. D. BACHE, Superintendent."

WHY MAJOR ANDERSON DID NOT FIRE ON THE CHARLESTON BATTERIES.

The following letter from Major Robert Anderson, written in Fort Sumter, to a friend in this city (says the Cincinnati Commercial), a few days after he and his Christmas fired upon the Star of the West, embodies the first authentic information received from the gallant officer upon the reasons for the fact that the batteries of Fort Sumter were not opened upon the South Carolinians on the 9th inst.:

"FORT SUMTER, JAN. 11, 1861.

"Whether a bloodless separation can now be effected, or whether the Carolina chivalry will insist on a sweet bearing our flag, the other day, I think very doubtful. I was sorely grieved at the late affair; but, perhaps fortunately for the chance of having matters settled without bloodshed, as I could not have touched those guns opened upon her, and my defenses were just then in such a condition that I could not have prevented it. I am now nearly ready. The people have supposed that this work was ready to be occupied two months ago. It was far from it—and it would take me, even now, one week's hard work to put it in a defensible state. I have now but only about one-eighth of what it should be in time of war; but, though not ready, I feel strong in the belief that a force that can be brought against me will guard and guide me safely through any danger that may threaten.

"Yours sincerely, ROBERT ANDERSON."

HOW FORT SUMTER IS TO BE TAKEN.

Floating batteries, the superstructure of which are composed of cotton bales, are in course of erection, by which means in port the South Carolinians expect to attack Fort Sumter. The officer who writes from Fort Sumter, alluding to these batteries, says: "The difference between fighting behind cotton bags in 1812 and now is, that Colonel Jackson commanded behind the bags then, and had no Robert Anderson within the impregnable walls of a Sumter, with the destructive weapons which the ingenuity of man for the 19th century has invented, to contend with. Besides, I don't."

The same writer in another connection says: "We have been wonderfully favored by Providence in all our movements. We abandoned Moultrie under cover of night by all of a vessel chartered to take the soldiers' wives, twenty-five in number, to a safer place. When the captain discovered the intention of Major Anderson he became rebellious, but was soon sent below and locked up until we were safely landed at Sumter. Our night's work was crowned by a glorious sunrise. The men were all summoned around the flag-staff, and the stars and stripes were run up, and the Chaplain invoked God's blessing to rest upon our little band, and upon the work of our enemy's defence, and in defending the national honor and flag. I shall never forget it. Then we had been assailed on that day by any considerable force it is doubtful if we could have held out, as the fort was in a miserable condition for defence. But the Almighty heard our prayers. A storm came up and lasted ten days. It was so terrific that the sea, that of a boisterous day, usually would dash far above and over us. During those ten days no vessel could approach us. The enemy's force in order so that at the end of the storm we could have defied any power on earth."

MAJOR ANDERSON DENIED FRESH PROVISIONS.

Notwithstanding the repeated assurances given that the garrison of Fort Sumter was properly supplied with provisions, and had free communication with Charleston, Major Anderson's correspondence explicitly contradicts these declarations. Governor Pickens of that State, and not Major Anderson, has complained. Major Anderson measurably declined that offer, as one calculated, if not intended, to compromise him by establishing relations which he was forbidden by his instructions to recognize. Supposing that the authorities really intended to relax the Moultrie-Sumter blockade, Anderson remarked, he wrote to the contractor who supplied his command when at Fort Moultrie, requesting that supplies should be sent as formerly. No answer was received, and Major Anderson has not obtained a single pound of fresh beef or any thing else from the city. His garrison is subsisting upon the same salt provisions and other articles of subsistence alone as a rate which must demand replenishment before long.

MRS. SLEMMER ARRESTED AS A SPY.

The Montgomery Mail of January 26 has received from a letter from one of Captain O'Hara's company, now at Pensacola, to his friend in Montgomery, wife of Lieutenant Slemmer, commander at Fort Pickens, had been arrested at Fort Barrancas as a spy. It is alleged that she was in the habit of communicating intelligence between them and the reasonable supposition was that she had come there to take notes of the position of things and report them to her husband.

INSTRUCTIONS TO NEW ORLEANS PILOTS.

According to the New Orleans Picayune, the Balize pilots are in a tight place. Under the orders of the Governor of Louisiana, who claims to be getting ready to emulate the action of Governor Pickens, the pilots are forbidden to bring any American vessel of war. The True Delta says that a correspondent of the Balize writes: "If a vessel of war, bearing the American flag, should overhaul a pilot-boat in the Gulf, the pilots will be forbidden by the State to go on board the vessel of war, or the pilot-boat and all hands will be seized. The pilots will also go on board the vessel of war the next probability is that his attention will be called to the matter, and he will undoubtedly think that if he does not do his duty faithfully he will have to do it himself. So that he is not playing the Balize pilots in a tight box we don't know what is."

MR. LINCOLN'S POSITION.

The Herald correspondent at Washington correspondent: "I learn from a gentleman who had an interview with Mr. Lincoln, at Springfield, within the past week, that he is fully conversant with the existing state of affairs, expressed himself as follows: 'I will suffer death before I will consent or advise my friends to consent to any concession or compromise which looks like buying the privilege to do my duty.' And this Administration, by which we have a constitutional right; because, whatever concessions may be made by the present Congress or before Congress, I should regard any concession in the face of menace to the Government as unconstitutional, and a consent on all hands that our system shall be brought to the level of a mere temporary arrangement which any change in the majority of the people may change in the affairs in Mexico. But this thing will hereafter be as it is now—in the hands of the people of they desire to call a Convention to remove any grievances complained of, or to give new guarantees for the permanence of vested rights it is not mine to prevent."

HIS JOURNEY TO WASHINGTON.

A Springfield correspondent says: "It is now positively stated Mr. Lincoln will leave for Washington on the 11th of February. He will go hence via Lafayette to Indianapolis, and there he will address the Legislature of the Indiana Legislature; thence he will proceed, probably, by way of Cincinnati to Columbus, Cleveland, Buffalo and Albany. From Albany he intends to make for Harrisburg, and then on to Washington. The time allotted for Lincoln's tour to New York and Philadelphia is not impossible.

Mr. Lincoln's friends here say that the way things are making. No military escort will be accepted. The reception, however, is expected to be made loudest of ten days. The Presidential party will start a few days after Mr. Lincoln's departure, under the protection of some friends so as to reach Washington simultaneously with him."

PERSONAL.

The first duel which has resulted from the present political disturbances took place on Saturday morning, on the Pennsylvania border, between Dr. Jones, a partisan of Senator Douglas, and Mr. Hastings, a Breckinridge Democrat, both residents of Washington. Wilson was wounded in the leg. The difficulty arose from the late approval of the parties.

The gallantry exhibited by the wife of Lieutenant Slemmer, at Pensacola, is creating quite a lively sensation in Washington, and a new paper is about to issue a testimonial in her behalf is in contemplation.

It is believed that Governor H. Stephens, of Georgia will be chosen provisional President of the new Confederacy, and that Jefferson Davis will be Commander-in-Chief of the army.

In reply to an address published in the Richmond, Virginia Commercial, to the people of the South, relative to delegates to the State Convention, Hon. J. M. Botts publishes a letter in which he declares that he now holds. He is prepared to insist upon every jot or tittle of right to which Virginia can demand under the Constitution, but he will never consent to make the existence or destruction of the Government depend upon any abstract or impracticable question that may or may not arise, outside of the Constitution, such as new projects for the extension of Slavery by Constitutional amendment, in all territories hereafter acquired, south of the line of 36° 30' under Mexico, South America or the Sandwich Islands. Yet he would not shrink from any duty or responsibility, but perhaps fortunately for the chance of having matters settled without bloodshed, if I could not have touched those guns that opened upon her, and my defences were just then in such a condition that I could not have prevented it. I am now nearly ready. The people have supposed that this work was ready to be occupied two months ago. It was far from it—and it would take me, even now, one week's hard work to put it in a defensible state. I have now but only about one-eighth of what it should be in time of war; but, though not ready, I feel strong in the belief that a force that can be brought against me will guard and guide me safely through any danger that may threaten.

"Yours sincerely, ROBERT ANDERSON."

HOW FORT SUMTER IS TO BE TAKEN.

Floating batteries, the superstructure of which are composed of cotton bales, are in course of erection, by which means in port the South Carolinians expect to attack Fort Sumter. The officer who writes from Fort Sumter, alluding to these batteries, says: "The difference between fighting behind cotton bags in 1812 and now is, that General Jackson commanded behind the bags then, and had no Robert Anderson within the impregnable walls of a Sumter, with the destructive weapons which the ingenuity of man for the 19th century has invented, to contend with. Besides, I don't."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE CASE OF ANDERSON.

Mr. James having applied to the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster for a writ of habeas corpus directed to Anderson, now in London, their lordships retired to consider their judgment, and after an absence of twenty minutes they returned into court. The Lord Chief Justice then delivered the following judgment: "We have carefully considered this matter, and the result of our anxious deliberation is that we think the writ ought to issue. We feel sensible, at the same time, of the inconvenience this may result from the exercise of such an authority. We feel sensible that it may be thought inconsistent with the higher degree of colonial independence, both legislative and judicial, which has been happily brought into effect in modern times. At the same time, in establishing local legislative and local judicial authority, the Legislature of England has not gone so far as expressly to take away any power with which the Court of Westminster Hall might otherwise have referred to the issue of the writ of habeas corpus. And we find that the existence of the jurisdiction in these courts has been asserted by the highest times, and exercised down to the latest. We find it asserted not only as a matter of practice, but carried into effect as a matter of practice, that even where there is an independent local jurisdiction established by a legislative enactment it would suffice to deprive us of the authority which was conferred upon us by the prerogative of the liberty of the subject. We feel, therefore, we should not be doing right under the circumstances of this case if we refused to issue the writ."

There was a slight manifestation of applause in court on the conclusion of the delivery of his lordship's judgment.

HIS ESCAPE SECURED.

The London Post of the 30th ult., in discussing the case of Anderson, the Canada fugitive, illustrates the English method of enforcing the stipulations of the Ashburton treaty. It says: "In regard the freedom of Anderson as a matter already secured. He must be brought to this country; and, as was once here, the people of England will take good care that he is not removed in the tender mercies of the sanguinary Missouri slave code.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR ON SKATES.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald, writing on the 15th, gives the following account of the manner in which the Emperor sustains himself. The Emperor Napoleon arrived at the lake in the Bois de Boulogne about three o'clock, and, in a plain chariot drawn by two horses, and unattended by any escort, he alighted from his carriage and crossed the lake on his skates. He was soon recognized by the many wearing blouses, who raised a cry of "Here is the Emperor! Vive l'Empereur!" The cry attracted universal attention, and every body ran and every body cheered. The Emperor continued to skate, occasionally taking off his hat and bowing recognition he met with. The Emperor seeing a child in a sledge, drawn by a large animal, took the reins out of the servant and drove the sledge. Having amused himself for about half an hour in this manner, he suddenly gave a holiday than an Emperor, he left as quietly as he came. There were several fashionably dressed English ladies among the skaters.

PRUSSIA.

THE NEW KING'S SPEECH.

The Prussian Parliament has been opened on the 14th ult. by the King in person, who made a speech on the occasion, in which, that the relations between the great Powers had been made more friendly by the recent meetings which had taken place among the sovereigns, and expressed a hope that the steps taken by Germany for the settlement of the question concerning the constitution of the Germanic Confederation would be successfully maintained without any result. This question he emphatically styled Prussia, and the people of Germany, felt is a national duty to bring to a settlement.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.

The Monitenr says the following: "A letter from Berlin announces that the recruiting, which does not usually take place before the month of October, will this year commence in April. This hasty mobilization is attributed to the events which may arise on account of the complications existing in Italy. It is not only in Prussia, and a many that the possibility of a conflict on account of the Roman question has attracted the attention of the public. In-mark the same feeling prevails."

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald writes: "The preparations going on in Prussia are believed to have a far more serious than any possible reference to a complication with Denmark—that of war with 'the enemy' which throughout Europe means the Emperor of the French."

ITALY.

COURAGE OF THE YOUNG QUEEN.

A correspondent, writing from Gaeta, says that the young wife of Francis II. is always to be seen in the place of greatest danger. On the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th and 25th of December, two officers of her household were killed on the spot by her side, which she received by the explosion of a shell. Although the danger was imminent, and the explosion of the shell near her chamber caused by the removal of the dead bodies in the coolest possible manner, the Queen remained and also a number of ladies, and as he was lying in bed he received the rather unpleasant visit of a round shot, which passed the washing-stand quite opposite.

SPAIN.

ANNEXATION OF SANTIAGO TO SPAIN.

A late number of the Epoca, of Madrid, has the following:

The English papers contain a number of letters from Lisbon, which speak of the publication of pamphlets, the object of which is to agitate the union of the Iberian peninsula as a necessity of the new condition of Spain. We are surprised that the English press should go so far as to say that these projects meet with a terrible resistance in Portugal, and that if any Power in Europ should favor them, England would oppose it with all her might.

This new agitation is the work of a party, which says—but a pamphlet is circulating in that capital, favoring the annexation of Portugal to Spain—is believed there that this work, although printed in Paris, was originated in Lisbon, and that it represents the ideas of a party of no mean influence.

TURKEY.

DEMORALIZATION AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

A letter from Europe says: "A young lady of acquaintance has just returned from a six months' stay at Constantinople. By her account nothing can exceed the fraud, peculation, corruption, and uncertainty that are seen daily on the banks of the Bosphorus. This last-mentioned vice is carried to the highest pitch. Along with two eunuchs to guard her, and she laughed a little at the idea of her being in danger in the open streets. This was reported by the eunuchs, and the next morning a present arrived from one of the wives mentioned in the highest bidder. One of the daughters of the Sultan, by one of the earliest wives, was married to a Pasha, who was not being the sort of a man he was taken for, he was sent off to Egypt, and the daughter came to stay at the Dary Jones. In three or four days another husband was found for the damsel; it is to be hoped he was more pliant. All the male children of the Sultan's daughters are at once put out of existence, as their presence might some time get up embarrassing claims to the throne. Not unfrequently a young lady will be called for at the Seraglio by her husband, and when she has been there several days her parents or guardians receive a message to the effect that some one wants to speak to her. As it is the highest indecorum to say nothing and runs to the door. She is at once seized, gagged, and carried off by several men, and never heard of again."

CHINA.

THE LOOT OF THE PALACE.

A correspondent of the London Times at Pekin says that the estimate of the property pillaged and destroyed at the Emperor's summer palace exceeds $5,000,000 sterling. Among the articles which were destroyed by the mere wantonness of destruction, were the gems gold, and gems of great value, in the possession of many of the men,

INTERIOR OF FORTRESS MONROE, VIRGINIA.

THE HARBOR OF PENSACOLA.

THE chart on page 88 will enable our readers to understand the newspaper accounts of the position of affairs at Pensacola. Fort Pickens, the heaviest Fort in the harbor, which occupies to the other Forts the same position that Sumter does to Moultrie and Pinckney at Charleston, is in the hands of the United States troops, being held by Lieut. Slemmer of the Army, with some 80 men. Under its guns lie the United States sloop Wyandotte and a Revenue Cutter. Opposite Fort Pickens, and at a distance of about one mile and a half, stands a water battery known as Fort M'Rae; further along the shore stands Fort Barrancas, and further on still is the Pensacola Navy Yard. All of these are held by the Florida and Alabama troops, who are commanded by Major Chase, late of the United States Army.

The Pensacola Observer of the 15th ult. gives the following account of the surrender by Commodore Armstrong of the Pensacola Navy Yard. The demand was made by Colonel Lomax, commanding the State troops, in the name of Governor Perry, of Florida:

"Commodore Armstrong responded substantially that he had devoted nearly the whole of his long life to the public service of his country; that he had loved and protected its flag in sunshine and in storm; that his heart was then bleeding over the contemplation of the distracted condition of the American Union; that he was a native of Kentucky, which had no navy, and therefore knew not where he should go to make a livelihood in his declining years; that he had no adequate force to make resistance, and that if he had, notwithstanding the foregoing considerations, he would prefer the loss of his own life to the destruction of the lives of his fellow-countrymen. His voice trembled with emotion as he closed his brief and affecting remarks by the announcement that he relinquished his authority to the representative of the sovereignty of Florida.

"The order was immediately given by Captain Renshaw, Flag-Officer, to haul down the flag of the Union, which was done; and in lieu thereof is another flag with thirteen alternate stripes of red and white, and blue field, with a large white star, emblazoning the changed political condition of our State.

"Every thing was conducted in the most orderly and respectful manner, attended with a degree of solemn interest which was manifested upon the countenances of hundreds of citizens and soldiers present.

"Captain Randolph was placed in command of the yard, and Colonel Lomax took possession of Fort Barrancas and quarters, where he remains stationed, immediately opposite and in full view of Fort Pickens, occupied by the United States troops, with the old flag of the Union flying in the breeze upon its frowning walls. The spiked guns, fifteen in number, in Fort Barrancas, have been repaired, by drilling, for effective use.

"We omitted to mention that the magazine, containing a large amount of ammunition, was taken by a detachment of troops as soon as the command arrived at the yard.

"Lieutenant Slemmer, when he evacuated Fort M'Rae, destroyed about 150 kegs of powder, by knocking out the heads and throwing them into the bay. His object apparently to be only to keep the guns from the fort being opened upon him while he retreated, as he left a large quantity of powder in the magazine. He not only spiked the guns, but rammed down the muzzles the wooden pieces used for stopping them, which had to be bored out by pump borers by our forces before they could be used. They have all been unspiked with the exception of two, and are now ready for use."

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.

ON 4th February the delegates to the first Constituent Assembly of the Southern Confederacy meet at Montgomery, Ala. We accordingly present on page 88 a picture of the principal street of that city, showing the State Capitol, in which the deliberations of the Assembly will take place. Montgomery is a pretty city of some nine or ten thousand inhabitants, situated on the River Alabama. It does a lively business in cotton, and its mart is one of the most important of the secondary markets of the South. It is expected that Montgomery will become the capital of the Southern Confederacy.

FORT MONROE, VIRGINIA.

IN our last Number we gave a view of the sea battery of Fort Monroe; we now present the interior of that work, taken from the top of the gateway. Fort Monroe, as every body knows, commands the port of Norfolk. It stands at the mouth of the James River; in summer time it is a place of fashionable resort by sea-bathers, and the parapets of the Fort is crowded every evening with gay promenaders. The Fort itself is one of the largest in the United States, being one mile in circumference. It has lately been the scene of much activity. The garrison has been strengthened, and new guns mounted; so that now the Fort is in a condition of defense.

VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI.

We publish on page 89 a view of the city of Vicksburg, Mississippi, where a battery was recently erected by the Mississippians, with a view to prevent the navigation of the Mississippi by vessels carrying United States troops. Vicksburg is a pretty town of some 5000 inhabitants; it is 400 miles from New Orleans, and is the seat of a flourishing cotton trade.

When the battery was first erected it was placed above the city; but the position was afterward changed, as we learn from the following paragraph in the Vicksburg Whig of 16th:

"The position of the military companies having been changed to below the steamboat landing, down-stream boats will not be required to stop above the city. Captains should bear in mind that they will not be permitted to pass down without making a landing here, and not get below the starboard with their boats before indicating their intention of stopping. As boats seldom pass here without landing, they will add no trouble in complying with the above."

The people of the West, who were not a little concerned at this interference with the navigation of their great river, were probably somewhat relieved by the following passage in the last Message of Governor Pettus, of Mississippi:

"I further recommend that the most prompt and efficient measures be adopted to make known to the people of the Northern States that peaceful commerce on the Mississippi River will be neither interrupted or annoyed by the authorities or people of Mississippi. Such, in my opinion, will materially aid in preserving peace between the Northwestern and the Southern States, if it can be preserved."

THE GRAY WOMAN.

[CONCLUDED.]

THE blacksmith's forge was in a shed beside the house, and fronting the road. I heard the hammers sing to the ring their continual rhythmical beat. She had seen why they ceased. A rider had come up to the forge and dismounted, leading his horse in to be shod. The broad red light of the forge-fire had revealed the face of the rider to Amante, and she apprehended the consequence that really ensued.

The rider, after some words with the blacksmith, was ushered in by him into the house-place where we sat.

"Here, good wife, a cup of wine and some galette for this gentleman!"

"Any thing, any thing, Madame, that I can eat and drink in my hand while my horse is being shod. I am in haste, and must get on to Forbach to-night."

The blacksmith's wife lighted her lamp; Amante had asked her for it five minutes before. How thankful we were that she had not more speedily complied with our request! In a way, we sat in flusk shadow, pretending to stitch away, but scarcely able to see. The lamp was placed on the stove, near which my husband, for a chill, was stood and warmed himself. By-and-by he turned round and looked all over the room, taking us in with about the same degree of interest as he bestowed on the furniture. Amante, cross-legged, fronting him, stooped over her work, whistling softly all the while. He turned again to the stove, impatiently rubbing his hands. He had finished his wine and galette, and wanted to be off.

"I am in haste, my good woman. Ask my husband to get on more quickly. I will pay him double if he makes haste."

The woman went out to do his bidding, and he once more turned round to face us. Amante went on to the second part of the tune. He took it up, whistled a second for an instant or so, and then the blacksmith's wife re-entering he moved toward her, as if to receive her answer the more speedily.

"One moment, Monsieur—only one moment. There was a nail out of the off-fore shoe which my husband is replacing; it would delay Monsieur again if that shoe also came off."

"Madame is right," said he, "but my haste is urgent. If Madame knew my reasons she would pardon my impatience. Once a happy husband, now a deserted and betrayed man, I pursue a wife on whom I lavished all my love, but who has abused my confidence, and fled from my house, doubtless to some paramour, carrying off with her all the jewels and money on which she could lay her hands. It is possible Madame may have heard or seen something of her; she was accompanied in her flight by a base, profligate woman from Paris, whom I, unhappy man, had myself engaged for my wife's waiting-maid, little dreaming what corruption I was bringing into my house!"

"Is it possible?" said the good woman, throwing up her hands.

Amante went on whistling a little lower, out of respect to the conversation.

"However, I am tracing the wicked fugitives; I am on their track" (and the handsome effeminate face looked as ferocious as any devil's). "They will not escape me; but every minute is a minute of misery to me till I meet my wife. Madame has sympathy, I am not?"

He drew his face into a hard, unnatural smile, and then both went out to the forge, as if once more to hasten the blacksmith in his work.

Amante stopped her whistling for one instant.

"Go on as you are, without change of an eyelid even; in a few minutes he will be gone, and it will be over!"

It was a necessary caution, for I was on the point of giving way, and throwing myself weakly upon her neck. We went on; she whistling and stitching, I making semblance to sew. And it was well we did so; for almost directly he came back for his whip, which he had laid down and forgotten; and again I felt one of those sharp, quickscanning glances sent all round the room, and taking in all.

Then we heard him ride away; and then—it had been long too dark to see well—I dropped my work and gave way to my trembling and shuddering. The blacksmith's wife returned. She was a good creature. Amante told her I was cold and weary, and she insisted on my stopping my work and going to sit near the stove. So over my agitation Amante stopped her whistling and began to talk; and by the time the blacksmith came in she and the good woman of the house were in full flow. He began at once upon the handsome gentleman who had paid him so well; all his sympathy was with him, and both he and his wife quite forgot the knight overhead in their wife, and punish her as she deserved. And then the conversation took a turn not uncommon to those whose lives are quiet and monotonous; every one seemed to vie with each other in telling about some horror; and the savage and mysterious band of robbers called the Chauffeurs, who infested all the roads leading to the Rhine, with Schinderhannes at their head, furnished many a tale which made the very murrow of my bones run cold, and caused me even more than that of talking. Her eyes grew large and wild, her cheeks blanched, and for once she sought by her looks help from me.

Then I felt that my part was to control me. I rose and said, with their permission my husband and I would seek our bed, for that we had traveled far and were quite tired. I added that we would get up betimes, and finish our piece of work. The blacksmith said we should be early birds if we rose before him; and the good wife seconded my proposal with kindly haste. We could tell a story as those they had been relating, and I do believe Amante would have fainted.

On a low truckle bed we set her up; we arose and finished our work betimes, and shared the plentiful breakfast of the family. Then we had to set forth again. We came on night to a small town, with a good large rumbling inn in the very centre of the principal street. We took our supper in the dismal common room. We found company, and demanded in German French to be taken to some private apartment. We heard that she and her maid had come to the house, and driven off from pride, poor young lady! she had avoided all association with her fellow-passengers, thereby exciting their ridicule and dislike. We had little pieces of hearsay had a significance to us afterward, though at the time the only remark made that bore upon the future was Amante's whisper to me that the young lady's hair was exactly the color of mine, which she had cut off and burned in the stove in the miller's kitchen in one of her descents from our bedroom to the inn fire.

As soon as we could we struck round in the shadow, leaving the boisterous and merry fellowpassengers to their supper. We crept into the court, borrowed a lantern from the hostler, and scrambled up the rude steps to our chamber above the stable. There was a ladder to it, but the entrance was the hole into which the ladder fitted. The window looked into the court. We were tired and soon fell asleep. I was awoke by a noise in the stable below. One instant of listening, and I awakened Amante, placing my hand on her mouth, to prevent any exclamation in her half-crossed state. We heard my husband's voice ordering about the to the hostler. It was his voice. I am sure of it. Amante said so too. We durst not move to rise and satisfy ourselves. We durst not even be seen on giving directions. Then he left the stable, and softly stealing to our window we saw him cross the court and re-enter the inn. We were quite at a loss what we should do. We feared to excite remark or suspicion by descending and leaving our chamber, or else should have done so on the unconscious idea. Then the hostler left the stable, locking the door on the outside.

"We must try and drop through the window—if, indeed, it is worth while to go at all," said Amante.

With reflection came wisdom. We should excite suspicion by leaving without paying our bill. We were on foot, and might easily be overtaken. So we sat on our bed's edge, talking and shivering, while from across the court the laughter rang merrily, and the noise of feasting and drinking by one, their lights flitting past the windows as they went up stairs, and settled each one to their rest.

In the stable we heard the hostler let cautious step crossing the yard. Amante looked out, but dared not speak a word. We heard the great door into the street open—no pause for mounting, and the horse's footsteps were lost in distance.

After that we fell sound asleep. We slept long and late. We were wakened by many hurrying feet and many confused voices; all the world seemed awake and astir. We rose and dressed ourselves, and coming down we looked around among the crowd collected in the court, in order to be sure ourselves as was not there before we left the shelter of the stable.

The court was never seen two or three people rushed to us.

"Have you heard?—Do you know?—That poor young lady!—Oh, it is terrible!" and so we were hurried, almost in spite of ourselves, across the court and up the great open stairs of the main building of the inn, into a bedchamber, where lay the beautiful young German lady, so full of graceful pride the night before, now white and still in death. By her stood the French maid, crying and gesticulating.

"Oh, Madame! if you had but suffered me to stay with you! Oh! the baron—what will he say?" and so she went on. Her state had but just been discovered; it had been supposed that she was fatigued, and was sleeping late, until a few minutes before. The surgeon of the town had been sent for, and the landlord of the inn was trying vainly to enforce order until he came, and from time to time drinking little cups of brandy, and offering it to others. When we were all assembled there, pretty much as the servants were doing in the court-yard.

At last the surgeon came. All fell back, and hung on the words that were to fall from his lips.

"See!" said the landlord. "This lady came last night to the diligence with her maid. Doubtless a great lady, for she must have a private sitting-room—"

"She was Madame the Baroness de Roder," said the French maid.

"—And was difficult to please in the matter of supper, and a sleeping-room. She went to bed well, though fatigued. Her maid left her—"

"I begged to be allowed to sleep in her room, as we were in a strange inn, of the character of which we knew nothing; but she would not let me, my mistress was such a great lady."

"—And slept with my servants," continued the landlord. "This morning we thought Madame was still slumbering; but when eight, nine, ten, and near eleven o'clock came, I bade her maid use my pass-key and enter her room."

"The door was not locked, only closed. And there she was found—dead, is she not, Monsieur?—with the fatal wound in her heart, and her beautiful hair all scattered wild; she never would let me tie it up, saying it made her head ache. Such hair!" said the weeping-maid, lifting up a long golden tress and letting it fall again.

I remembered Amante's words the night before, and crept close up to her.

Meanwhile the surgeon was examining the body underneath the bed-clothes, which the landlord, until now, had not allowed to be disarranged. The surgeon drew out his left arm all bathed and stained with blood, and holding up a short sharp knife, with a piece of paper fastened round it.

"Here he has been foul play," he said. "The deceased lady has been murdered. This dagger was aimed straight at her heart." Then, putting on his spectacles, he read aloud on the bloody paper, dimmed and horribly obscured as it was:

NUMERO UN.

Ainsi les Boches font en vengeant.

"Let us go!" said I to Amante. "Oh, let us leave this horrible place!"

"Wait a little," said she." "Only a few minutes more. I will tell you."

Immediately the voices of all proclaimed their suspicions of the cavalier who had arrived last the night before. He had been heard talking about her as we left the room; he must have come in directly afterward; and not until he had learned all about her had he spoken of the deed which necessitated his departure at dawn of day, and made his arrangements with both landlord and hostler for the possession of the keys of the stable-and porte-cochère. In the confusion he had come to the murderer, even before the arrival of the legal functionary who had been sent for by the surgeon; but the words on the paper left no room for any doubt. Les Chauffeurs, who were they? No one knew; some of the gang might even then be in the room, overhearing, in their turn, fresh objects for vengeance. In Germany I had heard little of this terrible gang, and I had paid no greater heed to it than a matter of course. I had been told then in Carlsruhe than one does to tales about ogres. But here in their very haunts I learned the full amount of the terror they inspired. No one would be legally responsible for any evidence criminating the murderer. The public prosecutor shrank from the duties of his office. What do I say? Neither Amante nor I dared to speak of the actual guilt of the man who had killed that poor sleeping young lady, burst breathe a word. We appeared to be wholly ignorant of the thing; we who might have told so much. But how could we? we were broken down with terrific anxiety and fatigue, with all the knowledge of the deed, were doomed victims; and that the blood heavily dripping from the bed-clothes on to the floor, was dripping thus out of the poor dead body because when living she had been mistaken for me.

At length Amante went up to the landlord and asked permission to leave his inn, doing all openly and humbly, as if we were under ill-will nor suspicion. Indeed, suspicion was otherwise directed, and he willingly gave us leave to depart. A few days afterward we were down on the Rhine, in Germany, making our way toward Frankfort, but still keeping our disguises, and Amante still working in her trade.

On the way we met a young man, a wandering journeyman from Heidelberg. I knew him, although I did not suppose he knew me—all neither was Amante questioned him about my brother and his wife. Of course they lived on at the mill; but the man said (with what truth I know not, but I believed I did) that the time had Babette had completely got the upper hand of my brother, who only saw through her eyes and heard with her ears. Then came the most startling gossip of late days about her sudden intimacy with a grand French gentleman who had appeared at the mill—a relation of Babette's, it was said, in fact, to the miller's sister, who, by all accounts, had behaved abominably and ungratefully. But that was no reason for Babette's extreme and sudden intimacy with him, going about every where with the French gentleman; and since he left (as the Heidelberger said he knew for a fact) corresponding with him constantly. Yet her husband saw no harm in it all seemingly; though, to be sure, he was so out of spirits, what with his father's death and the news of his sister's infamy, that he hardly knew how to hold up his head.

"Now," said Amante. "all the [illegible] de la Tourelle has suspected that you would go back to the nest in which you were reared, and that he has been there, and found that you have not yet returned; but probably he still imagines that you will do so, and has accordingly engaged your sister-in-law as a kind of informant. Madame has said that her sister-in-law bore no extreme good-will; and the defamatory story he has got the start of us in spreading will not tend to increase the favor in which your sister-in-law holds you. No doubt the assassin was watching his steps when we met him near Forbach, and having heard of the poor German lady, with her French maid and her pretty blonde complexion, he followed her. If Madame will still be guided by me—and, my child, I beg of you still to trust me," said Amante, breaking out of her respectful formality into the way of talking more natural to those who had shared and escaped from common dangers—more natural, too, where the speaker was conscious of a power of protection which the other did not possess—"we will go on to Frankfort, and lose ourselves, for a time, at least, in the numbers of people who throng a great town; and you have told me that Frankfort is a great town. We will still be husband and wife; we will take a small lodging, and you shall besmear and dye yourself. I, as the rougher and the more alert, will continue my father's trade, and seek work at the tailors' shops."

I could think of no better plan, as we followed this out. In a back street at Frankfort we found two furnished rooms to let on a sixth story. I never stirred abroad, and saw no one, and Amante's want of knowledge of German kept her in a state of comparative isolation.

At length my child was born—my poor weary time finished—and it was a girl, as I had prayed it might be. I had feared lest a boy might have something of the tiger nature of its father, but a girl seemed safe. And safe it was in my eyes, for the faithful Amante's delight and glory in the babe almost exceeded mine; in outward show it greatly did.

We had not been able to afford any attendance beyond what a neighboring sage-femme could give, and she often frequently, inquiring in with her, a little stock of gossip, and wonderful tales culled out of her own experience, every time. One day she began to tell me about a great lady in whose service she had lived as a soubrette, or some such thing. Such a beautiful lady! with such a handsome husband! But grief comes to the palace as well as to the cottage, and very sad was the one she knew, but somehow the Baron de Roder must have incurred the vengeance of the terrible Chauffeurs; for not many months ago, as Madame was going to see her relations in Alsace, she was stabbed dead as she lay in bed at some hotel on the road. Had I not seen it in the Gazette? Ha! I had not read? Why, she had been told that as far off as Lyons there were placards offering a heavy reward on the part of the Baron de Roder for information respecting the murderer of his wife. But no one could help him, for all who could tear evidence were in such terror of the Chauffeurs, there were hundreds of them who had been told, rich and poor, proud gentlemen and peasants, all leagued together by most frightful oaths to hunt to the death any one who bore witness against them; and that even they who survived the tortures to which the Chauffeurs subjected many of the people whom they plundered dared not keep their secret, for they would not dare, even did they see them at the bar of a court of justice; for, if one were condemned, were there not hundreds sworn to revenge his death?

I told all this to Amante, and we began to fear that if M. de la Tourelle, or Lefebvre, or any of the gang at Les Bocages, had been placards, placards would know that the poor lady stabbed by the former was the Baroness de Roder, and that they would set forth again in search of me.

This fearful information told on my health and impeded my recovery. We had so little money we could not call in a physician, at least not one in established practice. But Amante called on a young doctor for whom, indeed, she had sometimes worked; and offering to pay him in kind, she brought him to see me. He was a Jew. He was very gentle and thoughtful, though, like ourselves, very poor. But he gave much time and consideration to the case, and by every one of those he saw my constitution had experienced some severe shock from which it was probable that my nerves would never entirely recover. By-and-by I shall name this doctor, and then you will know, better than I can describe, his character.

I grew strong in time—stronger, at least. I was able to work, and to be busy, and to sun myself and my baby at the garret-window in the roof. It was all the air I dared to take.

One day Amante returned from her work, full of news: she had that day met the traveling jeweler to whom she and I had sold my ring. It was rather a good thing given to me by Schinderhannes; we had felt at the time that it might be the means of tracing us, but we were penniless and starving, and what else could we do? She had seen that this Frenchman had recognized her at the same instant that she did him, and she thought at the same time that there was a look of more than common intelligence on his face as he did so. This idea had been confirmed by his following her for some way on the other side of the street; but she had revealed him with her better knowledge of the town, and the increasing darkness of the night. Still it was well that she was going to such a distance from our dwelling on the next day; and she had brought me in a stock of provisions, begging me to keep within doors, with a strange kind of fearful delicacy for the fact that I had never set foot beyond the threshold of the house since I had first entered it—scarce ever ventured down the stairs. But although my poor, my dear, very faithful Amante was like one possessed that last night, she spoke continually of the dead, which is a bad sign for the living. She blessed you—yes! it was you, my daughter, my darling, whom I bore beneath my bosom away from the fearful castle of [illegible] that I call him so for the first time in a [illegible] him so once again before I have done—Amante kissed you, sweet baby, blessed little comforter, as if she never could leave off. And then she went away, alive.

Two days, three days passed away. That third evening I was sitting within my bolted doors—you asleep on your pillow by my side—when a step came up the stair, and I knew it must be for me; for ours were the topmost rooms. Some one knocked; I held my very breath. But some one spoke, and I knew it was the good Doctor Voss. Then I crept to the door, and answered,

"Are you alone?" asked I.

"Yes," said he, in a still lower voice. "Let me in." I let him in, and he was as alert as I in bolting and barring the door. Then he came and whispered to me his doleful tale. He had come from the hospital in the opposite part of the town, the hospital which he visited; he should have been with me sooner, but he had feared lest he should be watched. He had come from Amante's death-bed. Her fears of the jeweler were too well-founded. She had left the house where she was employed that morning to transact some errand connected with her work in the town; she must have been followed, and dogged on her way back through solitary wood-paths, for some of the wood rangers belonging to the great house had found her lying there, stabbed to death, but not dead; with the poniard again plunged through the fatal writing, some words, but this time with the word "un" underlined, so as to show that the assassin was aware of his previous mistake.

Nemésis Un.

Ainsi les Chauffeurs se vengent.

They had carried her to the house, and given her restoratives till she had recovered from the swoon of her speech. But oh, faithful dear friend and sister! even then she remembered me, and refused to tell what no one else among her fellow-workmen knew) where she lived or with whom. Lily was ebbing away fast, and they had no resource but to carry her to the nearest hospital, where, of course, the fact of her sex was soon known. Fortunately both for her and for me the doctor in attendance was the very Doctor Voss whom we already knew. To him, while awaiting her confessor, she told enough to enable him to understand the position in which I was left; before the priest had heard half her tale Amante was dead.

Doctor Voss told me he had made all sorts of detours, and waited thus, late at night, for fear of being watched followed. But I do not think he was. At any rate, as I afterward learned from him, the Baron Roeder, on hearing of the similitude of this woman with that of his wife in every particular, made such a search after the assassin that, although they were not discovered, they were compelled to take to flight for the time.

I can hardly tell you now by what arguments Dr. Voss, at first merely my benefactor, sparing me a portion of his small modicum, at length persuaded me to become his wife. His wife he called it, I called it; for we went through the religious ceremony too much slighted at the time, and as we were both Lutherans, and M. de la Tourelle had pretended to be of the reformed religion, a divorce from the latter would have been easily procurable by German law both ecclesiastical and legal, could we have summoned so fearful a man into any court.

The good doctor took me and my child by stealth to his modest dwelling; and there I lived in the same deep retirement, never seeing the full light of day, although when the dye had once passed away from my hair my husband did not wish me to renew it. There was no need; my yellow hair was gray, my complexion was ashen-colored, no creature could have recognized the well-to-do, bright-haired young woman of eighteen months before. The few people whom I saw knew me only as Madame Voss, a widow much older than himself whom Dr. Voss had secretly married. They called me the Gray Woman.

He took me give up his surname. Till now you have known no other father—while he lived you needed no father's love. Once only, only once more, did the old terror come upon me. For some reason that I forget I broke through my usual custom and went to the window of my room for some purpose, either to shut or to open it. Looking out I saw a priest for an instant I was fascinated by the sight of M. de la Tourelle, gay, young, elegant as ever, walking along on the opposite side of the street. He notes I had made with the window caused him to look up: he saw me, an old gray woman, and he did not recognize me! Yet it was not many years since we had parted, and his eyes were keen and dreadful like those of the lynx.

I told M. Voss on his return home, and he tried to cheer me with the magic of seeing M. de la Tourelle had been too terrified for me. I was ill for long months afterward.

Once again I saw him. Dead. He and Lefebvre were at last caught—hunted down by Mr. Baron de Roeder in some of their crimes. Dr. Voss had heard of their arrest, their condemnation, their death; but he never said a word to me, until one day he bade me show him that I loved him by my obedience and my trust. He took me a long carriage journey, where to I know not, for we never spoke of that day again; I was led through a prison, into a closed court-yard, where, decently draped in the last extreme of death, concealing the marks of decapitation, lay M. de la Tourelle, and two or three others, whom I had known at Les Rochers.

After that conviction Dr. Voss tried to persuade me to return to a more natural mode of life, and to go out more. But although I sometimes complied with his wish, yet the old terror was ever strong upon me, and he, seeing what an effort it was, gave up urging me at last.

You know all the rest. How we both mourned bitterly the loss of that dear husband and father—for such I will call him ever—and as such you must consider him, my child, after this one revelation is ever.

Why has it been made? you ask. For this reason, my child. The lover, whom you have only known as M. Lebrun, a French artist, told me but yesterday his real name, although Delft, above passionate to fix upon her canvas the glorious flowers and fruits of a far-off country, from which the town's every canal, lock, street, wall, and rampart combined to sunder him.

Through the mist, through the smoke and the shadow, and over the trees, there were eyes searching out the light for him. She could not see Ostervyk in her studio; and these—gaxy bright, pleasant-looking eyes enough—were fixed in the head of Wilhelm Ostervyk, a painter more than Amante's of Delft, whose studio is exactly opposite to Maria's, on the other side of the street. He has set up his easel, and has work before him—is clever enough artist, painting still-life subjects dexterously, and in good repute for his dead game, scraps of armor, and gold and silver cups. But not a very sedulous worker; unable to devote himself to his labors, unable to forget—as the genuine student ever does—that there is a world going on outside his studio walls. Half a dozen touches, and he looks out of the window, down the street toward the market-place, or over the way at Maria; then another few touches, and a look in the glass at his own handsome face, and a twirling of his mustache, a polling at his beard, or a tossing about of his long, thick clustering hair. Then he sets up his mind at last; and perhaps he hasn't much to operate upon, for that matter. He flings away his pallet and brushes, arrays himself in a handsome velvet doublet, blue with narrow silver edging, dons a hat and feather, buckles on his rapier, and struts from his studio. No more work for the day. He will pay visits; it is really quite a long time since he has seen his friends—twelve hours or so—he will call on Maria van Oosterwyck, and see how her lilies are coming on, and how she is—well, perhaps at the Golden Calf round the corner, and finish the evening there.

Absorbed in his toilet, before white hand supported by her mahl-stick, with the smallest, finest brush ever seen, defining hair-lines of light upon the outer edge of a petal, Maria has not cast the knock at her door—heard not the step upon the floor—knew not that any one had entered the room —was lost in her work, when suddenly a hand was laid gently upon her arm, and a voice murmured, accenting tenderly, "Incomparable Maria!"

She started up with quite a little scream, paled from very, and her eyes open wide with wild alarm, like flowers beaten by a storm. She was a lovely specimen of the thorough blonde, flaxen even to eyebrows and eyelashes, with a human lily herself, so pure, and delicate, and lovable-looking.

"You frightened me, Wilhelm," she said, her first surprise a little passed off, and with just the slightest tone of reproval traceable in her voice. She was about to give her hand with the brush in it, but a glance at Wilhelm's gay doublet, and the thought of however so little a streak of cream-white would soil it, stopped her.

"Enthusiast!" Wilhelm went on, "devotee! You have no thought but for this?" And he pointed to the panel on the easel.

"Is it a fault?" she asked.

"No; but it is a reproach to the less devout."

"To yourself then? Wilhelm, when will you work? When will you paint as you can paint, and be both and sick at heart to leave it? So you have quitted work for to-day, and there remain five more good hours of daylight."

Wilhelm blushed. He was a little crest-fallen at his reception. Had the blue velvet and the silver edging so much effect as this?

"I have nearly finished the picture of the dead falcon and the jeweled goblet."

Maria shook her head sorrowingly.

"You have not to supply your own model, Wilhelm. You may leave off work—you may let it go from your easel—you may barter it for a good price—but you have not to look for your subject: it is not a work such as should bear the name of Van Aalst. Why will you paint only for to-day, for the present hour, to supply your mere needs, and feed for nothing else? You must wish to live, Wilhelm, to be something in the future, to have your name honored and your works cherished. Let you this to yourself. Paint fewer pictures, and work more."

"I have not your talent, gentle Maria."

"You have more than the genius, talent, Wilhelm, a thousand times. With all my labor, pouring out my life at the foot of my easel, I know I can not approach the genius you possess, if you would but render it justice."

"I have not your devotion, Maria."

"You loved your art for its own sake; you had high, grand thoughts about it once."

"Boyish dreams."

"They will have been the facts of your manhood, had you chosen so, good friend."

It was hard upon him—who had come to create a sensation, to win the admiration of the fair enthusiast—to meet so chill a welcome, such a lecture upon his shortcomings. Maria herself began to think so at length, and changed the subject.

"Do you like my lilies?"

"They are exquisite, they are inimitable—full of your own grace, and subtlety, and expression. You have nearly completed them."

"No, there remains much to do. See, these leaves are hardly touched; this bud is more raw color."

There was a pause. He looked from the panel to her. Standing so humbly and gently before a most marvelous effort of painting, how could he help great admiration and love possessing his heart? How could he hinder them from sparkling in his handsome eyes? His one hand rested on his hip, the other toyed gracefully with the silver tassels of his cloak. He was in his most winning attitude. Maria looked up at him innocently, read something of his thoughts in his face, and then turned away, a little frightened, perhaps.

"You remember," he said, at length, in his most musical voice, "you remember, Maria, my first coming here?—my assumed bearing, my affecting to be a dealer, come to purchase your works, when my real aim was—was you, to become acquainted with you?"

It was a trick, Wilhelm, a shameful trick." And she moved away from him.

"It was fair, for I loved you."

She put her hand to her heart, as though she had been stabbed. She could not speak, but she waved her hand, by her gesture imploring him to desist.

"I loved you then, Maria, and from that day I have loved you more and more. If I have neglected my art, as you say, may not love be my excuse? And that plead for me. Do not judge me too harshly."

She heard him like one in pain, trembling, and with closed, quivering eyes. He was about to continue; she forbade him gently upon his.

"Cease, Wilhelm, I entreat of you."

"You don't love me, Maria?" The question was so unusually, strangely, fervidly breathed, it was almost irresistible. For some moments Maria could not speak. Her breath came and went so forcibly, and her heart beat so.

"I dare not"—in a low, broken whisper.

"You doubt me?" She bowed her head affirmatively, and hid her face in her hands and her tears.

Wilhelm had had little experience in failure. He was puzzled, amazed. Could it be that his handsome face, his gay, winning ways, had not into expostulations, into passionate oaths and entreaties; but a look from Maria stopped him.

"You, who have false to art, can I hope that you will be true to me?"

"I have been true."

"You loved art once, Wilhelm: you neglect it now."

"But I will never neglect you, dearest. I swear it."

"False in one, false in all."

"Marie, this is cruelty."

"Let it be so, Wilhelm, and let us part. Leave me to my labors, which must be to me less good, and pure, and true. I can not quit them, to give my truth to one who may one day turn from me, let love fade, and leave a withered leaf. If I surrendered them, Wilhelm, for you, and that time should come, as it would, doubt not, when you would cease to love me—when I should be to you a poor fool with my simplicities, lustreless—I could not bear it. Wilhelm, it would be death."

"But this is a nightmare, darling; it never shall be true. I will work, I will love art; I have never ceased to love art. I will always love you both."

But Maria only shook her head sadly, murmuring, "False in one, false in all."

"But try me. These are not mere words—idle, vain; test them; they will bear it."

She looked at him earnestly: there seemed honesty in his face and in his speech.

"First then: You will be true to art."

"I swear it."

"You will work honestly; you will be at your easel for six hours a day at least, continuously painting earnestly, seeking faithful account of the objects you paint, as they seem to you; not trickily, or to produce rapidly, or to sell quickly. You will attend to nothing else, you will not be seen with Heil, or Brocken, or Vander Noove. You will avoid the Golden Calf; you will cease to make Delft ring with your dissipations. You hear me, Wilhelm?"

"I will do all this, Maria."

"And for six months—mark that; you will do all this for six months?"

"I may see you the while, may I not?"

"No, Wilhelm: it is better not; it is better not, for both our sakes. For the end of six months come to me. Tell me you have done all this faithfully; tell me you have been true to yourself—to art—to me. Tell me that you love art truly, and as you love art, love me."

And if I do this, you—"

She gave him a little, white hand. He pressed it passionately to his lips.

"You are mine, Maria!"

"Six months have yet to pass, Wilhelm."

He hurried from the room, was dashing down the stairs mad with joy, and hope, and love. In five minutes his blue doublet was off, and he was hard at work before his easel.

The poor lily-lady, pressing her hands upon her head, was too shaken and bewildered to resume her pencil immediately. Soon, however, she turned toward her flowers, exclaiming with passion: "True or false, O my lilies, I can not love you less. I am still yours, and you will still be mine!"

There was a thick crust of snow upon all the gable-roofs of Delft; the canals were frozen; ticks ice blocked up the river. The six months had passed. Maria was still at her easel. There were no lilies to be had now, only those upon her panel, perfect as they were they to nature, it seemed not possible to carry imitation further. She was employed in painting a folded drapery of stamped pure-colored satin for the background of her picture. She seemed paler than ever now, and an air of fatigue and suffering haunted her face; yet she worked on in her old placid, simple, hearty way: the tiny pencils moved to and fro as steadily and perseveringly as ever.

"Six months to-day," she murmured once, hitting but for a moment, only to resume again with a redoubled energy. But a step on the stairs soon set her hand trembling and her heart beating. She was compelled to desist. Wilhelm entered splendidly handsome in green velvet, with a thick studding of small gold buttons, a sweeping white feather in his hat, a glittering sword-belt, and heavy fur-trimming on his cloak. There was a triumph, ant flush upon his face as he walked rapidly toward Maria.

"You have come, then, Wilhelm?" she said.

"To claim fulfillment of your promise, dearest."

He threw her glance earnestly upon his face, gazing into his eyes as though to read the truth in them.

"You have fulfilled your promise, Wilhelm; you have been true to art; you have worked seriously, for six hours a day at least, uninterruptedly without quitting your studio; you have shunned low companions, the tavern; you have been true to yourself and to me?"

Wilhelm bowed his glossy head affirmatively before her. He looked very superb indeed. Maria turned away her head; she was shivering with nervous agitation—not cold, as he thought.

"And I may trust my happiness to your keeping?" she continued, still looking down.

"Dearest Maria, I swear that you shall never repent so doing."

And he twirled the ends of his ample mustache, and dusted his beard with a bruidered kerchief, which, tucked in his doublet, had been adding to the curve of his massive chest.

Maria started back from him, and an angry light gleamed in the blue eyes wontedly so soft and gentle. It was like forked lightning breaking out suddenly on a calm summer sky.

"Wilhelm, you would scorn to play with cogged dice; you would not cheat to the earth any one who said you tricked at cards; you would not proceed to dupe no man. Why, then, do you come here to trick me, to fool me upon your lips?—why seek to cheat me? What have I ever done that you should turn against me thus? Is it because I am weak, and a woman, that I am to be treated with falsehoods—won by fraud?"

Wilhelm, amazed, puzzled, embarrassed, looked at her. He put forth his hand imploringly; he sought to speak; she waved back his approaches by an angry gesture. You would not have thought such fury could have possessed her. The lily was whirled in a tempest.

"You know that you have broken every letter of your promise; you know that your every act of life has been false to me; you know that I dare not confide my happiness in your hands: that you are utterly unworthy such a trust. This is nothing. You have a right to act as you will. To stain your name, your honor, your art, with mine, if you will; it is not for me to call for an account. But to act thus shamefully, and crown that shame by a lie to me, to one who, God knows, never would or could have done you wrong—Wilhelm, Wilhelm, it is too much!"

There were tears now upon her cheeks, like raindrops on a lily.

Wilhelm stood speechless, abashed, and angry. His intense feeling engendered by passion is cheat, and to be found out too! Yet he tried to plead his heart; and sturdy lying seemed his safest course—so his weak, false mind suggested.

"You wrong me, indeed, indeed."

"Stop!" she cried, putting her hands to her ears to shut out his words. "No more; you have lied enough. Leave here!" and she pointed to the window-post: there were hundreds of streaks of lily white. "Each time you have failed in your promise I have registered the failure here. You have been absent from your studio; you have been idle; you have been gaping at the window, or idling at the door; you have been out days and nights at the Golden Calf. Heil has been with you, and Brocken, and Vander Noove, and—O Wilhelm! others no more worthy have been seen!"—and a blush crossed her cheek; it was as a sunset on a lily—"and you have painted worthless pictures. You know it—none better. Oh, in a thousand ways, you have been false; and here, see, here are the proofs."

In Wilhelm's culprit face, midst all his shame and confusion, yet lingered an interrogative: "How did you know all this?" She read it in his looks, without needing his words.

"My studio is opposite to yours; I can see you from here as well as you can see me from there."

"Yet your back was always turned?"

She could not help smiling, it was such a wretched, pitiful, shallow excuse.

"You forgot the mirror!" With that in front of me I had no need to turn."

Wilhelm sank down on the ground with rage and disappointment, cursing a thousand times his own stupidity.

"Adieu! Maria van Oosterwyck."

"Adieu! Wilhelm van Aalst."

Utterly crushed and mortified, he moved to the door. There he stood for a moment, rallied a little, and with a feeble, broken swagger, made an attempt to conjure back something of his old grand manner, whispered softly: "And there is no hope, Maria?"

"None!" said the lady, stoutly. She was deaf to the voice of the charmer, and he went out banging the door to retire. The night was her trial over, broke down completely; she fell into a chair, weeping copiously.

"Heaven help me!" And I so loved that man!" With a strange curiosity and weakness, she sent her servant on the following morning to make inquiry concerning him. She learned that he had quitted Delft: it was said forever. Then she was thought to be his destination. Then Maria was on her knees once more before her panel: "O my lilies! I am yours forever—only yours. I will love but you."

And she kept her word, devoting herself to her art, and glorifying it by her devotion. And Europe struggled for possession of her works; not numerous, but all perfect. And Emperor Leopold, and Louis the Magnificent, and England's great monarch, William of Orange—all bought from her easel.

In 1693 she painted her last lily—never having seen again the faithless Wilhelm—never having loved again—still Maria van Oosterwyck.

REVOLUTION IN NAVAL WARFARE.

SHOT-PROOF IRON STEAMSHIPS.

We engrave herewith pictures of the famous new experiments in ships of war—the British Warrior, and the French La Gloire, which are just now attracting so much attention. A British authority gives the following description of the two vessels:

"When the Warrior was designed, La Gloire was not afloat. All that was then known of her in England (and we have learned but little more of her since) amounted to this: that she was a timber-built ship, very much resembling one of our line-of-battle ships cut down, and cased from end to end with iron plates 4½ inches thick; that she was 252 feet 6 inches long (between the perpendiculars), 56 feet broad, and 27 feet 6 inches deep below the water-line; that her ports were to be 8 feet 6 inches apart, and from 6 to 6 feet above the water; that she was to be lightly rigged, and to possess but small sail-power; that her engines were to be of 900 (nominal) horse-power; that her estimated speed was about 11 knots per hour; and that she was to carry 34 guns on her main-deck, each firing 8-in. shot, and two shell guns forward. The problem which the naval architects of this country were called upon to solve was this: what kind of vessel will best enable our seamen to contend successfully against La Gloire and similar ships?

"Before this problem came practically under the consideration of the naval architects at Whitehall, Mr. Scott Russel, the designer and builder of the Great Eastern, had, it appears, submitted to the Controller of the Navy designs for an iron-plated ship of war, in which was adopted a novel and ingenious device—that of defending only the central portion of the ship with armor, leaving her extremities free from its encumbrances.

"From the fact that Sir John Pakington and his colleagues insisted upon a speed of 14 knots an hour, and the power of carrying provisions for four months, it is manifest that they resolved to oppose to La Gloire a real sea-going ship of war: not a mere floating battery, nor a craft that would have to keep the land in sight, but a ship which should be fit to take the open sea, and, if need be, to bear the flag of old England once more to the enemy's coasts. They clearly were determined, if not to reassert our old supremacy upon the ocean, at least to prevent supremacy being asserted by others. To this end, a high speed, and the power of keeping the sea for months together, were absolutely essential. This rendered several specific qualities necessary. For example, a sea-going ship must be furnished with masts and sails of sufficient dimensions to keep her perfectly manageable and sea-worthy in all weathers, under sail alone. No steamship of war can carry sufficient coals to keep her under full steam for more than a few days, and, consequently, neither the blockade of an enemy's port nor the pursuit of a hostile fleet—operations from which the British navy has never shrunk hitherto—can be performed by ships without large sailing-power. It was necessary, again, to place the battery of such a ship at a considerable height above the water—not less than 9 feet, say; for a vessel whose battery is near the water, has to close her ports and silence her guns at the first approach of rough weather, and is altogether incapable at such a time of defending herself efficiently against a ship that has the advantage of her in this respect.

"In all these features the Warrior is, beyond question, superior to La Gloire. We assume here, to start with, that her speed will be at least two knots an hour greater than that of the latter ship. La Gloire, with her form, dimensions, and engine power, can not keep up an average speed of more than 11½ knots an hour; while, on the other hand, it is pretty certain that the Warrior, with her form, dimensions, and engine power, will prove capable of an average speed of at least 13½ knots.

"She will likewise have the advantage of her in respect of sail-power, inasmuch as while La Gloire is fully rigged for channel service only, the Warrior is furnished with the masts, spars, and sails of an English 80-gun ship.

"A comparison of the armaments of these extraordinary vessels is not a very important matter; because, supposing La Gloire to be impregnable, no British officer would think of spending time in exchanging shot or shell with her, when he had a ship of the Warrior's speed under his command. He would, of course, immediately close with her, and carry her by the good old English method of boarding—this being, in fact, the prime object of her great speed. With the 'ope' and rigging of the Warrior swarming with riflemen, no crew could be prevailed upon to keep the weather-deck of La Gloire when once the faster ship had closed upon her; and although provision for deck defence against boarders has been made in the French ship, we, at least, can not believe that her tri-color would long continue flying. The height of the Warrior's sides is eminently favorable to the operation, as the men could readily leap from them upon the low deck of La Gloire.

"Notwithstanding these considerations, however, it may be well to state what the armaments of the two ships are. La Gloire is supposed to carry 34 guns upon her main-deck, all of them 54-pounders; and two heavy shell guns forward, with an oblique screen in front of them. All her guns are, therefore, under the cover of armor. In the Warrior, on the other hand, only 30 are protected; but all of them are to be large 68-pounders, each weighing 100 cwt. At long range, neither ship could harm the other seriously; at short range the 68-pounders would be by far the most formidable weapon. But besides the 30 guns that are protected, the Warrior can, and probably will, carry 12 additional guns on the main-deck, of the same size as the others; and on her upper deck she is to have ten more mounted, making an armament of forty-eight heavy 68-pounders in all. Under many circumstances of naval warfare, the twenty-two uncovered guns (unscreened, that is, with thick plates) could be used with terrible effect—in the event, for instance, of her falling in with La Gloire on one of those rough days when the waves of the latter were of necessity dim and her guns idle. It should be further stated, that the guns of the Warrior could be fought with greater ease and rapidity, and with less exhaustion to the men, than those of La Gloire, because of the less crowded state of the deck. We do not know the exact height of the latter ship between decks; but we know that it is comparatively little, and that her guns are but 11 feet 6 inches apart; whereas the Warrior has a clear height of 6 feet 6 inches on her gun-deck, between the deck and the beams above, and her guns are no less than 15 feet 6 inches apart. The advantage in time of action of this spaciousness of the fighting-deck will be best understood by those who have fought ships-of-war.

"The enormous dimensions of the Warrior must have excited surprise in many minds. Her length is 380 feet, or, at the most, a 48-gun ship, she is no less than 580 feet long (60 feet aft the 420 feet limited by the draught of water, and of 6950 tons burden. Why, the general reader may well ask, must she be large, and therefore so costly, when she could be adopted? The short answer is, that the desirable qualities she possesses could not have been obtained with less proportions. Let us briefly explain why. The great primary quality demanded was a speed superior, by a knot or a knot or two, to that of La Gloire.

"Again, high speed had to be attained in combination with a shot-proof hull. Had not the proposal to leave the ends of the ship unprotected been thought of, this combination would have been practically impossible, except with far greater dimensions than even the Warrior; because the enormous weight the armor would have required a corresponding displacement to support it; and this again would have needed still more armor and more length to drive the ship through the water. But even with her fine ends retained, an immense weight of iron was to be supported. And this weight has not, as some suppose, been determined, in the case of the Warrior, by the number of guns which were to be carried. For, let it be understood, there is much more than the guns and armor to be protected. In the Warrior, the engines and boilers, the magazines, shaft-rooms, and, most of all, the steering-gear, that is would be dangerous to expose either to fire or to water—a gun placed in front, the shelter of the bulwarks. The engines and boilers alone occupy a length of 120 feet. Here, then, we have a fact that a comparatively fourth of shot-proof side becomes requisite. That a great height of it is to be opposed in all directions (as long as the ports must (as previously explained) be considerably elevated; next, that the plating must be continued down a few feet below the water-line, in order to prevent shot entering just beneath the sun's surface, or lower down when the ship is at sea, and rolling; and, lastly, to avoid, finally, that the armor must be carried up well above the heads of the gunners, in order to protect them properly. Further, the long and high shot-proof side has to be, from the very nature of the case, a heavy one. It consists of an ordinary but unusually strong iron ship's hull, outside of which are placed in opposite directions two layers of teak timber, one of 10 inches thick and the other of 8 inches, and upon the outside of this mass of timber 4½-inch iron plates are secured.

"After long-tried investigations, it was found by the designers that the iron-cased portion of the ship required to be at least 380 feet long, and that the very extremities could not satisfactorily be made less than 175 feet; giving a total length of 380 feet, or, when the projecting head and overhanging stern are added, 420 feet in all. Just within the limits of her armor, and 205 feet apart, are placed two bulkheads, or walls, extending completely across the ship, and formed almost as stoutly as her sides. They are placed externally with 6-inch plates of iron, which extend down 9 feet below the water-line, in order that shot or shell entering the bow or stern may not pass them. As the exposed ends of the ship could not, with safety, be formed of timber, it was thought desirable to build her throughout of iron, and to make her a solid and complete structure independently of the screw-plates and their timber backings.

"Very mistaken views are held, as to the probable action of shot and shell upon her uncased extremities, by persons who have studied the Warrior's construction but imperfectly. In the first place, it should be understood that no apprehension of the ship there sustaining serious injury from the fire of shells need be entertained. The sides are all of iron, the thickness not of iron; and thin iron decks are laid over the beams. The only combustible materials exposed are the light deck planks of the iron deck, and such little matters of ship furniture as may be deemed indispensable. The officers' cabins will be in the after-part of the ship, it is true, and the men's messes in the fore-part; but with the ship bereft of iron, and with well-devised appliances for extinguishing such local ignition as may happen, it will be scarcely possible for fire to make progress in her. But even if it should, the main body of the ship will be perfectly proof to fire, within the plated bulwark, and 9 feet from them, are placed inner iron bulkheads, and the space between are used as water compartments, so that vertical sheets of water, 2 feet thick, intervene between the body of the ship and the extremities through these it would be impossible for fire to make its way. In the next place, there is no good ground for believing that shot will do much injury to the ship's extremities; except to the rudder and after sternpost, perhaps: these are the weak points in the Warrior, as in all other screw ships of war, notwithstanding that they have in her case been made enormously strong, for the most important purpose of resisting solid shot. To suppose that any number of shot which a ship is likely to receive in action would knock either the bow or stern of such a ship as the Warrior to pieces, and leave the rest portion only afloat, would be to manifest great ignorance of the strength with which she is built throughout."

THE FAN.

SOME seventy years ago no name stood higher in commercial repute at Havre than that of Duraval. The founder of the family was not dead at the time when we commence the story; but though the designation was altered from "Claude Duraval and Sons" to "Duraval Brothers," the public trust was unshaken, even by envious conjecture. For Claude, the elder of the two sons, had for some years managed the business, and nothing could exceed the caution, and withal enterprise, of the transactions of the house under his direction, save the uniform and splendid fortune which illustrated them.

The two brothers resided in the same house, a large and roomy old hotel, situated in a garden profusely adorned with statues, bath-houses, balustrades, and fountains, in the Italian style, and called after the name. For four years after the father's death they continued unmarried. No differences were ever reported to have taken place between them. But this things were not destined to be long in this quiet course. One evening at a public ball given to celebrate the most brilliant victory of the First Consul, Jerome was introduced to a certain Mademoiselle Corisande de Carcilhac, who had lately appeared in the gay circles of Havre. Rumor, "pointed full of tongues," told strange stories of the lady's career in the capital. Certain it was she dressed magnificently, coquetted mercilessly, played extravagantly, and consequently was the last person with whom a prudent man of business should have connected himself; but no less certain was the fact, that within six weeks from the Marengo ball she was married, with the consent and approbation of Claude, to Jerome Duraval. The explanation of the puzzling words which we have put in italics is short and simple. The elder brother "consented and approved," because he could not help himself, for Jerome had no sooner made the acquaintance of the all-fascinating Corisande than he began to play largely. The circle into which he was introduced consisted of reckless men of pleasure. He was elated with the lavish flattery which they bestowed upon him, and emptied to stake enormous sums on the spinning of the roulette table, or the hazards of the cards at lansquenet. At first the result was invariably the same. The friends of Corisande always won the bank, and the merciless always won. After a while the luck changed, and after the change it set in so uniformly against the merchant that he grew desperate, flew to his brother himself on the rescue, and undertook to play for him. As if by magic, the rouleaux of gold and the piles of bank-notes passed to her side of the table. In short, the conflict was the old one of practice and craft against ignorance and simplicity, and the former as usual won. Though he had at first, however, undertaken to play for him, the merchant was not richer for his handsome partner's gains. His petitions for the winnings were of necessity made with a smile, and were adroitly laughed off as jests. The appetite of the Parisian for costly presents was insatiable, and Jerome found himself hopelessly involved, and after a little equivocation and evasion confessed the whole truth to Claude. At that moment, for the first time for thirty years, the house was in a critical position. Money was of great importance. One plan alone appeared feasible. The lost wealth might be regained by an alliance with the winner of it, so Corisande was married "with the consent and approbation" of Claude to Jerome Duraval.

But the parties were not happy. Instead of the rapture of hazard was not to be bound down again to the comparatively tardy work of legitimate traffic. The elder brother had exacted a pledge from him that he should never enter a gaming-house, and to stake more than a certain conventional number of francs on a game of cards; but all this foresight was in vain; the wily Madame Duraval acquiesced readily in the terms, and Jerome had been at last vivsed the elder brother in stead on taking from the younger the security of the promise, but the subsets-tance of dollars and francs was unchanged. The funds were substituted for the cards. Instead of gambling they speculated. . . .

To the cold and calculating temper of the wife the most monstrous risks hardly gave any excitement. The agonies of expectation, the reactions of wild hope and profound despair, inflamed the impetuous temper of the husband like fiery wine. Under false names and through numerous agents they bought in and sold out of the funds, and for some time the star of Corisande was in the ascendant; but, after a while, the narrow and scarcely perceptible wish separates enterprise from rashness was crossed. They ventured more and more recklessly. Failure succeeded failure. The policies of the day were full of surprises. A superstitious trust in the fire to make business for all most the only guiding principle in Corisande's creed, but long after this was proved fallacious the devotee clung to her faith. Meanwhile, entirely ignorant of the events which were happening under his eyes, Claude Duraval continued to attend regularly at his office, to direct the legitimate transactions of the firm; to dictate its foreign correspondence, and to watch the fidelity of its servants.

Suddenly, one morning, in the October of 1804, a strange and startling report spread over Havre! It was caught up, and passed like lightning from mouth to mouth. All was uncertainty and conjecture, but one fact—Monsieur Claude Duraval had disappeared, and was nowhere to be found. The authorities, and the missing man's relatives who investigated the affair, could only glean very scanty particulars. On the morning of the 18th of October the unfortunate man had been at the counting-house as usual. He had looked exactly as he generally looked, and had done his work in precisely the accustomed manner. About four o'clock he went home, alone, as his brother and his wife were out of town, after dinner sat reading for an hour or so. Later than this there was no decided information. One of the servants, an under-gardener, thought he had observed him pass through the orangery, but was not positive. It was certain he rang the bell for the dessert to be removed, and the footman who answered the summons was the last person who swore to seeing him. Jerome and his wife made every effort to find the lost. Large rewards were offered to the person who should discover any clew, however slender. The law in the matter was equally active. After six weeks leaving the port were searched. The haunts of desperadoes in the city thoroughly scoured. But money, time, and diligence were all wasted. The police left the matter as they found it, an unsolved enigma!

And so, after the usual time, public interest cooled. The house of Duraval stood as firm as before, and the slight, but peculiar embarrassment had any thing to do with Claude's disappearance was proved to be baseless: but after a time it was given out that Jerome's health would not allow him to take an active part in the management. Personal friends hinted that his illness, a nervous complaint, was principally caused by domestic disputes. Jerome grew more and more ill, and he aged rapidly. At last he withdrew from the business entirely, and left Havre with his wife. The first news of them was that they were at the baths of Lucca, since, as his physicians prescribed a warm air, and Jerome was both a connoisseur and an artist, Italy had two recommendations. A second report stated that the husband and wife had separated by mutual consent. This story caused a little gossip among their old friends; but the absent are soon forgotten, and their names were barely ever mentioned.

Twenty years are passed, and we stand in one of the best private boxes in the grand opera at Paris. The performances are under the patronage of royalty, and the house is in a blaze of costly jewels and gay uniforms. As ever, the scene is the grand spectacle, and the box wherein we have taken our stand a special focus of attraction. Not from the splendid rank and dazzling beauty of its occupant, but from her extraordinary reputation for wealth and political influences. Time has worked great changes in the face, yet those who were present at the Marengo ball at Havre would recognize in the painted, and powdered, and essenced dowager the features of Corisande de Carcilhac. Two or three special favorites only are admitted into her society, but with these she exchanges repartees, jests, satire, criticism. She is one of the autocrats of the world of art; her judgment is anxiously looked for by the débutante, for thirty more will follow it. To-night all notice that she is in unusually good spirits.

The curtain rises. One of the veterans of the lyric stage opens the act with a song. It is a marvel of correct vocalization. The house is in a new excitement. The dowager has an unusual difficulty: she has flung away all her bouquets.

"That rose out of your neck, Eugénie," said she to a lovely girl who sits next her. "I never heard Z—— in such voice; and, for the first time in his life, he acts as well as he sings. Quick—that rose, child! He will value it more than all the bracelets from his Majesty's box, I know."

The girl blushed and hesitated. Madame Duraval looked astonished. "Why—Ma Dieu! I forgot you had the rose, did he? How naughty of me not to remember it. Well, I suppose I must forgive you. Why—Ma Dieu! I have given that little rogue of a danseuse my emerald already."

"You must tell Z—— to-morrow, aunt; that will do as well."

"Oh no! He must have something from the Duraval. What! No bouquets, ladies!—no bouquets, gentlemen! I shall have to throw my fan at him, I protest. Where is it, child? It has 'Alexander's Feast' painted on it, and he will fancy the compliment intentional!"

The looked-for fan, however, could not be found at the moment. The compliant cavaliers sought in vain under play-bills and opera-cloaks.

Suddenly a strangely deep voice, close in the lady's ear, uttered the sentence:

"Will this fan serve the purpose, Madame?"

The speaker was the grave-looking man, whose grave face and persistent gaze had annoyed the dowager a moment before.

He leaned over from the next box and presented an open fan. Madame Duraval caught at the toy as he tendered her for a space, wherein you might perhaps have counted sixty: then her face grew too ashy white for the artificial glow on her cheek to be of any avail. Her eyes stared with a hideous fixity of gaze, her jeweled fingers clutched her ivory like the hands of one in the death-struggle. She uttered a strange harsh shriek and fell down the senseless on the floor. All crowded round her. The gentleman would have made way for Eugénie and the attendants, but the duchess kept close to the insensible body of Corisande. There were a few hurried cries of alarm. Some fancied a subtle poison had been administered in the fan, and called out for the arrest of the person who had presented it. Cries of "silence!" arose from all parts of the theatre. The actors stopped, and at last—though not till some time had passed—the group of people in the Duraval box succeeded in bearing the dowager to a lobby. There was some little struggle to get her; and after in vain trying all the means of recovery, which the ability of half a dozen of the first Parisian physicians could suggest, the body among the audience could suggest, she was carried to her hotel. . . . Directly the stiff fingers of the prostrate woman relaxed it, a gentleman, whose curiosity overmastered his fears, picked up and examined the fatal fan. Its handle was ivory, of curious workmanship, and on it was a picture of an Italian-looking bath-house in a garden, and amid the landscape were inscribed the initials "C. D.," and the date "October 18, 1810." There was nothing about the gift apparently to excite the extraordinary emotion which it had been the means of evoking!

All Paris next morning was busy with various versions of the accident to the autocrat of the fashionable world. As twenty years before at Havre, rumor, romance, and exaggeration fastened themselves on the name of Duraval. Some said the veteran must have fainted at the sight of an old lover. Some attached themselves to the first theory of a mysterious poison, and saw in the affair a bungling workings of Brinvilliers or Borgia. Others hinted that the celebrated poisoner had been arrested for debt. These and a dozen other fictions occupied the salons during the mornings, but, about four o'clock, the truth rose to the surface from the bottom of the well, and it became known that the gentleman with the harsh voice—the giver of the fan—was an officer of justice acting under instructions, and that Madame Corisande Duraval, who had partially recovered her senses, was, at the moment, under examination at the Bureau of the superintendent of police, and that the charge against her was murder!

The sequel must be stated in a few words. The day before the scene at the Grand Opera a poor man, miserably dressed and apparently worn out with a long journey on foot, arrived at a low cabaret in the Faubourg St. Antoine. He engaged a bed for a few sous. In the night he was taken dangerously ill, and raved in such a wild and incoherent manner that the other lodgers denounced that he should be turned out. The landlady, however, was more humane, and sent for the priest. There was some delay in procuring one, and in the mean time an officer of police called at the cabaret to see after the lodger. The priest and he were seated was hiding in the same room as the delirious man, and the officer when engaged in securing the sick man found the outcries of the latter. He was struck by some few words which the poor wretch repeated over and over again, especially by the mention of a watch he wished to present to Madame Duraval, for the name of the Duraval had been mixed up with more than one plot, and she was herself, though perfectly unconscious of it, under the strictest surveillance. The savings of the old man were vague and contradictory in the extreme, the practised detective contrived to elicit that it was from the proceeds of the flying man's heart to present the fan which was wrapped up in his ragged little valise to the celebrated queen of fashion. The officer contrived to see the had heard to his chief, and by his instructions took the fan from the old man, dressed himself in evening costume and went to the box of the Duravals. And in the manner we have described carried out the old man's wish. Very different from that which was anticipated was the result of his delicate. They expected to detect some semi-political, semi-mercantile intrigue, and fancied the presentation of the fan a signal for secret agreement on the part. It really was the spell to give voice to a conscience long dumb—the key to unlock a fearful mystery! It had been proposed to Corisande by Jerome at the cabaret with Leontine, but he breathed his last an hour before the examination was to have come on. His pocket-book, in the front page of which was written the words "Claude Duraval," contained a diary, partly written, partly expressed in symbols. But from a few intelligible words the police superintendent was enabled to put such questions to Madame Duraval as made her imagine him in possession of the whole truth, and led to a full confession of her guilt. Soon after her marriage she had speculated, as we know, most recklessly. There was no way to meet the claims upon her husband save to appropriate the money of the firm; this could not be done without Claude being a party to it, and Jerome, always a coward, was afraid to confess the truth to him. The demands for money grew each day more and more pressing. A fiendish idea pos- sessed the adventurers, and the execution followed quick on the conception. She and her husband left Havre for a neighboring watering-place, but returned secretly after proceeding half way: they knew the habits of Claude, and timed their return so as to meet him in a secluded corner of the shrubbery. His brother struck him down with a heavy iron bar, and the wife buried a knife in his breast. They concealed the body in the disused bath-house near the orangery.

After the crime the two had lived a wretched life, the woman perpetually dreading lest her husband's conscience should prompt him to some rash revelation. She had therefore labored to get rid of him, and had succeeded in her object. He had for a while depended on the supplies of money liberally forwarded on the condition of his keeping out of France; but at last he had become superstitiously fearful of receiving the wages of guilt, and had professed to toil for his bread. He had possessed, as we know, some talent as a painter, and had established himself in a manufactory of handscreens and fans. As a self-imposed penance he had painted one with the scene which was characterized in his memoir in indelible lines, and he had hoped that he might, by suddenly presenting this to his more hardened accomplice, alarm her into confession and repentance. It was, however, ordered that this new Clytemnestra should not escape with the punishment of conscience and the penances of religion. Public indignation, indeed, scarcely allowed the authorities to go through the forms of justice. Strong guards of chasseurs and gens d'armes were required to restrain the mob from tearing the prisoner to pieces as she proceeded to and from the place of trial. The people waited in breathless excitement the answer to the message sent to the authorities at Havre. At last it came with all its fullness of confirmation. The stones of the bath-house had been removed, and beneath a mass of rubbish since accumulated were found the mouldering bones of a human skeleton.

Two days after the receipt of the message Corisande Duravel was guillotined.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

I AM obliged to acknowledge that I was vainglorious enough to accept a seat in the Crofton carriage on the morning of the departure, and accompany them for a mile or so of the way—even at the price of returning on foot—just that I might show myself to the landlady and that odious old waiter in a position of eminence, and make them do a bitter penance for the insults they had heaped on an illustrious stranger. It was a poor and a paltry triumph, and over very contemptible adversaries, but I could not refuse it to myself. Crofton, too, contributed largely to the success of my little scheme, by insisting that I should take the best place beside his sister, while he sat with his back to the horses, and though I refused at first, I acceded at last, with the bland compliance of a man who feels himself once more in his accustomed station.

As throughout this true history I have candidly revealed the inmost traits of my nature—well knowing the while how deteriorating such innate analysis must prove—I have ever felt that he who has small claims to interest by the events of his life can make some compensation to the world by an honest exposure of his motives, his weaknesses, and his struggles. Now my present confession is made in this spirit, and is not absolutely without its moral, for, as the adage tells us, "Look after the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves;" so would I say toward yourself in regard to all such petty vices. You and I, most esteemed reader, are—I trust fervently—little likely to be arraigned on a capital charge. I hope sincerely that transportable felonies, and even misdemeanors, may not picture among the accidents of our life; such like are the pounds that take care of themselves, but the "mean" pence, which require looking after, are little envies, and jealousies, and rancors, petty snobberies of display, small exhibitions of "being better than this man or greater than that; these, I repeat to you, accumulate on a man's nature just the same miracles fasten on a ship's bottom—from mere time, and it is wonderful what damage can come of such paltry obstacles.

I very much doubt if a Roman emperor regarded the chained captive who followed his chariot with a more supreme pride than I bestowed upon that miserable old waiter who now bowed himself to the ground before me, and when I ordered my dinner for four o'clock, and said, that probably I might have a friend to dine with me, his humiliation was positive.

"I wish I knew the secret of your staying here," said Mary Crofton, as we drove along; "why will you not tell it?"

"Perhaps it might prove indiscreet, Mary; our friend Potts may have become a 'mauvais sujet' since we have seen him last."

I wrapped myself in a mysterious silence, and only smiled.

"London, of all places to stop at!" resumed she, pettishly. "There is nothing remarkable in the scenery, no art treasures, nothing socially agreeable; what can it possibly be that detains you in such a place?"

"My dear Mary," said Crofton, "you are, without knowing it, violating a hallowed principle; you are no less than lending into temptation. Look at poor Potts there, and you will see that while he knows in his inmost heart the secret which detains him here is some passing and insignificant circumstance unworthy of mention, you have, by imparting to it a certain importance, suggested to his mind the necessity of a story; give him now but five minutes to collect himself, and I'll engage that he will 'come out' with a romantic incident that would have seen the light but for a woman's curiosity."

"Good Heavens!" thought I, "can this be a true interpretation of my character? Am I the weak and impressionable creature this would bespeak me?" I must have blushed deeply at my own reflections, for Crofton quickly added,

"Don't get angry with me, Potts, any more than you would with a friend who'd say, 'Take care how you pass over that bridge, I know it is rotten and must give way.'"

"Let me answer you," said I, courageously, for I was anxious to be up in my assigned place before another. "It is more than likely that you, with your active habits and stirring notions of life, would have no sympathy with those, neither wanting riches nor honors, would adopt some simple sort of dreary existence, and think that the green alleys of the beach wood, or the little path beside the river, pleasanter resorting than the gilded ante-chamber of a palace; and just as likely is it that you would take him roundly to task for his neglected opportunities and misapplied talents, and stigmatize as inglorious indolence what might as possibly be called a contented humility. I would only say, that you should one man be the measure of another? The load you could carry with ease might serve to crush me, and I have often felt the slightest burdens that would sink my strength, and in bearing which I might taste a sense of duty generated in your mind."

"I have no patience with you," began Crofton, warmly; but his sister stopped him with an imploring look, and then, turning to me, said:

"Edward fancies that every one can be as energetic and active as himself, and occasionally forgets what you have just so remarkably and so to the relative capacities of different people."

"I want him to do something, to be something besides a dreamer!" burst he in almost angrily.

"Well, then," said I, you shall see me begin at this moment, for I shall get down here and walk briskly back to the town." I called to the postilions to pull up at the next time, and in spite of remonstrances, entreaties—almost beseechings from Mary Crofton—I persisted in my resolve, and bade them farewell.

Crofton was so much hurt that he could scarcely speak, and when he gave me his hand, it was in the coldest of manners.

"But you'll dine with us, positively, won't you?" said Mary; "we shall meet at Rome?"

"I really wonder, Mary, how you can force our acquaintanceship on Mr. Potts, when he plainly declined. Good-by—farewell," said he to me.

"Good-by," said I, with a gulp that almost choked me; and with a heart throbbing, bursting me standing in the train of dust it had raised. Every crack of the postboys' whips gave me a shock as though I had felt the thong on my own shoulders, and, at last, as swaying round a turn of the road the carriage disappeared from view, such was the sense of utter desolation that came over me, that I sat down on a stone by the wayside and cried bitterly. I do not know if I ever felt such an utter sense of abandonment as at these moments. "What a wealth of friends must a man possess," thought I, "who can afford to squander them in this fashion!" I recalled to mind how slightly the counsels that kindness alone could have prompted? Surely Crofton must know far more of life than I did?" From this, I went on to inquire why it was that the world should visit with unforgiving to idleness in men of small fortune, since, if no burden to the community, they ought to be free to their richer brethren. It was a puzzling theme, and though I revolved it long, I made but little of it, the only solution that occurred to me being that the splendors of humble man is not relieved by the splendors and luxuries which surround a rich man's leisure, and that the former is without the pretension of ease unassociated with riches. In what a profound philosophy was it, then, that Diogenes rolled his tub about the streets, and was a mock purpose in the act that must have flattered his fellow-citizens. I feel assured that a great deal of the butterfly-hunting and beetle-gathering that we get credit for is only a like device. They are a set of idle folk anxious to indulge their indolence without reproach.

Thus pondering and cogitating, I strolled back to the town. So still and silent was it, so free from all movement of traffic or business, that I was actually in the very streets of it without knowing it. There were streets without passengers, and shops without customers, and even cafés without guests, and I wondered within myself why people should thus congregate to do nothing, and I rambled on from street to alley, and from alley to lane, never changing upon one who had any thing on hand. At last I found myself beside of the lake, along which a little quay ran for some distance, ending in a sort of terraced walk, now crowded with loungers and idlers. There were at least the charms of fresh air and scenery here, though the worthy citizens seemed to hold them cheaply, and I sat down on a bench at one where, by a broad flight of steps, the terrace communicated with the lake; a spot, doubtless, where, once on a time, the burghers took the water and went out a pleasuring with fat fraus and frauleins. I had reached the end and was about to turn back again, when I caught sight of a man seated on one of the lower steps employed in watching two little toy ships which he had just launched. Now this seemed to me the very climax of indolence, and I set myself down on the parapet to observe him. His proceedings were indeed of the strangest; for as there was no wind to fill the sails, and his vessels lay still and becalmed, he appeared to have bethought him of another mode to impart interest to them. He weighted one of them with little stones till she brought her gunwale level with the water, and then pressing her down gently with his hand he made her sink slowly down to the bottom. I'm not quite certain whether I laughed outright, or that some exclamation escaped me as I looked, but some noise I must unquestionably have made, for he started and turned his head, and I knew Harpar, the Englishman whom I had met the day before at Constance.

"Well, you are not much the wiser after all," said he, gruffly, and without ever saluting me.

There was in the words, and the fierce expression of his features, something that made me suspect him of insanity, that would willingly have retired without reply had he not risen and approached me.

"Eh," repeated he, with a sneer, "ain't I right? You can make nothing of it?"

"I really don't understand you!" said I, "I came down by the merest accident, and never was more astonished than to see you here."

"Oh, of course; I am well used to that sort of thing," went he on in the same tone of scoff. "I've had some experience of these kinds of accidents myself. You would say, no one, you're not within one thousand miles of it, no, nor any man in Europe."

It was quite clear to me now that he was mad, and my only care was to get speedily clear of him.

"I'm not surprised," said I, with an assumed ease—"I'm not surprised at your having taken to so simple an amusement, for really in a place so dull as this any mode of passing the time would be welcome."

"Simple enough when you know it," said he, with a peculiar look.

"You attach much might, I suppose?" said I, eager to get conversation into some pleasanter channel.

"Yes, I got here very late. I had the misfortune to sprain my ankle, and this detained me a long time on the way, and may keep me for a couple of days more."

I learned where he was stopping in the town, and seeing with what pain and difficulty he moved, I offered him my aid to assist him on his way.

"Well, I'll not refuse your help," said he, direly; "but just go along yonder, about five-and-twenty paces, and you shall I'll join you. You understand me, I suppose?"

Now I really did not understand him, except to believe that his proximity and to suggest to me the notion of profiting by his lameness to make my escape with all speed. I conclude that many persons have entertained this course, for I obeyed his injunctions to the very letter, and waited till he came up to me. He did so very slowly, and evidently in much suffering. Leaning on a stick he moved while he carried his two little boats in the other.

"Shall I take charge of these for you?" said I, offering to relieve him.

"No, don't trouble yourself," said he, in the same rude tone. "Nobody touches these but myself."

I now gave him my arm and we moved slowly along.

"What has become of the vagabonds? Are they here with you?" asked he, abruptly.

"I parted with them yesterday," said I, shortly, and not wishing to enter into further explanations.

"And you did wisely," rejoined he, with a serious air. "Even when these sort of creatures have nothing to plot about them, they are bad company, out of the hap-hazard chance way they gain a livelihood. If you reduce life to a game, you must learn to play like a gambler. Now, there's one feature of that sort of existence intolerable to an honest man: it is, that to win himself, some one else must lose. Do you understand me?"

"I do, and am much struck by what you say."

"Is that true?" said he, with a nudge of his elbow against my side—"in that case you might as well have not come down to watch me! eh?"

I protested stoutly against this mistake, but I could plainly perceive that very little success. "Let it be, let it be," said he, with a shake of the head. "As I said before, if you saw the thing done before your eyes you'd make nothing of it. I'm not afraid of you, or all the men in Europe! There now, there's a challenge to the whole of 'em. Let 'em down seven of ye, with the problem before ye, and see what you'll make of it."

"Ah," thought I, "this is madness. Here is a poor monomaniac led away into the land of wild thoughts and fancies by one dominating caprice: who knows whether out of the realm of this illusion he may not be a man acute and sensible?"

"No, no," muttered he, half aloud; "there are, maybe, half a dozen men in the world at this manufacturing steam-engines; but it took one head, just one head, to set them all a working, and it wasn't for want of brains, the world at that day wouldn't be five miles in advance of what it was a century back. I see," added he, after a moment, "you don't feel much interest in these sort of things. Your line of parts is the walking gentleman, eh? Well, bear in mind it don't pay; no, sir, it don't pay! Here, this is my way; my lodging is down this lane. I'll not ask you to come further; thank you for your help, and good-by."

"Let us not part here; come up to the inn and dine with me," said I, affecting his own blunt and abrupt manner.

"Why should I dine with you?" asked he, roughly.

"I can't exactly say," stammered I, "except out of good fellowship—just as, for instance, I accepted your invitation t'other morning to breakfast."

"Ah, yes, to be sure, so you did. Well, I'll come. We shall be all alone, I suppose?"

"Quite alone."

"All right, for I have no cost but this one!" and he looked down at the coarse sleeve as he spoke, with a strange and sad smile, and then waving his hand in token of farewell, he said, "I'll join you in half an hour," and disappeared up the lane.

I have already owned that I did not like this man; he had a certain short abrupt way that repelled me at every moment. When he differed in opinion with me he was not satisfied to record his dissent, but he must set about demolishing my reasons, and this with a self-assurance pervaded all he said. There was, too, that business-like, practical tone about him, that was fearfully on the sensitive fibre of the idler's nature.

It was exactly in proportion as his society was disagreeable to me that I felt a species of pride in associating with him, as though to say, "I am not one of those who must be fawned on and flattered. I am of a healthier and manlier stamp; I can afford to hear my judgments arraigned, and my opinions opposed." And in this humor I ascended the stairs of the hotel, and entered the room where our table was already laid out.

To compensate, so far as they could, for the rude reception of the day before, they had given me now the "grand apartment" of the inn, which, by a long balcony, looked over the lake and all that beautiful range that leads to the Splugen pass. A beautiful bouquet of fresh flowers ornamented the centre of the small dinner-table, tastily decked with Bohemian glass, and napkins with lace borders. I rather liked this little display of elegance. It was a sort of ally on my side against the utilitarian plainness of my guest.

As I walked up and down the room, awaiting his arrival, I could not help a sigh, and a very deep one too, over the thought of what had been my enjoyment that moment if my guest had been one of a different temperament—a man willing to take me on my own terms, and ready to accept any version I should like to give of myself. How gracefully, how charmingly I could have played the host to such a man! What vigor would it have imparted to my imagination—what brilliancy to my fancy! With what a generous grace might I have accompanied my hospitalities, as though such occasions were the daily habit of my life; whereas a dinner à deux at a country inn was nothing more or less than an airing with a "slave in the chariot"—a perpetual reminder, like the face of a poor relation, that my lot was cast in a humble sphere, and it was no use trying to disguise it.

"What's all this for?" said Harpar's harsh voice, as he entered the room. "Why didn't you order one bottle of claret? know wine is the common room, and not a banquet in this fashion? You must be well aware I couldn't do this sort of thing. Why, then, have you attempted it with me?"

"I have always thought it was a host's prerogative," said I, "to be the arbiter of his own entertainment."

"So it might where he was the arbiter of his purse; but you were well enough informed to ignor I have any pretension to these costly ways, and they have this disadvantage, that they make all intercourse stolid and unnatural. If you and I had sat down to table, each with our coat suits, with wigs and bags, ain't it likely we'd be easy and cordial together? Well, this is preferable to the other."

"I am really sorry," said I, with a forced appearance of courtesy, "to have incurred so serious a breach; but you must allow me this one transgression before I begin to profit by it." And so saying, I rang the bell and ordered dinner.

Harpar made no reply, but walked the room, with his hands deep in his pockets, humming a tune to himself as he went.

At last we sat down at table; every thing was excellent and admirably served, but we ate on in silence, not a syllable exchanged between us. As the dessert appeared I tried to open conversation. I affected to seem easy and unconcerned, but the cold half stern look of my companion quite froze me, and I grew timid and very sad and much discouraged sipping my wine.

"May I order some brandy-and-water? I like it better than these French wines," asked he, abruptly; and, as I arose to ring for it, he added, "and may I trouble you for having a pipe of strong Cavendish?" And therewith he produced a leather bag and a very much smoked meerschaum, short and capable of much fire service. As he thrust his hand into the pouch a small bont, about the size of a lady's thimble, rolled out from amidst the tobacco, and he quickly took it and placed it in his waistcoat pocket—the act being done with a sort of hurry that with a man of less self-possession might have perhaps excited confusion.

"You fancy you've seen something, don't you?" said he, with a defiant laugh. "I'd wager a thousand acts, if I had them, that you think at this moment you have made a great discovery. Well, there it is, make much of it!" As he spoke, he produced the little boat and laid it down before me. I own that this speech and the act convinced me that he was insane; I was aware that intense suspectfulness is the great characteristic of madness, and every thing tended to show that he was deranged.

Rather to conceal what was passing in my own mind than out of any curiosity I took up the little toy to examine it. It was beautifully made, and finished with a most perfect neatness; the only thing I could not understand being four small holes on each side of the keel, fastened by four little plugs.

"What are these for?" asked I.

"Can't you guess?" said he, laughingly.

"No; I have never seen such before."

"Well," said he, musingly, "perhaps they are puzzling—I suppose they are. But mayhap, too, if I thought you'd guess the meaning, I'd not have been so ready to show it to you." And with this he replaced the boat in his pocket and smoked away. "You ain't a genius, my worthy friend—that's a fact," said he, sententiously.

"I opine that the same judgment might be passed upon a great many?" said I, testily.

"No," continued he, following on his own thoughts, without heeding my remark, "you'll not set the Thames afire."

"Is that the best test of a man's ability?" asked I, sneeringly.

"You're the sort of fellow that ought to be—let us see now what you ought to be—yes, you're just the stamp of man for an apothecary."

"You are so charming in your frankness," said I, "that you almost tempt me to imitate you."

"And why not? sure we oughtn't to talk to each other like two devils in waiting. Out with what you have to say."

"I was just thinking," said I—"led to it by that speculative turn of yours—I was just thinking in what strange your abilities would have preeminently distinguished you."

"Well, have you hit it?"

"I'm not quite certain," said I, trying to screw up my courage for an impertinence, "but I half suspect that in our great national works—our lines of railroad, for instance—there must be a strong infusion of men with tastes and habits resembling yours."

"You mean the navvies?" broke he in. "You're right. I was a navvy once; I turned the first spadeful of earth on the Coppleston Junction, and, seeing what a good thing might be made of it, I suggested task-work to my comrades, and we netted from four-and-six to five shillings a day, each. In eight months after I was made an overseer; in six months more seemings can be good alloys to a strong head and a stout will."

I do not believe that the most angry rebuke, the most sarcastic rejoinder, could have covered me with a tenth part of the shame and confusion than did these few quiet words. I'd have given worlds, if I had them, to make a due reparation for my rudeness, but I knew not how to accomplish it. I looked in his face to read, if I might, some trait by which his manner might be approached; but I might as well have gazed at a line of railroad to guess the sort of town that it led to. The stolid, rugged, but calm countenance seemed to imply little else than daring and determination, and I could not but wonder how I had ever dared to take a liberty with one of his stamp.

"Well," said I, at last, and wishing to lead him back to his story, "and after being made inspector—"

"You can speak German well," said he, totally inattentive to my question; "just ask one of these people where there will be any conveyance from this to Ragatz."

"Ragatz of all places!" exclaimed I.

"Yes; they tell me it's good for the rheumatics, and I have got some old shoulder pains I'd like to shake off before winter. And then this sprain that I forgot I shall not be able to walk much for some days to come."

"Ragatz is on my road; I'm about to cross the Splugen this day; I hear you company so far, if you have no objection."

"Well, it may not seem civil to say it, but I have an objection," said he, rising from the table. "When I've got weighty things on my mind I've a bad habit of talking of them to myself aloud. I can't help it, and so I keep strictly about my plans are all dead and settled; after that, there's no danger of my revealing them to any one. There now, you have my reason, and you'll not dispute that it's a good one."

"You may not be too distrustful of yourself," said I, laughing, "but certainly you pay me too flattering in your estimate of my acuteness."

"I'll not risk it," said he, bluntly, as he sought for that.

"Wait a moment," said I. "You told me at Constance that you were in want of money; at the time I was not exactly in funds myself. Yesterday, however, I received a remittance, and if ten or twenty pounds be of any service, they are heartily at your disposal."

He looked at me fixedly, almost sternly, for a minute or two, and then said,

"Is this true, or is it that you have changed your mind about me?"

"True," said I, "strictly true."

"Will this loan—I mean it to be a loan—inconvenience you much?"

"No, no, I make you the offer freely."

"I take it, then. Let me have ten pounds; and write down that an acknowledgment I am to remit it some day or other, though I can't say when."

"There may be some difficulty about that," said I. "Stay, I mean to be at Rome some time in the winter; send it to me there."

"To what banker?"

"I have no banker, I never had a banker. There's my name, and let the post-office be the address."

"Whichever way you're bent on going you're not on the road to be a rich man," said Harpar, as he deposited my gold in his leather purse; "but I hope you'll not lose by me. Good-by." He gave me his hand, not very warmly or cordially either, and was gone ere I well knew it.

Asthma.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

From Rev. D. Letz, Frankfort, Ill. "An old lady of our acquaintance has been greatly afflicted with Asthma for many years, and has tried a multiplicity of prescriptions, with little or no effect. My wife sent her a part of a box of the 'Bronchial Troches,' which, a few days we heard that she found great relief from their use, and to-day she sent a note, stating some five miles to procure more: we had only one box left, but could get them." Brown's Bronchial Troches, or Cough Lozenges, are sold throughout the United States.

NOW READY,
AMERICAN SLAVERY JUSTIFIED.

AMERICAN SLAVERY DISTINGUISHED FROM THE SLAVERY OF ENGLISH THEORISTS, AND JUSTIFIED BY THE LAW OF NATURE. By Rev. SAMUEL SEABURY, D.D., Author of "Discourses on the Supremacy and Sufficiency of Holy Scripture." 1 vol. 12mo, 318 pp. Cloth extra. Price $1.

The country has been flooded with anti-slavery arguments; anti-slavery societies have persevered in systematic, vigorous, and ingenious efforts to inculcate their particular views by means of public harangues, newspapers, sermons, sermon tracts, and almanacs, and yet they are losing the public. Meanwhile, but very little has been done to present the other side of the subject. The American people believe in full and free discussion, and can hardly wish to decide any question after hearing only one side, and even those who have formed opinions will be willing to consider arguments, even though they tend to differ from conclusions which may be entirely satisfactory, and which are at once able, forcible, and kind.

Every book offers such arguments from such a source.

Premature Loss of the Hair,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is, at the same time, unrivalled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

A BOX OF SOAP AND A NEW YORK PAPER FOR $3.

OFFICE OF R. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 66, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington St.,
New York, Feb. 9, 1861.

I am bringing out a new and valuable article of Soap, which I term,

SUPERIOR FRENCH CHEMICAL ERASIVE SOAP,

put up in boxes of 60 bars, one pound each. The genuine article of Soap is a decided novelty in the trade. In introduction to the American public, been most favorably known as the best and cheapest Washing Soap in the market. Recent discoveries (known to no other manufacturer) enable me to produce an article possessing chemical "Detersive and Erasive" qualities far superior to any other Soap in market.

I CHALLENGE THE WORLD TO PRODUCE ITS EQUAL.

This Soap is rapidly taking the place of all other Soaps wherever introduced. One pound will go as far as three pounds of ordinary family Soap. Put one quarter this time and labor are required to do the same amount of washing as with the best of family soap. It will wash in either hard or salt water. CLOTHES NEED NO BOILING and but little rubbing with the hands. THUS AVOID ING THEIR WEAR UPON THE WASHBOARD. It does not injure the fabric; on the contrary it preserves it, and fixes the colors. It will remove paint, grease, or stains of all kinds. Directions used in each box for making ONE POUND OF THE ABOVE SOAP into THREE GALLONS OF HARD-WATER SOAP. Send for a box, and give it a trial. If you do not want a whole box yourself, get your neighbor to join you, and divide it. Believing that no family which has once used this Soap will ever be without it, and a long increase to have its merits widely known, I have made arrangements with the proprietors of the following first-class papers (of whom have tried the Soap, and know its value), by which I can offer for the present to all or to any person remitting me $3 on any relevant bank in the United States, a box of the above Soap, and a receipt for one year's subscription to either of the following New York papers, namely:

The Weekly Tribune, 1 year; The Weekly Times, 1 year; The Weekly Leader, 1 year; The Weekly Mercury, 1 year; The Weekly Post, 1 year; The Weekly World, 1 year; Frank Leslie's Illustrated News, 1 year; Frank Leslie's Monthly Magazine, 6 mos.; Harper's Weekly, 6 mos.; Family Weekly Herald, 6 mos.; New York Ledger, 6 mos.; Semi-Weekly Tribune, Times, World, and Post, 6 mos.; Daily Tribune, and Times, 3 mos.; Daily Post, 2 mos.; The Home Journal, 1 year; The Evangelist, 1 year; Independent, Subscribers, 1 year; Independent, Old Subscribers, 6 mos.; The Examiner, 1 year; The Methodist, 1 year; The Century, 1 year; Agriculturist, 1 year; Christian Advocate and Journal; The Scottish Am. Journal, 1 year; The Chronicle, 1 year; Vanity Fair, 1 year; The New York Observer, 1 year; The Illustrated Phrenological Weekly, 1 year; Am. Phrenological Journal and Water-Cure Journal, 1 year.

Scientific American, the best mechanical paper in the world—seventeenth year—Volume 3 commences Jan. 5, 1861.

Parties residing in New York City or Brooklyn, N. Y., will please add 50c. to pay the carrier's fee.

Please be particular to name and give full address for shipping the goods. Any give the name of your Post-Office, with the State and County in which you reside, as follows:

R. T. BABBITT, No. 70 Washington Street, N. Y.

P. S.—I will send the Soap, without paper, on the receipt of $4 00.

I refer to the following parties, from each of which I have received $5, with an order for one box of Soap, and a paper, to which they take many of them subscribe. I have received letters, speaking in the highest terms of the Soap, and through their influence have received many others:

JAN THE HAWKER.

HEAVILY, heavily hangs the sky,
All dull and glazed as a dead man's eye;
The clouds in the north are sullen and low,
Bulging and bursting with ominous snow.
The world looks numb, and the air is chill,
As Jan the hawker comes over the hill.

Tall and strong and lusty is he;
Lithe in his limbs as a sapling tree;
No better man in the country round,
In wrestling ring or on foot-ball ground;
No fleeter foot, or no stronger hand,
Nor a kindlier heart is in all the land.

Jan is clad in his best array,
His face is bright and rosy and gay,
And the cocker spaniels that dog his heel
A sense of holiday seem to feel;
And each to attract his attention tries,
As they look in his face with their great brown eyes.

A quaint old gauntlet gloves his hand,
Curiously broidered in seam and band;
And there with pleats and a silver bell
Is sitting the Merlin he loves so well,
Fluming each feather that sits awry,
And ringing the world with its lustrous eye.

The villagers smile as Jan goes by,
And the maidens follow with envious eye;
For well do they know where Jan is bound—
Over thirty long miles of ground,
Over the moorland far below,
And up to the hills where the cold winds blow.

'Tis just a twelvemonth, lacking a day,
Since Jan was plighted to Bessie Gray;
And once a month, in shine or storm,
He trudges across to her father's farm;
While the girls of the village they pout and sneer,
And think that he might have looked more near.

Cutting and cold the north winds blow;
Heavily, heavily falls the snow;
Night and day, and day and night,
Falling and drifting silent and white;
Choking the highway and thickening the air,
And drowning the landmarks every where.

And so till Sunday the storm keeps on;
The buried country looks white and wan;
The rustics have plodded their way to church,
And gossiping stand in the old stone porch;
When they hear a shout and a murmuring din,
And Bessie's father comes staggering in.

"Jan is lost in the snow!" he cries,
With a terrible fear in his haggard eyes.
"Last night at my door I heard a moan,
And then stood the lad's three dogs alone;
Thin and famished with hunger and thirst,
And howling as if their hearts would burst."

He scarce has finished ere fifty men
Are speeding over the snow again:
Over the moorland and up in the hill,
Where the drifts are lying quiet and still,
Shouting and whistling and calling Jan,
But with never a trace of the missing man.

White, all white, so white and cold,
Whiteness covering forest and wold!
Every outline is smooth and fair:
A breathless hush in the drowsy air;
Earth is so quiet that none might know
Of the terrible secret beneath the snow!

Old Farmer Gray comes trolling on;
Hope and strength are well-nigh gone.
He shouts and shouts through the dreary sky;
He stops and listens—but no reply!
And then he thinks of Bessie at home,
Waiting for him who never will come!

Hark! Is that the scream of a hawk?
The farmer stops in his weary walk.
Again and again! His ear is sure,
So he whistles the hawker's favorite lure;
And he hears the scream, and the silver bell,
The bell of the Merlin he knows so well.

Calling, shouting, and whistling still.
He dashes lustily up the hill;
Till, lo! from the midst of a long white rift,
He sees one gauntleted hand uplift,
And on't the Merlin, with jess and bell,
Tearing the flesh that it loved so well.

Heavily, heavily hangs the sky,
As dull and glazed as the dead man's eye.
Heavily the lusty lungs are stilled
Of Jan, the model of manful strength;
And heavy the heart of Farmer Gray
As he mourns with his daughter that sorrowful day.

COTTON SUPPLY.

OUR Revolution has created a cotton panic in Europe. Merchants and statesmen foresee contingencies which may interfere with the production of cotton in this country; and they are peering round eagerly in search of new cotton fields. India, Australia, the Mediterranean shores, Africa, the West Indies, Central America, and Brazil are summoned loudly to supply the anticipated deficit in the cotton product from the United States. The British Government has directed its consuls to devote especial attention to the subject of cotton culture; and large sums of money have been subscribed by millers and factors for the development of the plant in various localities. A glance at figures may perhaps shed some light upon the prospects of the new movement.

Europe derives its cotton supply from five sources—the United States, Brazil, the West Indies, the East Indies, and Egypt. During the year 1860 the European consumption was 4,532,000 bales, distributed as follows:

From the United States	3,648,000 bales.
From Brazil	186,000 "
From the West Indies	127,000 "
From the East Indies	273,000 "
From Egypt	198,000 "
Total	4,532,000 "

If we look back a few years we shall find that the proportion has not varied materially. Counting by thousands of bales, the cotton supply of Europe has been as follows for the past seven years:

	1854.	1855.	1856.	1857.	1858.	1859.	1860.
From the U. S.	2430	2252	2923	3275	3778	3930	3648
From Brazil	136	160	158	199	179	190	186
From West I.	31	31	31	33	34	36	47
From East I.	203	203	272	295	460	514	573
From Egypt	165	194	193	130	157	149	158
Total	3069	3135	3665	3271	4535	4583	4570

It will thus be perceived that while there has been no perceptible increase in the cotton supply from Brazil, the West Indies, and Egypt during the past seven years, the supply from the United States and from the East Indies has increased fifty per cent.

The price has generally been governed by the condition of the crops in this country. When it became known in Europe that the supply from the United States in 1857 would be short, the price rose, in October of that year, to 9½d. a pound at Liverpool; it fell last year, on the advices of a very handsome crop, to 5½d. in July.

From the fact that strenuous efforts have been made for many years to increase the production of Egypt, the West Indies, and Brazil, while the above table shows that they yield no more now than they did in 1854, it may be inferred that they have reached their maximum product, and that no exertions of the European cottonspinners can extract from them more cotton than they now export.

The question whether Europe can obtain cotton from countries outside of the United States turns upon the possibilities of yield which Colonizations in India, and upon the development of the plant in new regions.

As to British India. In 1857, it is shown above that British India exported 776,000 bales of the bale being, however, as we suppose, of 220 pounds only, the total product was not quite equal to 360,000 American bales. Can this product be increased to five or ten fold? In the face of it, such a development seems impossible. Still, it is as well to look things in the face, and it must be admitted that there are reasons for expecting a very large increase of cotton supply from India. Since 1857 that country has passed out of the hands of the East India Company. The obstacles which that corporation systematically threw in the way of individual enterprise are now removed. English men and English companies may now grow cotton in any part of India with the approval of the Government—a thing which was impossible under the Company's rule. It is reasonable to suppose, on the one hand, that the new Government of India will offer every encouragement to cotton culture, and, on the other, that the fears of the European planters, aroused by the Revolution in our Southern States, will stimulate them to offer liberal encouragement to the growth of Indian cotton. Labor is cheaper in India than in our Southern States; every variety of climate can be found; and there is no difficulty in procuring skilled managers and machinery. Under ordinary circumstances, the proximity of our cotton fields to the work-shops of Europe would have afforded them an insurmountable advantage over Indian rivals; but if politics are to disturb our agriculture and our commerce, who can foresee the result?

It is argued by European political economists that a very large section of the world's surface is adapted to the growth of cotton; that it is not indigenous to the States of this or any country; that it may be produced even to better advantage elsewhere. For instance:

Dr. Livingstone reports that cotton grows wild throughout the regions of Central Africa which he has explored, and that the establishment of friendly commercial relations would lead to the cultivation of the plant on an extended scale for export. This region has its rivers whose mouth is on the eastern shore of Africa.

Cotton is already freely grown for export in the region through which the Niger flows, in Western Africa. One port—Abeokuta—is said to have increased its cotton export from half a bale in 1850 to 2000 bales in 1860. Could the supply from this source be increased?

The Emperor of the French has had careful surveys made of Algeria, with a view to the development of its capacity as a cotton-growing region. It is reported in the Paris journals that they have proved that Algeria can grow all the cotton needed for the consumption of the French mills.

Mr. E. G. Squier, the well-known Central American traveler, publishes a statement to the effect that Honduras is admirably adapted for the growth of cotton; that the plant, which is annual on our sea-islands, is perennial there, and reaches a growth unknown to our latitudes.

Finally, writers in European journals predict a speedy development of cotton culture on shores of the Mediterranean which have never grown a pound of the staple, but which are said to be adapted to its production; and other writers, alluding to the enormous production of cotton in Turkey, affirm that if attention were directed to the subject, an ample supply could be obtained from thence.

These are the principal countries to which Europeans are looking for a supply of cotton—in view of a probable failure of the supply from the United States.

It may be remarked that to produce cotton equal to that of our Slave States, not only climate, but labor, is required. The product of our Slave States could be doubled if they had twice as many negroes to work the cotton fields. And it will serve the European spinners but little to discover soil and climate suited to the growth of cotton, if they can not likewise find laborers to cultivate the plant. This deficiency will at once prove fatal to the proposed culture of cotton in Australia, for instance, which does not contain laborers; and in the West Indies, where cotton culture affords no room to any extent if labor had been forthcoming.

Whether the free negroes of Africa, in the regions watered by the Zambesi and the Niger, will consent to work sufficiently for whole seasons, in order to develop fairly the capabilities of the soil to produce cotton, is one of those problems which can only be solved by experience. Dr. Livingstone has the agents of certain Cotton Supply Associations seem to be sanguine that they will; the experience of Jamaica is on the side of the negative.

It is understood that the Emperor of the French proposes to procure labor from China. Contracts are said to have been made by his agents for large supplies of coolie laborers for Algeria. Mr. Livingstone has been pursued by Great Britain for some time past; Trinidad, and other West India Islands, are supplied with coolie labor, and their crops are raised almost entirely by coolies. The emigration of coolie emigration from Hindostan and China be once established on a permanent basis, no limits can be set to the amount of labor which can thus be obtained. It is said to contain 400,000,000, and Hindostan 150,000,000 inhabitants. Under energetic management, half a million laborers could be conveyed annually from these countries to cotton fields; and in ten years Algeria might contain three or four millions of coolie cotton-producers.

The attempts which have been or will be made by Europe to emancipate itself from dependence on this country for cotton have, hitherto, invariably failed. It is well, however, that our success and our good fortune in the past should not produce carelessness of the proceedings which are being had to dethrone King Cotton in the future.

STAY LAWS.

WE trust that our Southern friends will believe that we have no partisan purpose in view if we direct their attention to the fatal consequences of the stay laws which are now being enacted in certain Southern States. Such measures are calculated to do far more injury to the people of the States which enact them than to the creditors whose just defraud of their just dues. Yet Georgia has already passed an act postponing the compulsory collection of debts till New-Year 1862; similar measures are pending before the Legislatures of Alabama and South Carolina, and have been broached in Mississippi and Louisiana.

According to the Constitution of the United States (Art. I., sect. 10) "no State...shall pass any...law impairing the obligation of contracts." Under this section it is probable that the Supreme Court would decree the invalidity of State stay laws. If, however, it should be urged either, on the one hand, that a postponement of writs of execution does not impair the original validity of contracts, or, on the other, that States which have seceded are no longer bound by the Constitution of the United States, it would nevertheless remain obvious that the practical effect of stay laws must be detrimental to the communities which enact them.

For credit is the life and soul of trade, enterprise, and material prosperity; and laws impairing or postponing the just claims of creditors are necessarily fatal to credit.

For many years our Southern States have enjoyed first-rate credit, both at the North and abroad. Southern obligations have always been preferred in New York to obligations from the East or West. For instance, it has been estimated that the South owes the North at present from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000. Southern men have been considered here as good under all circumstances. Their honor has been relied upon to any extent. Houses which would not trust Western or Eastern dealers a hundred dollars have been delighted to give credits of thousands to Southerners. The simple reason was that people have had an undying faith in the honor of the Southern people—a firm conviction that under no circumstances would they seek to evade payment of their debts. Is this faith, is this conviction to be demolished now by the passage of stay laws?

We warn our Southern friends against the perils of the path into which some of their leaders are hurrying them. Their wealth and prosperity and expansion are in a large measure the fruit of the credit they have enjoyed. Credit is very sensitive: they should not, for their own sake, subject theirs to any rude ordeals.

THE LOUNGER.

GOING! GONE!

EIGHT or nine years ago a jolly company set forth one morning from New York upon a railroad excursion. There were Mr. Fillmore, the President of the United States; and Mr. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State; and Mr. Graham, Secretary of the Navy, and other gentlemen of the cabinet. There were Senator Seward of New York, and Senator Douglas of Illinois, and other Senators and representatives of the people. All the politicians and ex-politicians of the State were also there, and a crowd of authors, artists, men of leisure, and merchants. The business company departed at early morning from the foot of Duane Street in a capacious and "splendid" steamer, and speedily disembarked at Piermont, just beyond the Palisades. There a crowd of the neighbors received them, and they entered the new and nice cars upon the broad gauge of the road. Like impatient locomotive, gay and excited with pretty flags, whistled and shrieked, and at length moved forward, and away went the jolly company into the heart of the hills.

The country left its work that day and came to look at the train, the first "through" train upon the Erie Railroad, that it might feast its eyes upon the promise and prophecy of things to come. Presidents, statesmen, artists, authors, merchants, were only so many samples of the accumulations and influences that should follow upon the opening of the road. The lovely valleys of the Susquehanna and the Delaware should be ready to be decked in belles. The tier of towns along the southern part of the State should feel the iron of the track, and spring into cities, as the squire feels the sword upon his shoulder and rises a knight. The subject valleys of the Chenango, the Genesee, and the rest, should start with the thrill of new life; and above all, the proud and domineering Central should go trembling low, and the great stream of Western travel be tapped at Dunkirk and turned into the coffers of the triumphant road.

The night was passed at Elmira. You remember, dear B., how we sat and scribbled late in our little room, writing the day's history while it was fresh, and how the hundreds of less fortunate friends, not members of the fourth estate, stretched their weary lengths upon sofas, and chairs, and floors. There were two new hotels for the city of Elmira that was to be a metropolis to-morrow. They were very comfortable and very new; but they swarmed with guests; and absolute happiness must have reigned in the hearts of all the hosts. It was not a night sacred to sleep, but who would lose a minute of the festival?

In the morning the journey was resumed. At every station there were shouts for some of the great men. The President bowed kindly. The Secretary of State showed his dark, imposing front and stared at the crowd with his deep, mournful eyes. Senators spoke a few words, standing upon the platform; and the senators spoke a great many. On went the train, cutting sentences and words in twain, as a farm was a wood. Then, a gust of hurrahs, hushed suddenly by distance, and then visits to the "saloon," which was administered with the utmost liberality.

Meanwhile the grand scenery along the route unrolled itself for admiration, more lovely and wild as the train went West. At length it was at Buffalo, and suddenly from one point, looking for many a mile over a descending ravine of tree tops, that seemed as solid and as smooth as a vast shaven lawn, the eager travelers beheld a glittering line along the horizon, and shouted for Lake Erie. Then, like fiery steeds impatient to drink, rushed the cars down, and with a prodigious plunge, at the afternoon of the second day rolled into Dunkirk, and the jolly company immediately overflowed with members of the little Dunkirk town. They slept in houses and on steamboats, and wherever a spot could be found; and the next day they parted. Some returned by the lake and Albany, some went westward, and some returned over the Erie road. At sunset of the day they arrived in Dunkirk Webster left from the terrace of the hotel, the last time I saw or heard him. His swarthy, gaunt, melancholy face is not to be forgotten. By its side, ever his shoulder, stood see the sun setting, and seeing that, you neither heard nor cared to hear what the weary voice was saying.

And so the great Erie Railroad was inaugurated. Its cost had been enormous. Yes; but what of that? It shortened travel to the West, it opened up an entirely new and wonderfully rich region, it wound through the finest farming country in the State; it was a stupendous enterprise, worthy the American people, worthy the imperial State of New York, etc., etc., etc. You will find it narrated in the reported eloquent speeches delivered upon the occasion from car platforms and the front steps of hotels. So it was triumphantly inaugurated, after many millions had been paid to build it. Many of the great men at the opening are dead—some actually, others only politically. The great hotels where we passed the nights in revelry, they are there—"though fallen, great." Little Dunkirk dropped asleep again the next day, and dreams upon the shore of her one event. The rich farming country, the fine landscape, the happy valleys, you may see them whenever you choose to take passage. But the great road itself, falling through every kind of disaster and bad repute, was sold last week—property, franchises, and all—for two hundred and twenty thousand dollars. That includes five mortgages and the back interest of about eight hundred thousand dollars. So we may say that the great road has gone with the great men who celebrated its opening.

It is another triumph of the "practical men;" and an indignant poet asks, "What right have such people as those who built the Erie Railroad to sneer at those of us who build railroads to the moon? The dividends in both cases are the same—pure moonshine: and with this advantage for us, that we started and expended nothing else. We posts went out to get wood, and returned with the very thing we went for. The 'practical men' went out for wood of another kind, and have returned shorn, and shorn very short indeed."

PHOTOMANIA.

The fashions of the drawing-room, in work and play, are always a pleasant study. They are as marvellous and as instant at any other fashion; often like fashions of dress, repeating themselves after long intervals. But science constantly reveals new varieties. A little while since the Potichomania—or, the pasting of pictures upon vases and glasses—was the most absorbing and interesting of the pastimes; but the fever of collecting card-photographs of friends and famous people is the most amiable form that the disease has recently assumed.

It began in Paris, of course, where they made the photographic cartes de visite. But the effect of these little pictures was so charming that the thought of preserving them in appropriate albums, and so creating a gallery of friendship and fame, was very obvious and natural. The artists in "fancy goods" immediately designed the albums, until now they are quite universal, and as fast as they are brought to us are taken up with enthusiasm. They are of various shapes and sizes; the most convenient being those that are of small quarto form, holding fifty cards.

With the albums came the cards of the chief living celebrities, except among the Americans, for they seem to be rather shy of this particular form of honour. But in a good collection you shall see the royal families in many groups and attitudes. The Queen of England, for instance, standing quietly, being, in a simple dark dress; or leaning over the Prince Consort's chair, who looks ardently up into her eyes: or sitting upon a terrace with her hand held by her sister, and the mute pledges of a happy royal love around them. There is also the Emperor over the way from Windsor, standing in front of a chair; or sitting in it and leaning forward, as if in travail of great state projects; or walking with a baton, in plain clothes, by the side of a fashionable woman, his wife; or leading the young Prince by the hand. The Empress, too, is presented in magic attitudes; and the young Imperial heir riding on a rocking-horse, or standing, a grenadier, drumming—always with the sword, the symbol of his papa's empire, L'epee, c'est la gaie. This tall, gaunt, and white-haired gentleman, in a helmet, is the sad king of Prussia; and this pretty Velasquez picture is the Queen of Spain, leaning over a young characteristically Spanish girl, in a fiercely-striped silk dress, writing at a carved table.

As you turn from these you are forced to confess that Bismarck has stamped his strong royal right upon any of them. Her Majesty of England looks like the reverend George Third. His Majesty of Prussia and Jack-in-the-bought, by the most loyal imagination, to resemble an ideal gentleman, in his appearance, at least; and her Majesty of Spain looks like any body's comfortable aunt. The sun does not respect the divinity that doth hedge a king. His only shows, more faithfully than Titian and Vandyck, that kings and queens may look like ordinary men and women. The sun is the most tremendous democrat. Let in light enough, and away go the regal fictions, like ghosts.

But these regular cards are not altogether interesting. Theirs, the French historian, a well-preserved, handsome, substantial Parisian gentleman of sixty; theirs, Habenicht, the Leipsic bookseller; theirs, Lord Brougham, Lord Clarendon, Lord Grey, and others thoroughly English, show how technically British in appearance are the British statesmen. Here is Garibaldi, winking in the Sicilian sun; and Cavour, with his high, broad, thoughtful brow, and the keen, penetrating common sense of his eyes; or Horace Greeley, crossing his leg as he sits, with his long mustache and pointed beard in shadow, or Alphonse Karr, with shaved black hair, a typical French face; or Sir David Dundas, white-haired and whiskered, equally English: or Baron Rothschild, leaning upon his hand, as if money might give him pain. These, and scores more. You make a bundled calls of interest upon as many people you would gladly see just as much of as you do upon these. And it is so much pleasanter to give fifty cents and be presented in slippers to Victoria in her daily dress, than to pay a hundred dollars for a court-dress, and bow to her Majesty in feathers!

There are plenty of others; the leading ladies at the Parisian Court, for instance. Duchesses and Princesses, and the corresponding gentlemen. The Duchess of Hamilton, of Alba, of Luxembourg; the Prince Murat and Prince Metternich; the Countess Montijo, mother of the Empress, and the Princess Mathilde, at your service. Here is Madeleine Brohan, of the Comedie, who knows how to sit for her picture; and lo! Ristori, Mario, and Grisi very well.

What a comment upon history it would be, if we could turn over some photograph album of any famous antecedent period, and know the men and women as they looked, and not as the preposterous court-painters represented them. The nose of history—and the court-painters have been always in conspiracy, and we have admired and condemned in a hundred wrong places where the sun would have put us all right. Shakespeare and his friends, Scott and his friends, Milton and his friends, Johnson and his friends, as the sun saw them and might have painted them, if science had only been shrewd enough to know that he was an artist, would not they be books to have and ponder?

Could there be a prettier present than an album filled with a choice selection of photographic cards?

MR. RAREY.

Mr. Rarey does much more than tame horses—he conquers prejudices. The old farmer, leaning upon his tumble-down wall that guards the patch of ground which he has tilled for forty years starvation for his family every year, sneers with the profoundest complacency at your suggestion that a little more knowledge would help him; that, in fact, science would give him a better dinner every day in the week. "My father did so, and he got on," is his final shaft reply to all your hints and arguments. "What my father did is good enough for me," is always the triumphant rejoinder of ignorance and jealousy.

Now a poor and intelligent farmer has many reasons for turning a deaf ear to whoever suggests a new thing. If my crop fails," he says, with conviction, "all is lost. I scarcely bring the year round as it is, and when I get from my farm all I count upon. But if I lose that, I should never breathe free again. I do not like that kind of science might help me; but there is a risk, and I can not afford to take a risk." It is true enough; for the young part of poverty is that you can not take the pretty safe risks of bettering your fortune which so often offer. The answer to the farmer is that it is not a risk—that science is not a lottery—and that its suggestions to him are based upon proved laws.

And the same kind of reply may be made to those who think that Rarey has a peculiar knack in managing horses. His system is founded upon laws which any sensible person can understand, and any calm, brave person can administer. His principle is, that he has to overcome an animal with brute force. It is akin to the principle that man may conquer a tempest at sea, by understanding the laws of material forces, so as to be able to steer his ship. Brute force is no match for mental force. Brute force is conquered by a superior of the same kind. If you could knock a horse down by a blow of your fist, you could then control him as Rarey does. But men can not knock horses over: then the sly brain suggests that the horse should be caught up, and the effect of knocking down, that is, of mastery, is produced, and the great, fiery animal owns his master's superiority.

Of course there must be no fear, no hesitation, and, above all, no losing of the temper; for the moment a man loses his temper, away goes his intellectual superiority, and he is left to a savage brute, while the other has four legs. But the jockey doctrine with horses has usually been that they must be thrashed and kicked into it. The general stable practice is a system of kicking and jerking and shouting. Reform it altogether, says Rarey. And he said something which should not be seen so generally remarked—that a woman could usually tame a horse more readily than a man, because she has much more quiet and equable and gentle than he.

This is the quality which is always observed in sudden emergency of any kind, requiring watching and attendance; and especially in the management of women. The still, direct, sympathetic efficiency of women, whenever they are on serious duty, is a constant contrast to the popular assumption against their executive capacity.

Besides, why should not women tame horses well, since some men in their case have an animal period of childhood? Men are not the best trainers in their own nurseries—it would be droll if it should turn out that their wives can manage the stables better too! Well, we shall gradually learn that rights are proportioned to powers. The superior sex must become its guard. Its prerogative of oaths, and blows, and general jawing in the management of horses may prove to be not so very valuable; and when Mr. Rarey has succinctly demonstrated that fact in the stables, he had's be better step into the house and demonstrate how success of the same principle among human beings?

THE LION HEART.

It is curious to observe how much of the final opinion of the world upon any man's life is determined upon other grounds than those of fact; and we can always see at any moment of our own history how popular cries of prejudice surround men and measures. The popular idea of Henry Eighth, of England, is declared by Froude, the historian, to be entirely false, and entirely unfounded. That may or may not be; but there is no doubt that Shakespeare is responsible for much of the character of that opinion. The Calif Haroun al Raschid is known to us almost exclusively as he appears in the "Arabian Nights;" and Sir William Wallace is in the general estimation the hero painted in the "Scottish Chiefs."

In the same way one art has a kind of veto upon the others. Shakespeare describes Hamlet in one way, but Sir Thomas Lawrence painted John Kemble as Hamlet in quite another; and it is the Kemble and Lawrence Hamlet that is really familiar to us, and not the Hamlet of Shakespeare's conception and description. So the Lucrezia Borgia of history was a fair-haired woman; but it is Victor Hugo and the Prince of Italian Song, Donizetti, who is our Lucrezia, and that, in a great degree, because the Italian singers who personate her are usually brunettes. The Prince of Song, Opera and our own personal experience are more absolute interpreters of personality than history itself.

There is no more striking illustration of this truth than the popular conception of Richard the Lion Heart of England. We of this generation see King Richard as Scott, drunk with feudal enthusiasm, describes him; and it is Scott's Saladin, not the historical Sultan, with whom we are familiar. We see Richard as the embodiment of chivalry, as the romantic knight in the castle upon the Danube, answering the song of the loyal Blondel, as the stalwart soldier with the terror of whose name Saracen mothers hushed their babes. The Richard of history, on the contrary, was half a savage: ignorant, willful, brutal, and powerful. He was a man of no particular moment, except, probably, as a man-at-arms, and certainly of no representative significance to English history, as William the Norman was, or Henry the Eighth; and yet his statue has just been erected in the palace yard at Westminster, in London, by the entrance of the House of Peers.

And the same chance that seems to settle so much of the impression of history is evident also in the erection of this statue.

Whoever recalls the American Crystal Palace, and the exhibition there, will not forget the huge plaster cast of Washington on his horse, the work of Baron Marochetti. There were persons who wanted to have it put into marble and purchased as a permanent ornament of our great man. But a kind Providence overruled the wish. The Baron, however, had another string to his bow. He had evidently exhibited a similar work, representing Richard the King, at the London Crystal Palace. It was too large and unimportant to stand within the building, and stood without: but the Baron is an amateur, it appears, and a Baron, and "influence" persuaded certain persons to purchase, and the English Government to favor the purchasing of the statue in marble; and it now stands in a conspicuous spot, with the Government as sponsor—a ridiculous knight-sitting in armor upon a horse, and holding his sword erect up with a drawn sword on the hand. The work is sharply criticised; but there it stands, and there it will stand, while good sculptors and more representative men go unrepresented. It will not commemorate a half-barbarous King of England so much as the half-barbarous conception of art, or, rather, indifference to art, among the ruling powers of England. But it will be a good text for Punch, and we shall perhaps not lose by it, after all.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

FROST AND THAW.

It was hard King Frost and soft Queen Thaw
Came lately to a tussle,
Where the latter he prevailed, with his hands ice-mailed,
And his iron strength of muscle.
And with overthrow soon he bruised the Queen,
Who strove to invade his dominions,
Till her injured sighs, and her weeping eyes,
And her soft and drooping pinions—

Quoth he, "Begone to the aniveling South,
Where the mad hungry folk are starving hard,
There bid parched air from steaming earth
Its tell of exhalation;
Go, slacken the hold of the slight Spring-cold,
And melt the frosted vapor;
But leave to me black Januarie,
And the bitter New Year mine."

"I crack the fire, I rive the rill,
I make the lone, and shatter the stone,
At the summons with the sword,
I touch—the mattock and spade are still,
The travel and the toil.
The bound is bare and the hearth is chill,
And the ploughshare holds fast.

"And it is thou, poor pulling Queen,
Wouldst tame a might like mine?
And thou, with thy soft and trifling hand,
And knee where I confine?
Go, do thy service, and thy green burn,
My fetters, an if they may,
And with rapiers, give the birds a voice,
And make wine of the rain."

Then soft Queen Thaw to her side 'gan draw
Her gracious ministrie:
She summoned the warm airs from the South,
The soft rains from the sea,
And she bade them move by the might of love,
King Frost's hard rule to quell,
And the stir in her veins, and her shivering again,
And her rains they froze or they fell!

Then sudden this thought to her heart was brought,
"I'll try a wile," said she,
"In not King Frost, whose path I've crost,
But 'tis Nature's goodness to be."
Beneath His lay stand Frost and Thaw;
We vote for the Queen's wile!
King Frost's keen knife cleave way for life,
When he makes beast it kills.

"In earth and air I'll strife forbear:
Leave them to Nature's care."
But Frost shall see, though strong he be,
Love's a trimmer, and will be.
On human hearts I'll turn my arts,
And there shall Spring begin
Till the hard shall give, and the dead shall live,
And the cold shall be kin.

God speed such Thaw! still may it draw
A fire from all around,
Till, like Nature's, the heart's love rises fair and free,
From out the frozen ground.
Of many it spring and broadly fling
His palm-like branches wide,
May find wherewith to clothe itself,
To shelter, warm, and hide.

The real victim of a cossette is the man she marries.

A young scapegrace, who had seen out a fortune, took up his residence in a country village, pretending to be an author. His shabby appearance was therefore accounted for, and as his address was good, and marks of personal beauty remained, many a romantic villager maid sighed over the "cruel fate of genius." Sighs would not pay his landlord's bill, and when a month had expired, he was dunned in good earnest. At length the landlord told him he never saw copy of his productions, and wished to know what work he had been the author of. Being thus pushed, he replied, "Why, Sir, I call myself an author, and so I am—the author of my own misfortunes."

REVOLUTION IN EVENING PARTIES.
BY A RED-NOSED OLD WALL-FLOWER.

There is a madness staring, stark,
At which I'm in amazement hurt,
Thermometers some twenty mark,
Or twenty odd, degrees of frost,
Not only common rivers clean
Toward the sea their waves to pour,
While up them come with wild ducks and geese,
But Thames himself is frozen o'er!

The frantic folly that astounds
My reason with its awful height,
Is that of people going rounds
Of evening parties given by night.
They go at ten or later; leave
At two or three; perhaps at four.
Why, girls themselves, one would believe,
Must find such doings a bore!

Or if to dances go at times
Afford a pleasure so intense,
And such an appetite they give
As to carelate all other sense,
There is prospect which might well
Appall the girl of simplest mind
That ever was by ball-room belle,
"Tis that of going home to bed.

The fire extinct—the middle-class
At least must let their servants sleep—
Oh, dear, how cold! and what an ass
Are you, such hours as these to keep!
What could've put you on your drive
From having on the finest clothes,
Concerning most of us you're alive,
You'll have a cold; talk through your nose.

But homeward if you have to ride
Miles from a city in every hill,
That scene of vanity and pride,
That gathering-place of all,
What have your hapless bodies done,
That their shell have the last severe
Imposed on them to drive—no fun—
Such hours in the hour of year?

Oh, brothers! I appeal to you,
For men have reason, since have ruth,
All evening parties to eschew,
Combine and vote to let all our youth,
Until they shall no more extend
From midnight to the morning sun;
Enough in dancing time to spend,
To go at seven and leave at one.

A young Tipperary widow, Nelly M'Phee, was courted and actually had an offer from Tooley O'Flanagan, on her way to her husband's funeral. "She accepted, of course," said Grossmuth. "No, indeed," replied Smith. "Lady, dear," says she, "you too late; four weeks ago it was I much have to ask you that question." "And you have him a dacent time after poor M'Phee was under board." "Why, Grossmuth, you're a regular villain of all mankind, alive. There was a Dutch woman whose husband, Diedrik Van Frank, died and left Mrs. Gromsdahl. He was buried on Cap's Hill. Folks said that grief would kill that widow. She had a fine piece of wood carved that looked very like her late husband, and constantly kept it in bed for several months. She had a pan of live brimstone inserted in a young shoemaker, who took the length of her foot, and kept it under the bed. He kept on this winter not more than a fortnight when the servant told her they were out of kindling-wood, and asked what should be done. After a pause, the widow replied in a very quiet way, "Mayn't it will enough now to nlight up old Van Frank wid teh up stairs."

A butcher was in the habit of killing pigs for a neighbor—a quiet, decent woman, and a little shrewd in her way. The butcher, it seems, had a large pocket, the contents of which were nobody's business; and it so happened that the woman's pigs after the slaughtered were always found minus the kidneys. Deeming this deedcertain some uncomfortable fraud, she one morning went over to the butcher to the truth as possible, she one day, on seeing another of her pigs laid open with the butcher-company, referred to the lowest butcher: "How is it, Master Donald, that my pigs are at weather always the first to have their insides atop of the cerulk pocket, but replied, "It's just the breed, gold wife, just the breed."

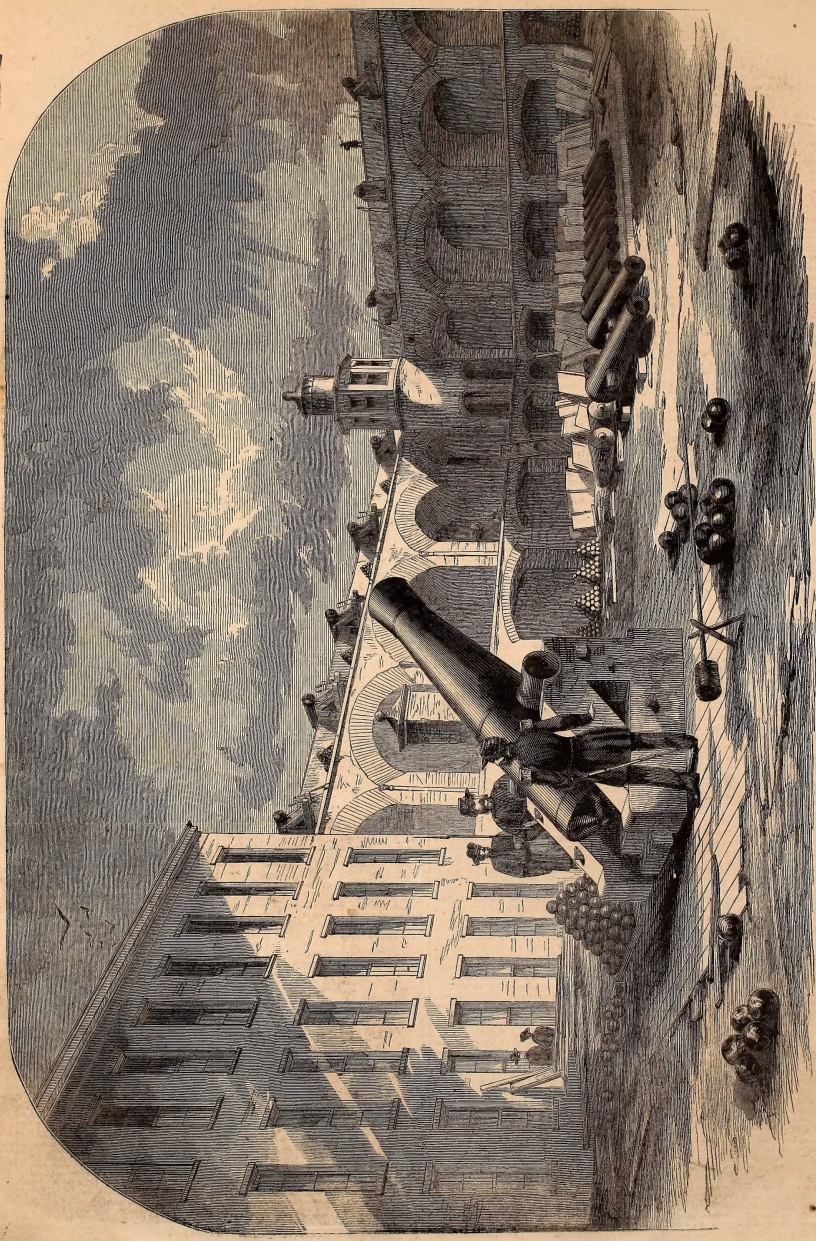
The servant at No. 1 told the servant at No. 2 that her master expected his old friends, the Bayleys, to pay him a visit at Christmas. The servant at No. 2 told No. 3 that expected the Bullies in the house every day; and No. 3 told No. 4 that it was very likely that the Bayleys might stop their bailiffs out; whereupon No. 4 told No. 5 that the offices were after No. 1. The result was that no such man as he ought to be prevent himself from being taken in execution, and that it was talking about No. 1 all over the street, as it was becoming and increasing, until it got to No. 33, where it was reported that the attorney police had taken up the gentleman who lived at No. 1, for killing his poor dear wife with arsenic, and it was confidently said that the verdict that he would be executed at Horsemonger Lane Jail as the facts of the case were very clear against him.

"John, who was this wicked man?"—"Don't know, Sir."—"Yes, you do know. Tell me."—"Well, I guess it was smoke; for father axe he was so cunning he got every body to trust him, and he was a regular deceiver of everybody."

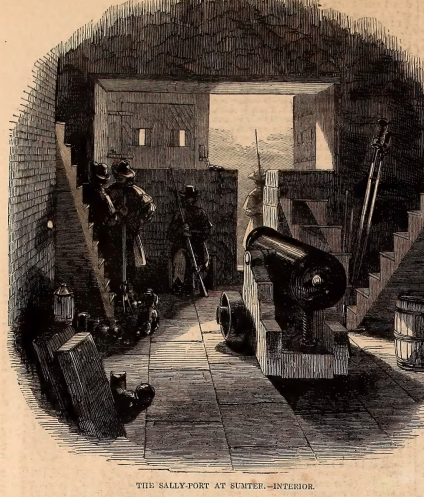
Lord Chief Justice Kenyon was conspicuous for economy in every article of his dress. Once, in the case of an action brought for the loss of a pantaloon, the counsel, on a large scale, for ours, the question mainly was, whether or not they were rent and wantonly made, and with the full materials. A number of witnesses were called: one of whom, being cross-examined by counsel, contradicted himself, when the Chief Justice observed, pointing to his own shoe, which were tapped on heelstriken by the two different buckles of the day—"Were the shoes any thing like these?" "No, my Lord," replied the witness, "they were a great deal better, and more genteeler." The Court was contented with laughter, in which the Chief Justice heartily joined.

"You will please to observe," said old schoolmaster Lowell, as he led a group of truants through his school, "that the boys are required to observe the utmost attention to quietness as they file into the discipline." They had at this moment arrived in front of several boys standing around a water-bucket, and one had just charged his mouth with the contents of the bucket, and was preparing to squirt it over to receive his pen from the floor, when another, going about his business, tripped his fingers quick under the drinker's ear, which caused him on a sudden to eject the contents of his mouth over the person behind and prior. Starting upright, with his face and hair dripping, he shouted, with a voice of thunder, "Who done that?" Promptly cried out, "Jim Gunn, Sir!"—"Jim Gunn, who did you do that for?" Jim, appalled at his indiscretion and fondness, muttered that it was not his fault—that Tom Owen tapped him. This changed the direction of old Lowell's wrath, and shaking his cane pertinently over Owen's head, he asked, "Did you tap Gunn?" The culprit, trembling with fear, muttered, "Yes, Sir, I tapped Gunn, but I didn't know that he was cracked."

Goethe says "If you no fault committed that I have not committed myself." Did the gentleman ever committed suicide?



A TEN-INCH COLUMBIAD MOUNTED AS A MORTAR AT FORT SUMTER.—[DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.]



THE SALLY-PORT AT SUMTER.—INTERIOR.

FORT SUMTER.

We are again enabled, through the polite attention of officers of Major ANDERSON'S command, to illustrate FORT SUMTER. We publish on the preceding page a large picture of the COLUMBIAD which has just been placed in position as a mortar; and above a VIEW OF THE SALLY-PORT, from the inside. The question having been raised whether the guns at FORT SUMTER can reach the City of Charleston, it may be interesting to know that the problem has been solved, as the following letter from FORT SUMTER explains:

"To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"The Weekly of January 26 quotes the Herald in proof that these guns can not send a shell to Charleston, and gives very fair data for that opinion. But a 10-inch COLUMBIAD throws its shell easily 4828 yards.

"By making this shell eccentric, at least 500 more can be gained; and all intelligent artillerists know of certain other expedients by which the difference between this total (5328 yards) and 8500—the distance to Broad Street—can be overcome. Q.E.D. And we trust we shall not be compelled to prove it practically."

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MORNING made a considerable difference in my general prospect of Life, and brightened it so much that it scarcely seemed the same. What lay heaviest on my mind was the consideration that six days intervened between me and the day of departure; for I could not divest myself of a misgiving that something might happen to London in the mean while, and that, when I got there, it would be either greatly deteriorated or clean gone.

Joe and Biddy were very sympathetic and pleasant when I spoke of our approaching separation; but they only referred to it when I did. After breakfast Joe brought out my indentures from the press in the best parlor, and we put them in the fire, and I felt that I was free. With all the novelty of my emancipation on me, I went to church with Joe, and thought perhaps the clergyman wouldn't have read that about the rich man and the kingdom of Heaven if he had known all.

After our early dinner I strolled out alone, purposing to finish off the marshes at once, and get them done with. As I passed the church, I felt (as I had felt during service in the morning) a sublime compassion for the poor creatures who were destined to go there, Sunday after Sunday, all their lives through, and to lie obscurely at last among the low green mounds. I promised myself that I would do something for them one of these days, and formed a plan in outline for bestowing a dinner of roast beef and plum-pudding, a pint of ale, and a gallon of condescension, upon every body in the village.

If I had often thought before, with something allied to shame, of my companionship with the fugitive whom I had once seen limping among those graves, what were my thoughts on this Sunday, when the place recalled the wretch, ragged and shivering, with his felon iron and badge! My comfort was that it happened a long time ago, and that he had doubtless been transported a long way off, and that he was dead to me, and might be veritably dead into the bargain.

No more low, wet grounds, no more dykes and sluices, no more of these grazing cattle—though they seemed, in their dull manner, to wear a more respectful air now, and to face round, in order that they might stare as long as possible at the possessor of such great expectations—farewell, monotonous acquaintances of my childhood, henceforth I was for London and greatness: not for smith's work in general and for you: I made my exultant way to the old Battery, and, lying down there to consider the question whether Miss Havisham intended me for Estella, fell asleep.

When I awoke I was much surprised to find Joe sitting beside me, smoking his pipe. He greeted me with a cheerful smile on my opening my eyes, and said:

"As being the last time, Pip, I thought I'd foller."

"And, Joe, I am very glad you did so."

"Thankee, Pip," said Joe.

"You may be sure, dear Joe," I went on, after we had shaken hands, "that I shall never forget you."

"No, no, Pip!" said Joe, in a comfortable tone, "I'm sure of that. Ay, ay, old chap! Bless you, it were only necessary to get it well round in a man's mind to be certain on it. But it took a bit of time to get it well round: the change come so uncommon plump; didn't it?"

Somehow I was not best pleased with Joe's being so mightily secure of me. I should have liked him to have betrayed emotion, or to have said, "It does you credit, Pip," or something of that sort. Therefore I made no remark on Joe's first head: merely saying, as to his second, that the tidings had indeed come suddenly, but that I had always wanted to be a gentleman, and had often and often speculated on what I would do if I were one.

"Have you though?" said Joe. "Astonishing!"

"It's a pity now, Joe," said I, "that you did not get on a little more, when we had our lessons here; isn't it?"

"Well, I don't know," returned Joe. "I'm so awful dull. I'm only master of my own trade. It were always a pity as I was so awful dull; but it's no more of a pity now than it was—say this day twelve month—don't you see?"

What I had meant was, that when I came into my property and was able to do something for Joe, it would have been much more agreeable if he had been better qualified for a rise in station. He was so perfectly innocent of my meaning, however, that I thought I would mention it to Biddy in preference.

So, when we had walked home and had had tea, I took Biddy into our little garden by the side of the lane, and, after throwing out in a general way for the elevation of her spirits, that I should never forget her, said I had a favor to ask of her.

"And it is, Biddy," said I, "that you will not omit any opportunity of helping Joe on a little."

"How helping him on?" asked Biddy, with a steady sort of glance.

"Well! Joe is a dear good fellow—in fact, I think he is the dearest fellow that ever lived—but he is rather backward in some things. For instance, Biddy, in his learning and his manners."

Although I was looking at Biddy as I spoke, and although she opened her eyes very wide when I had spoken, she did not look at me.

"Oh, his manners! Won't his manners do then?" asked Biddy, plucking a black currant leaf.

"My dear Biddy, they do very well here—"

"Oh! they do very well here?" interposed Biddy, looking closely at the leaf in her hand.

"Hear me out—but if I were to remove Joe into a higher sphere, as I shall hope to remove him when I fully come into my property, they would hardly do him justice."

"And don't you think he knows that?" asked Biddy.

It was such a very provoking question (for it had never in the most distant manner occurred to me), that I said, snappishly, "Biddy, what do you mean?"

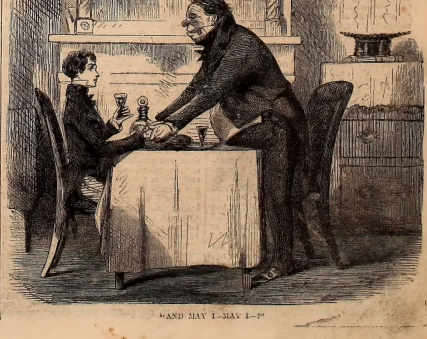
Biddy having rubbed the leaf to pieces between her hands—and the smell of a black currant bush has ever since recalled to me that evening in the little garden by the side of the lane—said, "Have you never considered that he may be proud?"

"Proud!" I repeated, with disdainful emphasis.

"Oh, I there are many kinds of pride," said Biddy, looking full at me and shaking her head; "pride is not all of one kind—"

"Well? What are you stopping for?" said I.

"Not all of one kind," resumed Biddy. "He may be too proud to let any one take him out of a place that he is competent to fill, and fills



"AND MAY I—MAY I—?"

well and with respect. To tell you the truth, I think he is: though it sounds bold in me to say so, for you must know him far better than I do."

"Now, Biddy," said I, "I am very sorry to see this in you. I did not expect to see this in you. You are envious, Biddy, and grudging. You are dissatisfied on account of my rise in fortune, and you can't help showing it."

"If you have the heart to think so," returned Biddy, "say so. Say so over and over again, if you have the heart to think so."

"If you have the heart to be so, you mean, Biddy," said I, in a virtuous and superior tone; "don't put it off upon me. I am very sorry to see it, and it's a—it's a bad side of human nature. I did intend to ask you to use any little opportunities you might have after I was gone of improving dear Joe. But after this I ask you nothing. I am extremely sorry to see this in you, Biddy," I repeated. "It's a—it's a bad side of human nature."

"Whether you scold me or approve of me," returned poor Biddy, "you may equally depend upon my trying to do all that lies in my power here at all times. And whatever opinion you take away of me, shall make no difference in my remembrance of you. Yet a gentleman should not be unjust neither," said Biddy, turning away her head.

I again warmly repeated that it was a bad side of human nature (in which sentiment, waxing its application, I have since seen reason to think I was right), and I walked down the little path away from Biddy, and Biddy went into the house, and I went out at the garden gate and took a dejected stroll until supper-time; again feeling it very sorrowful and strange that this, the second night of my bright fortunes, should be as lonely and unsatisfactory as the first.

But morning once more brightened my view, and I extended my clemency to Biddy, and we dropped the subject. Putting on the best clothes I had, I went into town as early as I could hope to find the shops open, and presented myself before Mr. Trabb, the tailor, who was having his breakfast in the parlor behind his shop, and who did not think it worth his while to come out to me, but called me in to him.

"Well!" said Mr. Trabb, in a hail-fellow-well-met kind of way. "How are you, and what can I do for you?"

Mr. Trabb had sliced his hot roll into three feather beds, and was slipping butter in between the blankets, and covering it up. He was a prosperous old bachelor, and his open window looked into a prosperous little garden and orchard, and there was a prosperous iron safe let into the wall at the side of his fire-place, and I did not doubt that heaps of his prosperity were put away in it in bags.

"Mr. Trabb," said I, "it's an unpleasant thing to have to mention, because it looks like boasting; but I have come into a handsome property."

A change passed over Mr. Trabb. He forgot the butter in bed, got up from the bedside, and wiped his fingers on the table-cloth, exclaiming, "Lord bless my soul!"

"I am going up to my guardian in London," said I, casually drawing some guineas out of my pocket and looking at them; "and I want a fashionable suit of clothes to go in. I wish to pay for them," I added—otherwise I thought he might only pretend to make them, "with ready money."

"My dear Sir," said Mr. Trabb, as he respectfully bent his body, opened his arms, and took the liberty of touching me on the outside of each elbow, "don't hurt me by mentioning that. May I venture to congratulate you? Would you do me the favor of stepping into the shop?"

Now Mr. Trabb's boy was the most audacious boy in all that country-side. When I had entered he was sweeping the shop, and he had swattered his labors by sweeping over me. He was still sweeping when I came out into the shop was Mr. Trabb, and he knocked the broom against the possible corners and obstacles, to express (as I understood it) equality with any blacksmith, alive or dead.

"Hold that noise," said Mr. Trabb, with the greatest sternness, "or I'll knock your head off. Do me the favor to be seated, Sir. Now this," said Mr. Trabb, taking down a roll of cloth, and tiding it out in a flowing manner over the counter, preparatory to getting his hand under it to show the gloss, "is a very sweet article. I can recommend it for your purpose, Sir, because it really is extra super. But you shall see some others. Give me Number Four, you!" (To the boy, and with dreadful severity, foreseeing the danger of that miscreant's brushing me with it, or making some other sign of familiarity.)

Mr. Trabb never removed his stern eye from the boy until he had deposited number four on the counter and was at a safe distance again. Then he commanded him to bring number five and number eight. "And let me have none of your tricks here," said Mr. Trabb, "or you shall repent it, you young scoundrel, the longest day you have to live."

Mr. Trabb then bent over number four, and in a sort of deferential confidence recommended it to me as a light article for summer wear, an article much in vogue among the nobility and gentry, an article that it would be a satisfaction for him to reflect upon a distinguished fellowtownsman's (if he might claim me for a fellowtownsman) having worn. "Or as you're bringing numbers five and eight, you say?" said Mr. Trabb to the boy after that; "or shall I kick you out of the shop and bring them myself?"

I selected the materials for my suit, with the assistance of Mr. Trabb's judgment, and re-entered the parlor to be measured. For, although Mr. Trabb had my measure already, and had previously been quite contented with it, he said apologetically that it "wouldn't do under existing circumstances, Sir—wouldn't do at all." So Mr. Trabb measured and calculated me, in the parlor, as if I were an estate and he the trustee speaks of me; and when he had thoroughly got a world of trouble that I felt that no suit of clothes could possibly remunerate him for his pains. When he had at last done, and had supported to send the bodies to Mr. Pumblechook's on the Thursday evening, he said, with his hand upon the parlor lock, "I know, Sir, that London gentlemen must be expected to be very particular local work, as a rule: but if you would give me a turn now and then in the quality of a townsman, I should highly esteem it. Good-morning, Sir, much obliged. Door!"

The last word was flung at the boy, who had not the slightest notion what it meant. But I saw him collapse as his master rubbed me out with his hands, and my first decided experience of the stupendous power of money was that it had morally laid upon his back Trabb's boy.

After this memorable event, I went to the hatter's, and the bootmaker's, and the hosier's, and felt rather like Mother Hubbard's dog, whose outfit required the services of so many trades. I also went to the coach-office, and took my place for seven o'clock on Saturday morning. It was not necessary to explain every where that I had come into a handsome property; but whenever I said any thing to that effect, it followed that the officiating tradesman ceased to have his attention diverted through the window by the High Street, and concentrated his mind upon me. When I had ordered every thing I wanted I directed my steps toward Pumblechook's, and as I approached that gentleman's place of business I saw him standing at his door.

He was waiting for me with great impatience. He had been out early with the chaise-cart, and had called at the forge and heard the news. He had prepared a collation for me in the Barnwell parlor, and he too ordered his shopman to "come out of the gangway" as my sacred person passed.

"My dear friend," said Mr. Pumblechook, shaking me by both hands, when he and I and the collation were alone, "I give you joy of your good fortune. Well deserved, well deserved!"

This was coming to the point, and I thought it a sensible way of expressing himself.

"To think," said Mr. Pumblechook, after another interruption in the same nonsensical manner, "that I should have been the humble instrument of leading up to this, is a proud reward."

I begged Mr. Pumblechook to remember that nothing was to be ever said or hinted on that point.

"My dear young friend," said Mr. Pumblechook, "you may rely upon my not making myself known."

I murmured "Certainly;" and Mr. Pumblechook took me by both hands again, and communicated a new movement to that portion that had an emotional appearance, though it was rather low down—"My dear young friend, rely upon my doing any little all in your power to back up the fact before the mind of Joseph. Joseph!" said Mr. Pumblechook, in the way of a compassionate explanation, "Joseph, Joseph!" Thereupon he shook his head and tapped it, expressing his sense of deficiency in Joseph.

"But my dear young friend," said Mr. Pumblechook, "you must be hungry, you must be exhausted. Be seated. Here is a chicken had round from the Boar, here is a tongue had round from the Boar, here's one or two little things that I hope you may not despise. But do I," said Mr. Pumblechook, getting up again the moment after he had sat down, "see afore me, him as I ever sported with in his times of happy infancy? And may I—may I—?"

This May I mean, might he shake hands? I consented, and he was fervent, and then sat down again.

"Here's wine," said Mr. Pumblechook. "Let us drink, Thanks to Fortune, and may she ever pick out her favorites with equal judgment! And yet I can not," said Mr. Pumblechook, getting up again, "see afore me One—and likewise drink to One—without again expressing—May I—may I—?"

I said he might, and he shook hands with me again, and emptied his glass and turned it upside down. I did the same; and if I had turned myself upside down before drinking, the wine would not have gone more direct to my head.

Mr. Pumblechook helped me to the liver wing, and to the best slice of tongue (none of those out-of-the-way things for me), and took two, and took, comparatively speaking, no care of himself at all. "Ah! poultry, poultry! You little thought," said Mr. Pumblechook, apostrophizing the fowl in the dish, "when you was a young fledgling, what was in store for you. You little thought you was to be refreshment beneath this humble roof for one as—call it a weakness, if you will," said Mr. Pumblechook, getting up again, "but may I? may I?"

It began to be unnecessary to repeat the form of saying he might, so he did it at once. How he ever did it so often without mortally wounding himself with my knife, I don't know.

"And your sister," he resumed, after a little steady eating, "which had the honor of bringing you up by hand? Ah! If she could be reflected that she's no longer equal to fully understanding the honor. May—"

I saw he was about to come at me again, and I stopped him.

"We'll drink her health," said I.

"Ah!" cried Mr. Pumblechook, leaning back in his chair, quite flaccid with admiration, "that's the way you know 'em, Sir!" (I don't know who Sir was, or why he should have known her, and there was no third person present); "that's the way you know the noble minded, Sir! Ever forgiving and ever affable. It might," said the servile Pumblechook, shaking both his untasted glass in a hurry and getting up again, "to a common person, have the appearance of repeating myself—but may I?"

When he had done it he resumed his seat and drank to my sister. "Let us never be blind," said Mr. Pumblechook, "to her faults of temper, but it is to be hoped she meant well."

At about this time I began to observe that he was getting flushed in the face; and as he spoke, I felt all face, steeped in wine and smarting.

I mentioned to Mr. Pumblechook that I wished to have my clothes and linen sent to me at his establishment, as an old distinguishing him. I mentioned my reason for desiring to avoid observation in the village, and he lauded it to the skies. There was nothing, he said, but what illustrated, worthy of my confidence, and—in short, might he? Then he asked me tenderly if I remembered Biddy and the forge, and how we had gone together to have me bound apprentice, and, in effect, how he had ever been my favorite fancy and my chosen friend. At last, I had gotten times as many glasses of wine as I had, I should have known that he never had stood in that relation toward me, and should in my heart of hearts have repudiated the idea. Yet for all that, I remember feeling convinced that I had been much mistaken in him, and that he was a sensible, practical, good-hearted, prime fellow.

By degrees he fell to reposing such great confidence in me, as to ask my advice in reference to his own affairs. I recollected that there was an opportunity for a great amalgamation and engrogoly of the corn and seed trade and coal trade with those premises, if a man were only enterprise occurred before in that, or any other neighborhood. What alone was wanting to the realization of a vast fortune was capital, and the power of Capital. These were the two little words, more capital. Now it appeared to him (Pumblechook) that if that capital were got into the business through a sleeping partner, Sir: which sleeping partner would have nothing to do but walk in, by self or deputy, whenever he pleased, and examine the books—perhaps walk in twice a year and take his profits away in his pocket, to the tune of fifty per cent.—it appeared to him that the profits might be expected to be pretty considerable. If spirit combined with property, which would be worthy of his attention. But what did I think? He had great confidence in my sound opinion, what did I think? I gave it as my opinion, "Wait a bit!" The united vastness and importance of this notion at this point, that he no longer asked if he might shake hands with me, but said he really must—and did.

We drank all the wine, and Mr. Pumblechook pledged himself to write over again to keep Joseph up to the mark (I don't know what mark), and to render me efficient and constant service if anything should go wrong. He also made known to me for the first time in my life, and certainly after having kept his secret wonderfully well, that he had been left sole of me, "That boy is no common boy, and mark me, his fortun' will be no common fortun'." He said with a touch of pathos, that he was unequal to say to think of now, and I said so too. Finally, I went out into the air with a dim perception that there was something remarkable in the contrast of the sunshine, and found that I had stumbled only got to the turnpike without having taken any account of the road.

There I was roused by Mr. Pumblechook's bailing me. He was a long way down the sunny street, and was making expressive gestures for me to stop. I stopped, and he came up breathless.

"No, my dear friend," said he, when he had recovered wind for speech. "Not if I can help it. This occasion shall not entirely pass without that affability on your part.—May I, as an old friend and well-wisher? May I?"

We shook hands for the hundredth time at least, and he ordered a young carter out of my way with the greatest indignation. Then he blessed me, and stood waving his hand to me until I had passed the crook in the road; and then I turned into a field and had a long nap under a hedge before I pursued my way home.

I had exactly baggage to take with me to London, for little of the little I possessed was adapted to my new station. But I began packing that same afternoon, and got my packed up things that I knew I should want next morning, in a fiction that there was not a moment to be lost.

So Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday passed, and on Friday morning I went to Mr. Pumblechook's to put on new clothes and pay my visit to Miss Havisham. Mr. Pumblechook's own room was given up to me to dress in, and was decorated with clean towels expressly for the occasion. My clothes were rather a disappointment, of course. Probably every new and eagerly expected garment ever put on since clothes came into fashion has been a disappointment. But after I had had my new suit on some half an hour, and had gone through an immensity of posturing with Mr. Pumblechook's very limited dressing-glass, in the futile endeavor to see my legs, it seemed to fit me better. It being market morning at a neighboring town some ten miles off, Mr. Pumblechook was not at home. I had not told him exactly when I meant to leave, and was not likely to shake hands with him again before departing. This was all as it should be, and I went out in my new array: fearfully ashamed of having to pass the shop-man, and trembling lest I should, if I was at a personal disadvantage, something like Joe's in his Sunday suit.

I went cautiously to Miss Havisham's by all the back ways, and rang at the bell constrained by, on account of the stiff long fingers of my gloves. Sarah Pocket looked out of the gate, and positively reeled back when she saw me so changed; her walnut-shell countenance like wise fluttering before me in green and yellow.

"You?" said she. "You, good gracious? What do you want?"

"I am going to London, Miss Pocket," said I, "and want to say good-by to Miss Havisham."

I was not expected, for she left me locked in the yard while she announced me. If I were to be admired. After a very short delay she returned and took me up, staring at me all the way.

Miss Havisham was taking exercise in the room with the long spread table, leaning on her crutch stick. She looked lighted as of yore, and at the sound of our entrance she stopped and turned. She was then just abreast of the centre of the rotted bride-cake.

"Don't go, Sarah," she said. "Well, Pip?"

"I start for London, Miss Havisham, to-morrow"—I was exceedingly careful what I said—"and I thought you would kindly not mind my taking leave of you."

"This is a gay figure, Pip," said she, making her crutch stick play round me, as if she were fairy godmother who had changed me, were bestowing the finishing gift.

"I have come into such good fortune since I saw you last, Miss Havisham," I murmured. "And I am so thankful for it, Miss Havisham!"

"Ay, ay," said she, looking at the disposition and envious Sarah with manifest delight. "I have seen Mr. Jaggers. I have heard about it, Pip. So you are to be memorized?"

"Yes, Miss Havisham."

"And you are adopted by a rich person?"

"Yes, Miss Havisham."

"Not named?"

"No, Miss Havisham."

"And Mr. Jaggers is made your guardian?"

"Yes, Miss Havisham."

She quite gloated on these questions and answers, so keen was her enjoyment of Sarah Pocket's disappointment. "Well, Pip," she went on; "you have a promising career before you. Be good—deserve it—and abide by Mr. Jaggers's instructions." She looked at me, and looked at Sarah, and Sarah's countenance wrung out of her watchful face a cruel smile. "Good-by, Pip!—you will always keep the name of Pip."

"Yes, Miss Havisham."

"Good-by, Pip!"

She stretched out her hand, and I went down on my knee and put it to my lips. I had got considered how I should take leave of her; I remember doing it with the best grace in this. She looked at Sarah Pocket with triumph in her weird eyes, and so I left my fairy godmother, with both hands on her crutch stick, standing in the midst of the dimly lighted room beside the rotten bride-cake that was hidden in cobwebs.

Sarah Pocket conducted me down as if I were a Ghost who must be seen out. She could not get over my appearance, and was in the last degree confounded by it. "Good-by, Miss Pocket;" but she merely stared, and did not seem collected enough to know that I had spoken. Chuck and his hoop, I made the best of my way back to Pumblechook's, took off my new clothes, made them into a bundle, and went back home in my old dress, carrying it—to speak the truth, much more at my ease too, though I had the bundle to carry.

And now remained the days which were to have run out so slowly, had run out fast and were gone; and to-morrow looked me in the face more steadily than I could look at it. As my evenings had dwindled away to five, to four, to three, to two, I had become more and more appreciative of the society of Joe and Biddy. On this last evening I dressed myself out in my new clothes for their delight, and sat in my splendor until bedtime. We had a hot supper on the occasion, graced by the inevitable roast fowl, and some flip to finish with. We were all very low, and none the higher for pretending to be in spirits.

I was to leave our village at five in the morning, carrying my little bundle downstairs, and I had told Joe that I wished to walk away all alone. I am afraid—I am sore afraid—that this purpose originated in my sense of the constraint there would be between me and Joe if we went to the coach together. I had pretended with myself that there was nothing of this taint in the arrangement; but when I went up to my little room on this last night I felt compelled to admit that I had not. So, sat late at night upon me to go down again and entreat Joe to walk with me in the morning after all. I did so entreat.

All night there were coaches in my broken sleep, going to wrong places instead of to London, and having in the traces, now dogs, now cats, now pigs, now men—never horses. Fantastic failures of journeys occupied me until the day dawned, when I was very sleepy indeed.

I got up and partly dressed, and sat at the window to take a last look out, and in taking it fell asleep.

Biddy was astir so early to get my breakfast that, although I did not sleep an hour, I smelled the smoke of the kitchen fire when I started up with a terrible misgiving that it must be late in the afternoon. But long after that, and long after I had heard the clinking of the tea-cups and was quite ready, I remained with my resolution to go down stairs. After all, I remained up there, trying to cheat myself by repeatedly unlocking and unstrapping my small portmanteau, locking it again and strapping it up again, until Biddy called to me that I was late.

It was a hurried breakfast with no taste in it. I got up from the meal, saying with a sort of brickness, as if it had only just occurred to me, "Well! I suppose I must be off!" Joe said it also, and kissed my sister, who was laughing and nodding and shaking in her usual chair, and kissed Biddy, and put her arm across Joe's neck. Then I took up my little portmanteau and walked out. The last I saw of them was when I presently heard a scuffle behind me, and looking back, saw my sister throwing an old shoe after me and Biddy throwing another old shoe. I stopped then to wave my hat, and dear old Joe waved his strong right arm above his head over my hashly, "Hoorow!" and Biddy put her apron to her face.

I walked away at a good pace, thinking it was easier to go than I had supposed it would be, and reflecting that it would never have done to have an old shoe thrown after me, even in sight of all the High Street. I whistled and made nothing of it. But the village was very peaceful and quiet, and the light mists were solemnly rising as if to show me the world, and I had been so innocent and little there, and all beyond was so unknown and great, that all in a moment my heart failed me, and I sat down and broke into tears. It was by the finger-post at the end of the village, and I had my hand upon it, and said "Good-by, O my dear, dear friend!"

Heaven knows we need never be ashamed of shedding tears, for they are rain upon the blinding dust of earth, overlying our hard hearts. I was better after I had cried them before—more sorry, more aware of my own ingratitude, more gentle toward all men. As I had cried before, I should have had Joe with me then.

So subdued I was by those tears, and by their breaking out again more than once in the course of the quiet walk, that when I was on the coach, and it was clear of the town, I deliberated with an aching heart whether I should not get down when we changed horses, and walk back, and have another evening at home, and a better parting. We changed, and I had not made up my mind, and still considered for my comfort that it would be quite practicable to get down and walk back, when we changed again. And while I was occupied with these deliberations, I would fancy an exact resemblance to Joe in some man coming along the road toward us, and my heart would beat high. As if he could possibly be there!

We changed again, and yet again, and it was now too late and too far to go back, and I went on. And the mists had all solemnly risen now, and the world was before me.

[TO BE THE END OF THE FIRST STAGE OF PIP'S EXPECTATIONS.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

CONGRESS.

On Friday, 1st February, in the Senate, Senator Ten Eyck presented the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey in favor of the Crittenden Compromise, but took occasion to disclaim any sectional sympathy. A resolution offered by Senator Trumbull, providing for the appointment of a committee to confer with a committee of the House, in counting the Electoral votes for President and Vice-President, was objected to by Senator Bigler and laid over. The President's Message was then taken up for further consideration, and Senator Latham, of California, proceeded to address the Senate. When he had concluded Senator Clingman, of North Carolina, offered resolutions, with amendments; and the Diplomatic, and the Executive and Judicial Appropriation Bills were passed through. In the House, Mr. Sherman, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow $25,000,000, should so much be found necessary. Mr. Kellogg, of Illinois, offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting such information. An evening session was held for general debate.

On Saturday, 2d, in the Senate, a petition from Michigan was presented by Senator Chandler, asking the Congress to adopt coercive measures toward the seceding States. The joint resolution presented on Friday, providing for the counting of the Electoral votes for President and Vice-President, was passed.——In the House, similar provision was made for counting the Presidential vote. Mr. Sherman called up the bill authorizing the President, before the 1st of July next, to borrow $25,000,000, should so large a sum be necessary to meet the exigencies of the Government, which was passed after considerable opposition. The Chimpal amendment to the Deficiency Bill was then debated in Committee of the Whole, but no vote was taken upon it.

On Monday, 4th, the Senators from Louisiana withdrew from the Senate. Both Senators Slidell and Benjamin made speeches on the occasion. Senator Slidell took occasion to set forth the objects and aims of the new Confederacy, which he announced was to be constructed soon, and asserted the tenure that all the citizens and the United States would be faithfully regarded, including those relative to the African Slave-trade. A just proportion of the public debt would be assumed; the fortifications and other public property which had been acquired would be protected for, and the free navigation of the Mississippi would be guaranteed to all those residing on its valley. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution, which was laid over, making inquiries relative to the late alleged seizure of Federal property by order of Texas. The President last Message was debated, and speeches were made by Senators Clingman of North Carolina, and Hale of New Hampshire. The bill to provide for a government for the Territory of Idaho, was taken up and passed, the new name had been changed from Idaho to Colorado. The Home Loan bill was made the special order for Tuesday.

—In the House, Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, offered a resolution similar to that introduced by Senator Wilson in the Senate, asking for information regarding late proceedings at New Orleans. The Deficiency Bill was considered. The Committee of the Whole, and the Senate's Chrisp amendment was read down, when the question of the appropriation the Wendell printing establishment was concurred in. The House resolved to hold evening sessions after general debate during the remainder of the week.

On Tuesday, 5th, in the Senate, after the presentation of a great number of petitions and memorials on the subject of the national troubles, a resolution, providing for the usual manner for the counting of the Electoral vote for President and Vice-President, was adopted. The Loan bill was taken up and passed, it meeting with no further opposition. The President's Special Message was then considered, and Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, gave his views of the crisis at length. His speech was a very powerful argument for the preservation of the Union, and a solemn rebuke to secession. A message was received from the President, accompanying an official communication from the Legislature of Kentucky, asking Congress to do something to arrest the troubles, &c. In the House, Mr. Taylor, of Louisiana, announced the secession of his State, and made a farewell speech. Mr. Boyce, of Louisiana, asked leave to make an explanation, and leave being granted, he proceeded to answer some points in the revised instructions from his immediate constituents to withdraw. It should excite no surprise to see us in the House, and when he did withdraw he should also resign his seat. The action of the Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Deficiency Bill were concurred in. Mr. Colfax then called up his bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to suspend postal facilities in the seceding States, and speeches were made on it by Messrs. Branch of North Carolina, and Sickles of New York—the former in opposition to, and the latter in favor of it. The report of the Committee of Thirty-three was then read previous to the recess. An evening session was held.

On Wednesday, 6th, in the Senate, a bill was reported from the Military Committee, by Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, and laid over, providing for the better organization of the militia of the District of Columbia. The President's Message and the Confederate Senator, Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, then proceeded to finish his speech, commenced on Tuesday.—In the House, a message from the President similar to that sent to the Senate on Tuesday, accompanying the resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature, asking for the calling of a National Convention, was received. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency bill were considered and disposed of, and a Committee of Conference was asked for. Mr. Colfax called up his bill relative to the postal service, which was passed, and will prevent the impression that it was intended to recognize in the remotest degree the right of secession, as had been intimated by Mr. Hindman, of Arkansas, he protested a more cruel-worded substitute, which was passed by a vote against 90. Mr. Florence, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, asking for an extension of the limits of entry and delivery at that port, accompanying it with the plea that the present was a tropical object. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce. A report of the Committee of Thirty-three was then considered, and speeches were made by Messrs. Humphrey of New York, Harris of Virginia, Maynard of Tennessee, and Wells of New York. Mr. Harris made a Union speech, as did also Mr. Wells, the latter advocating the adoption of the Crittenden Compromise.

On Thursday, 7th, in the Senate, Senator Thompson presented petitions in favor of the Crittenden Compromise. Petitions were also presented by Senator Collamer of Vermont, and Senator Chandler of Michigan, in favor of the compromise. The President's Message was then taken up for consideration, and Senator Bayard, of Texas, proceeded to reply to the speech of Senator Johnson, of Tennessee.—In the House, the bill regulating the Patent-Office and amending the Patent Laws, which originated in the Senate during the last session, was considered and passed. The report of the Committee of Thirty-three was taken up, and Mr. Corwin, the Chairman, Messrs. Winslow, Davis, of Maryland, and Mr. Sedgwick spoke against secession. Mr. Valladingham, of Ohio, spoke in favor of a project to amend the Constitution so as to provide for four distinct Confederacies, to be known as the North, the West, the Pacific, and the Southern Confederacies. It does not seem to have commanded any attention. A joint resolution allowing Lieutenant Craven, of the Navy, to accept a medal from the Spanish Government for rescuing the crew of a Spanish vessel, was passed. Mr. Sickles, of New York, asked leave to introduce a resolution calling for information as to whether the forts in that State still collected at the ports of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, Virginia, or North Carolina, objected, and Mr. Sickles announced his intention to call up the resolution on Monday. An evening session for debate was held.

THE PEACH CONFERENCE.

This body assembled, at the invitation of Virginia, at Washington, District of Columbia, on 4th, and organized. Ex-President Tyler was chosen President, and Mr. Wallis, of Ohio, Secretary. The proceedings are private; reporters are excluded. A Committee of one from each State was appointed to draft a scheme of adjustment. The following are such Committees: Connecticut, Kennedy; Vermont, Fowler, New Hampshire, Hall, Vermont; Ames, Rhode Island; Hollister, Massachusetts; Briggs, New York; White, Pennsylvania; Baton, Delaware; Johnson, Maryland; Scarlett, Virginia; Rencher, North Carolina; Gilmer, Kentucky; Ewing, Ohio; Smith, Indiana; Logan, Illinois; Haglan, Iowa.

THE SECESSION CONGRESS AT MONTGOMERY.

The Convention of the Southern Confederacy met at Montgomery, Alabama, on 4th inst., and formed a provisional temporary Union. An impressive prayer was offered by Rev. Basil Manley. On motion of R. B. Rhett, Howell Cobb was elected for permanent President by acclamation, and Johnson F. Hooper was selected as permanent Secretary, by the Rhett party, in opposition to Mr. R. A. Morton, of Florida. In the course of Mr. Cobb's address, after taking the Chair, he said, the secession which was heralded us together was one of no ordinary character. We meet as the representatives of sovereign and independent States, who by a solemn judgment have dissolved all the political association which connected them with the Government of the United States. It is now a fixed irrevocable fact. The separation is complete, and perpetual. The great duty now imposed is to provide a Government for our future security and protection. We can and should extend to our sister States, and our late sister States, who are identified in feeling and political institutions, a cordial invitation to unite in a common destiny, and should be desirous at the same time of maintaining with our confederates friendly relations, political and commercial.

During the discussion on 5th, on the adoption of the rules for the Southern Congress, Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, said that the rules were made on the principle that we were a Congress of sovereign and independent States, and must vote as States.

THE SECESSION OF TEXAS.

The informal State Convention of Texas on the 1st inst. passed an Ordinance of Secession, by a vote of 166 to 7. The action of the Convention is to be submitted to the people on the 23d, and if adopted, Gov. Houston is to go into office on the 2d of March. Governor Houston, it is understood, has recognized the Convention's action. Meantime rumor echos us from Fort Smith, Arkansas, that the Texans intend still further to prove that secession must necessarily be accompanied with outrage. Forts Wachita, Cobb, and Arbuckle, in the Indian Territory, are threatened by them.

THE ILLINOIS LEGISLATURE.

The Illinois Legislature, on Saturday, 26, out of respect for Virginia, requested the Governor to appoint five Commissioners to meet the Virginia Commissioners, and, at the same time, that it should not be regarded as an expression of opinion on the part of any State that any plan submitted by the Federal Constitution is requisite to afford to the people of the slaveholding States adequate guarantees for the security of their rights, or as a concession of the basis of settlement of our difficulties proposed by the State of Virginia.

THE LEGISLATURE OF MICHIGAN.

This body has passed the following joint resolution on the subject of the crisis:

"Whereas, Certain citizens of the United States are, at this time, in open rebellion against the Government, and by overt acts threaten its peace and harmony, and consummate its destruction; therefore

"Resolved, That the Government of the United States is supported, with the undivided sentiment of the people, in defense.

"Resolved, That Michigan adheres to the Government, as ordained by the Constitution, and for sustaining it in fact, hereby proffers and tenders to the General Government all its military power and military resources.

"Resolved, That concession and compromise are not to be entertained by the Government, as rights and not interests of Union-loving citizens shall be regarded and maintained at every hazard and by every sacrifice."

"Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor, be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the Governors of our sister States."

AN INTERCEPTED DISPATCH FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The New Orleans Delta, of January 19, publishes the following dispatch, which explains itself:

To the Governor of Louisiana:—Governor of Texas:

The following dispatch was received here to-day, and has been by me forwarded:

WASHINGTON, January 18.

Hon. Hemphill Jones, New Orleans:

Till Lieutenant Caldwell to arrest Captain Brashwood, upon consultation of the Secretary of War, and myself, and the order I gave through you. If Captain Brashwood, after arrest, surrenders the forts, you will be the bearer of the order. Lieutenant Caldwell to consider him as a volunteer, subject to Brashwood's order, and not to attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot. JOHN A. B. MOORE, Secretary of War.

A. B. MOORE, Governor of Alabama.

THE MARINE HOSPITAL AT NEW ORLEANS.

The New Orleans Picayune says that the Marine Hospital at that place, the property of the United States Government, and which is still under the charge of United States officers.

THE DEMAND FOR THE SURRENDER OF FORT SUMTER.

The correspondence between South Carolina and the United States, relative to the demand of Fort Sumter, has been published. It is as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE OFFICE, Columbia, December 30, 1860.

SIR,—At the time of the separation of the State of South Carolina, you withdrew the troops from Fort Sumter, and still in, in the possession of troops of the United States, under the command of Major Anderson. This unusual possession as not consistent with the dignity or safety of the State, and I am instructed by the Convention to demand to Major Anderson a communication to obtain from him the surrender of the Fort, with the public property therein. The reply of Major Anderson informs me that he has no authority to do what I required, but he desires a reference to the Government at Washington. I am, sir, &c.

"Under the circumstances now existing, and which need no comment from me, I am instructed by the Hon. Governor R. W. Hayne, the Attorney-General of the State of South Carolina, and have proceeded to this city for the purpose of Fort Sumter, in the harbor of Charleston, to the constituted authorities of the State of South Carolina.

"The demand I have made of Major Anderson, and which I am now here to enforce, is based upon the just and earnest desire to avoid the bloodshed which a persistence in the occupation of Fort Sumter by troops of the United States; and which will be unavailing to secure you that possession which you have already so deeply to be deplored.

"If consequences so unhappy shall ensue, I will accept for this State, in the demand which I now make, the satisfaction of having exhausted every attempt to avoid it.

"The bearer of this letter is Lieutenant Hall, formerly within Fort Sumter, Hon. I. W. Hayne, who will hand you this communication, is the Attorney-General of the State, upon the adjustment of its relations with the United States, of which I was a citizen.

"I. W. HAYNE.

"To the President of the United States."

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MAJOR ANDERSON.

The following letter from Major Anderson has been received by the Secretary of War, and by the Military Association:

"FORT SUMTER, S. C., January 23, 1861.

"H. Rossa, Corresponding Secretary of the New York State Military Association:

"SIR,—There are so many things which require my attention that I have only time to acknowledge, very briefly, the receipt of your letter of the 19th inst., and to enclose a copy of the resolutions of the New York State Military Association, tendering their services to the State of Carolina, to assist the proper authority of the Federal Government and myself, in the defense of this work.

"I thank the Association for the complimentary and flattering terms in which they have spoken of me, for the blessing of God, done in the hope of preserving peace, and also for the honor conferred upon me by my election as an honorary member.

"Accept, if you please, my thanks for the expression of your own sentiments, and those of others, for me to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"ROBERT ANDERSON,

THE ULTIMATUM OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The last document in the series is a long dispatch from Hon. A. G. Magrath, reviewing the whole subject, for the purpose of showing that South Carolina is entirely wrong in the position he has assumed—and closing thus:

"You will perceive from the foregoing that the position of the President should be distinctly understood. The safety of all the seceding States is involved in the safety of the State of South Carolina. If it be so that Fort Sumter is held and retained by the United States contrary to the rights which they be, of the United States can be ascertained, and the time for the exercise of those rights, and privileges of the South Carolina you are authorized to give. If Fort Sumter and the State of South Carolina regards such a right, when asserted, or with an attempt at its exercise, as a declaration of war. If the President intends it shall not be so understood, it is proper, to avoid any misconception hereafter, that he should be informed of the manner in which the Governor will feel bound to regard it.

"If the President, when you have stated the reasons which prompt the Governor in making the demand for the delivery of Fort Sumter, shall refuse to deliver the fort, upon the pledges you have been authorized to make, you will communicate that refusal without delay to the Governor. If the President shall not be prepared to give you an immediate answer, you will communicate to him that his answer may be transmitted, within a reasonable time, to the Governor, at this place. The Governor does not consider it necessary that you should remain in Washington, unless you deem it necessary to execute this, the closing duty of your mission, in the manner now indicated to you.

As soon as the Governor shall receive from you the information that you have closed your mission, and the reply, he will convene the Legislature, when he will consider the conduct which will be necessary on his part."

A SAMARITAN IN HOOPS.

A correspondent in the Charleston Mercury states that a lady who resided in South Carolina, a few years ago, carried under her hoops a box of candles and some other articles which she purchased for the benefit of the garrison.

MR. CRITTENDEN AGAINST A CONVENTION IN KENTUCKY.

The following letter we find in the Frankfort Commonwealth of Saturday:

FRANKFORT, Ky., January 18, 1861.

"MY DEAR COZEN,—I feel under many obligations to you for your many letters, and I beg that you will continue the correspondence, notwithstanding the unpleasant topics, conditions, and unavoidable contingency. I have in truth, nothing to write a line to the absent friend, or even to draw a free breath. Your letters have a freshness and vivacity that makes me forget some of the things you tell me. All things here are in chaos and darkness, [it is to be hoped] that even though my calculations may not pass, they will be the root out of which a better system will grow.

"The news from Frankfort is that you will not call a Convention. I hope it is true, for it is no cause why we should secede out of the Union at this time, and unless it is attended by that result, it will be worse than nothing. Preparations made often induce us to do things from which we cannot recede, and have restrained us. Old Kentucky has too much dignity and history to be drifted into a Convention, and I hope that the Legislature now in the present crisis ought to be well measured, well considered, and mature deliberations. Impulsive action is no cure clearly what we are to gain by dissolution. Our Southern friends I think we have enjoyed so much liberty, so much prosperity, and so many blessings. I write in haste and must conclude.

"Yours, &c., "J. J. CRITTENDEN.

"General L. Cozen."

MAJOR ANDERSON SUPPLIED WITH FRESH PROVISIONS.

Accounts from Charleston to the 4th inst. state that Major Anderson's command still have contract to supply him to obtain supplies of fresh provisions from that city. The steamer Star of the West, from New York, on Saturday has not heretofore obtained supplies from Charleston is, it will be stated, to be sent there under a contract, having, as is alleged, personal violence from their fellow-citizens.

THE INAUGURATION BALL.

The gentlemen who have undertaken to get up a grand Union Inauguration Ball on the 4th of March, have suppressed finely thus far in their work, and it promises to be a magnificent affair. The only request for delay is a temporary building to be erected for the purpose on the occasion, and the Committee have given it to the responsible one, as it will afford ample accommodation for a large number of people. The building is now in use in front of the barracks, recently erected near the City Hall Park, and will be removed to the grounds immediately selected here by order of General Scott. The expense of the hall is estimated at $5,000, and to be paid by the subscribers. Books for subscription will soon be opened in the principal cities, and in Washington.

MR. LINCOLN'S FIRST PUBLIC LETTER.

Mr. Lincoln's first public letter since his election as President is addressed to the Indiana Legislature, and reads as follows:

"SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, Jan. 26, 1861.

"Messrs. R. A. Chapman, Wm. Hendricks, and D. Q. Pennington, Committee:

"GENTLEMEN,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your hands, of a copy of a joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, which I have read on the 25th instant, inviting me to visit that honorable body on the 11th of February next, expressing my profound and grateful for the flattering testimonial of their regard and esteem. It will be my best to be there in my acceptance of their kind invitation, and trust even that I will embrace the visit them, in accordance with their expressed desire, on the 11th of February next. With feelings of high consideration, I remain your obedient servant,

"A. LINCOLN."

RETURN OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES FROM THE SOUTH.

The United States steamship Supply, Commander Walker, left Brooklyn navy-yard on Saturday last, bound for wives and families of the Commander, officers, and others of the United States Navy, stationed at the various ports of passage, a portion of which was rough. The passengers left command and reached Norfolk safely.

The wives and children of the officers at Fort Sumter arrived on Wednesday in the Harriet.

PERSONAL.

The cause of the Republican members of the Legislature, held at Albany on Saturday 26, nominated the Hon. Ira Harris for re-election to the United States Senate of the United States. Judge Harris was nominated on the 64th ballot, the Democratic candidate, Hon. William M. Evarts, and Mr. Horace Greeley. Mr. Harris was the Republican candidate, and the Democrats voting for Governor Seymour.

The Tribune says that it is cautiously whispered among the families friends of both parties in Albany that Mr. and Mrs. Beach, Governor Seymour's daughter, are about to create excitement about the country, are about to come together again. This is with a very certain sense that the end of the further prosecution of the controversy was taken out of the Court and Mrs. Beach has received the custody of her young child, and mutual friends are now engaged in effecting a reconciliation upon the basis indicated.

The wife of Commodore Paulding, now Commandant at Port Pickens, arrived at the port last week with about 70 passengers of wives and children of officers of the Navy, soldiers and dismissed on parole.

The Democratic press are up to the Senate the nomination of Mr. Black, new Secretary of State, for Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judge Daniels.

The Hon. Henry Winter Davis, of Md. D. Hubbard of Virginia, Anti-Secession under any circumstances, were elected triumphantly on 4th to the State Convention, over their opponents, who refused to pledge themselves that they would not sign a secession ordinance.

It is understood that the New York bankers have met and come to the conclusion that Secretary Cobb is wrong in either dolor of the forthcoming United States loans, unless a compromise is effected which shall be satisfactory to the border Slave States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE COTTON FAMINE.

An influential meeting was held at Manchester to devise measures to relieve the cotton-trade from the sanitary condition from the dependence on the Southern States of America. Resolutions were passed recommending efforts commensurate with the pressure for cessation of hostilities; approving the steps taken for the formation of a Cotton Company and expressing the desire that the Company recently instituted should commence operations without delay.

Several American vessels have been registered at Liverpool under the British flag, in order to enable them to carry cotton South Carolina and return with cotton without fear of capture. Vessels are on the way to Liverpool with South Carolina Cottonseed.

LETTER FROM LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

Lord John Russell, in a letter to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, refers to the possible effects on the cotton supplies under the political crisis in the United States, and tenders to the cotton manufacturers the services of British Consuls in all cotton-producing districts, and the dissemination of the wants of the cotton trade, and the acquisition of information relative to possible supplies. Lord John says that Government is not prepared to incur any expenditure, but they are willing to facilitate, by the means the Consuls may be useful in ascertaining what amount of cotton may be forthcoming from their respective districts to meet any sudden demand, or what amount may be brought into the local market, if the native producers had a reasonable assurance of finding customers for it at a given time.

FRANCE.

MILITARY PREPARATIONS IN FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says there is no abatement in the extraordinary activity in the military preparations are being made by France. The excuse is the menacing attitude of Germany toward Denmark, and the speeches of the King of Prussia.

THE PATTERSON CASE.

The Moniteur publishes a decree to the one about to be brought before the tribunals, in which M. Jerome Bonaparte and Mrs. Patterson, the divorced wife of the late Prince Jerome, demand a partition of the Prince's property. The Minister recommends that the pleadings be treated before doors are opened.

THE EMPRESS ON SKATES.

A Paris letter says: "The Emperor, Empress and Empress, the Count and Countess de Morny, and, in fact, all the fashionable people who could get on the ice, took in this kind of exercise, are on the ice every afternoon. The Empress is by no means a bad skater. She is a fifty-two years of age—a fact to 'young' in this country, where the ladies are taught through the crowd of skaters as unnoticed as any other private individuals. The Empress is not in the number, and who commenced her ice exercises in a handsome basque of black velvet, trimmed with fur, but has been induced to try skates, and yesterday made her début in a short dress of black velvet, which reached to the ankles and legs, and set off her person to great advantage. Her daughter Eugenie very well for a beginner. The dress was set by the hand by several gentlemen in her first movements—among the rest by Count Walewski, the well-known gran artist, and one of the 'crack' skaters, and the honor was rewarded by Majesty. Several English ladies have appeared on skates; but are be so rare at Paris that skating has not yet become a fashionable amusement. The initiative of the Empress will perhaps give it vogue for say future occasions that may present.

PRUSSIA.

WARLIKE SPEECH OF THE KING.

At an interview with all the Generals in Berlin, the King of Prussia addressed to the following warlike speech: "I have been called to the throne in times full of danger, and with the prospect of combats in which I shall perhaps have to lead you, gentlemen, to bloody successes. If I and the Princes, who, like me, desire the honor of our country, are to succeed in turning aside the storm which is rising, we shall have need of all our forces and of the entire devotion of the army in time as in difficulties. If I do not succeed in turning aside the conflict, we shall be engaged in a contest in which we must vanquish if we are not willing to perish."

The Prussian Chamber of Deputies, on the King said: "You must courageously labor to make the army what it ought to be for the future protection of Prussia."

ITALY.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF GAETA.

Official dispatches announce that at eight o'clock on the morning of the 22d the batteries of Gaeta unexpectedly opened fire against the French fleet, which was then approximately repied, and compelled the place to remain silent. Several French vessels approached the fort. Two grenadiers were stationed before Gaeta, and at noon on the 22d the bombardment was resumed. The batteries were again engaged on new batteries.

The Naples dispatch of the 23d says: "The batteries of Gaeta have slackened fire."

The Kingdom of Naples publishes a declaration of the blockade of Gaeta.

LETTER FROM GARIBALDI.

Garibaldi, in a letter to a Vigilance Committee in Italy, dated 18th of January, says that the Government is pressing the necessary means for facilitating to Victor Emanuel the annexation of Naples and Rome to Italy. Garibaldi is urged to penetrate every Italian with the idea that in the spring of 1862 Italy must be ready to march with a million under arms. He also says a journal should be established in Turin, which will publish literature the choice of deputies, having as their first thought the enfranchisement and Rome. Count Cavour has died within four days of the commencement of the illness.

PARIS FASHIONS.

Our lady readers will find on the two following pages illustrations of the latest Winter Fashions. In mantles there is a great variety. No. 1, at the extreme left of our illustration, is of dark gray drap velouté, trimmed with narrow strips of black velvet, which are in turn edged with brown plush. The cut is of black velvet, trimmed with black lace. No. 3 is also of rich black velvet, richly embroidered in black silk. No. 4, the centre figure of the group, is composed of black silk figure, and made of brown cloth, trimmed with black plush. Next on the right of this are two views, back and front, of a mantle of black silk and Cashmere, with orange stripes, and the lower border also having two stripes of orange Cashmere. No. 7 is of black velvet, trimmed with a deep plush, which much resembles fur. The buttons are in gray and black. No. 8 is of black cloth, trimmed with black velvet.

In the upper right-hand corner is a hood, made of a square of fine red flannel, trimmed with black velvet and black lace. The hood is made form a triangular piece, in which the under edges project so as to show two rows of trimming. The short Zouave jacket, of which we give front and back views, is made of blue Cashmere, lined with white silk. It is trimmed in black.

The woolen hood is knit, and requires, as material, two ounces of white zephyr worsted and of gray zephyr worsted, and two ounces of white Angola wool.

The Italian collar consists of four puffs, made of Brussels cloth, each four centimetres broad, and the four sewed together. Each is marked with a border of small black or blue velvet ribbon. To the lower puff is joined a smooth, broad garniture, cut in twelve folds, each fold ornamented with a rosette of narrow velvet ribbon, and the whole edged with a quite narrow gathered edging of the same material; a rosette of narrow black velvet ribbon, with long ends, also covers the junction of the folds in front.

FOR FEBRUARY.

"BRING ME A LIGHT"

A GHOST STORY.

My name is Thomas Whinmore, and when I was a young man I went to spend a college vacation with a gentleman in Westmoreland. He had known my father's family, and had been appointed the trustee of a small estate left me by my great-aunt, Lady Jane Whinmore. At the time I speak of I was one-and-twenty, and he was anxious to give up the property into my hands. I accepted his invitation to "come down to the old place and look about me." When I arrived at the nearest point to the said "old place," to which the Carlisle coach would carry me, I and my portmanteau were put into a little cart, which was the only wheeled thing I could get at the little wayside inn.

After we had journeyed a few miles, my driver, a tall, strong, old man, glancing sharply at me, inquired: "Be ye t'maister, lad?"

"I am," said I. "My name is Whinmore."

"Maister Tom?"

"The same. Do you know any thing about me and my old house?"

"Deed do I. You're the heir of t'auld leddy, Mr. Erle is your guardian, and farms your lands."

"I know so much, myself," I replied. "I want you to tell me who lives in Whinmore Hall now; surely there is somebody, some old woman or other, who lives in the old house and airs the rooms?"

"Deed is there. But it's nobbut ghosts and devil's spawn of that sort."

"I am surprised, Mr. Thirlston, to hear a man like you talk such nonsense."

"What like man do ye happen know that I am, Maister Whinmore? Tho' if I talk nonsense (and I'm no gainsaying what a learned colleague like you can tell about nonsense), yet it's just the things I have heard and seen myself I am speaking of."

"What have you heard and seen at Whinmore Hall?"

"What a' body hears and sees to Whinmore, 'twixt sunset and moonlight; and what I used to see times and oft, when I lived there forming man to t'auld Leddy Jane—what I'm not curious to see again, now. So get on, Timothy," he added to the horse, "or we may chance to come in for a fright."

"Is that the house, yonder, on the right?" I asked.

"There's na ither house, good or bad, to be seen from this," he replied: but I observed that he held out his hand in the direction I had indicated. He kept a look-out straight between the horse's ears; I, on the contrary, never took my eyes off the gray building which we were approaching. Just as we entered the shadow cast by the trees of the shrubbery our horse snorted, and sprang several yards from the inclosure.

"Now for it! It is your evil fault for running away, and bringing us late," muttered Ralph Thirlston, grasping the reins and standing up to get a better hold of the horse. Timothy never stood still; and to my surprise he was trembling in every limb, and shaking with terror.

"Something has frightened the beast," said I. "I shall just go and see what it was," and was about to jump down, when I felt Ralph Thirlston's great hand on my arm: it was a powerful grip.

"For the love of God, lad, stay where ye are!" he said, in a frightened whisper. "It's just here that my brother met his death, for doing what you want to do now."

"What! For walking up to that fence and seeing what trifle frightened a skittish horse?" And I looked at the fence intently. There was nothing to be seen but a straggling bough of an elder bush which had forced its way through a chink in the rotten wood and was waving in the wind.

Finding that the man was really frightened as well as the horse, I lowered him. He still held my arm.

"There is no need for any one to go closer to see the cause of poor Timothy's fear," I said, laughing. "If you will look, Mr. Thirlston, you will see what it was."

"Na! lad, na! I'm not going to turn my face toward the devil and his works. 'Lord have mercy upon us! Christ have mercy upon us! Our Father which art in heaven—" and he repeated the whole prayer with emphasis, slowness, and with his eyes closed. I sat still, an amazed witness of his state of mind. When he had said "Amen," he opened his eyes, and looked down at the horse, who seemed to have recovered, as I judged by his putting his head down to graze, he gave a low whistle, and tightening the reins once more, Timothy allowed himself to be driven forward. Thirlston kept his face away from the inclosure on his right hand, and looked steadily at Timothy. I gave another glance toward the innocent elder bough—but what was my astonishment to see where it had been, or seemed to be, the figure of a man with a drawn sword in his hand.

"Stop, Thirlston! stop!" I cried. "There is somebody there. I see a man with a sword. Look! Turn back, and I'll soon see what he is doing there."

"Na! na! Never turn back to meet the devil, when ye have once got past him!" And Thirlston drove on rapidly.

"But he may overtake you," I cried, laughing. But as I looked back I saw that a pursuit was not intended, for the figure in the field remained where it was, seemed to be, the figure of a man with a drawn sword in his hand.

"Stop, Thirlston! stop!" I cried. "There is somebody there. I see a man with a sword. Look! Turn back, and I'll soon see what he is doing there."

"I'll pay a visit to that devil to-morrow," I added. "I shall not harbor such game in my premises."

"Lord's sake, don't talk like that, Maister Whinmore!" whispered Thirlston. "We're just coming to the gate! Maybe they may strike Timothy dead!"

"They? Who? Not the ghosts, surely?" I looked through the great gate as we passed, and saw the whole front of the house. "Why, Mr. Thirlston, you said no one lived in the old Hall! Look! There are lights in the windows."

"Ay! ay! I thought you would see them," he said, in a terrified whisper, without turning his head.

"Why, look at them yourself," cried I, pointing to the house.

"God forbid!" he exclaimed, and he gave Timothy a stroke with the whip that sent him flying past the rest of the garden of the Hall. Our ground rose again, and in a few minutes a good view of the place was obtained. I looked back at it with vivid interest. No lights were to be seen now, no moving thing; the black windows contrasted with the gray walls, and the gray chimneys with the black clouds, as when the lone fire appeared to me. The moon now rose above a dark hill on our left. Thirlston allowed Timothy to slacken his speed, and, turning round his head, he also looked back at Whinmore Hall.

"We are safe enough now," he said. "The only dangerous time is between sunset and moonrise, when people are passing close to the accursed auld place."

About a mile further the barking of a house-dog indicated that we were approaching Mr. Erle's. The driver stopped at a small wicket-gate leading into a shrubbery, got down, and invited me to do the same. He then fastened Timothy to the gate-post. The garden and the house have nothing to do with my present tale, and are far too dear to me to be flung in as an episodical romance. They form the scenery of the romantic part of my own life; for Miss Erle became my wife a few years after this first visit to Whinmore. I saw her that evening, and forgot Ralph Thirlston, the old Hall, its ghosts and mysterious lights. However, the next morning I was forced back to this strange old world in her father's study. There I heard Mr. Erle's account of my property. All the land was farmed by himself, except the few acres round the Hall, which no one would take upon any terms not worth tilling, and because of the evil name of the house itself.

"I suppose you know why no tenant can be found for the Hall, since Ralph Thirlston drove you over?"

"No!" I said, smiling. "But I could get no rational account from him. What is this nonsense about ghosts and lights? Who lives in the Hall?"

"No one, my good fellow. Why, you would not get the stoutest man in the parish, and that's Thirlston, to go into the house after sunset, much less live in it."

"But I have seen lights in some of the windows myself."

"So have I," he replied.

"Do you mean to say that no human beings make use of the house, in virtue of the superstition about it? Tricks of this kind are not uncommon."

"At the risk of seeming foolish in your eyes, I must reply that I believe no human beings now living have any hand in the operations which go on in Whinmore Hall." Mr. Erle looked perfectly grave as he said this.

"I saw a man, with a sword in his hand, start from a part of the fence. I think he frightened our horse."

"I, too, have seen the figure you speak of. But I do not think it is a living figure."

"What do you suppose it to be?" I asked, in amazement; for Mr. Erle was no ignorant or weak-minded person. He had already impressed me with real respect for his character and intellect.

He smiled at my impetuous tone.

"I live apart from what is called the world," said he. "Grace and I are not quite enough to think every thing which we can not account for either impossible or ridiculous. Ten years ago I myself was a new resident in this county, and wishing to improve your property, I determined to occupy the old Hall myself. I had it prepared for my family. No mechanic would work about the place after sunset. However, I brought all my servants from a distance, and took care that they should have no intercourse with any neighbor for the first three days. On the third evening they all came to me and said that they must leave the next morning—all but Grace's nurse, who had been her mother's attendant, and was attached to the family. She told me that she did think it safe for a child to remain another night, and that I must give her permission to take her away."

"What did you do?" said I.

"I asked for some account of the things that had frightened them. Of course I heard some wild and exaggerated tales; but the main phenomena related were what I myself had seen and heard, and which I was as fully determined as they were not to see and hear again, or to let my child have the chance of encountering. I told them so, candidly; and at the same time declared that it was my belief God's providence or punishment was at work in that which I saw, as every where else in creation, and not the devil's mischievous hand. Once more I made a rigorous search for wood-devils, or some what I myself had seen and heard, and which to many had heard and seen, but without any discovery: and before sunset that evening the house was cleared of all human occupants. And so it has remained until this day."

"Will you tell me the things you saw and heard?"

"Nay, you had better see and hear them for yourself. We have plenty of time before sunset. I can show you over the whole house, and if your courage holds good, I leave you there to pass an hour or so between sunset and moonrise. You can come back here when you like; and if you are not frightened by what you see, and care to bear, the story which peoples your old Hall with horrors, I will tell it you."

"Thank you," said I. "Will you lend me a gun and pistols to assist me in my investigations?"

"Gladly." And taking down the weapons I had pointed out, he began to examine them.

"You want them loaded?"

"Certainly, and with bullets. I am not going to play."

Mr. Erle loaded both gun and pistols. I put the latter into my pocket, and we left the room by the window. Grace Erle met us on the moor, riding a shaggy pony.

"Where are you going, so near dinner time?" she asked.

"Mr. Whinmore is going to look at the old Hall."

"And his gun?" she asked, smiling.

"I want to shoot rabbits," I said.

She looked as if she were about to say something eagerly, but checked herself, and rode slowly on with the dogs. I could not wonderer what she was going to say. Perhaps she wished to prevent me from going.

Presently we stood before the great iron gate of Whinmore. Mr. Erle took two keys from his pocket. With one he unlocked the gate, with the other an inner door. There were no other fastenings. These were very rusty, and were moved with difficulty.

"People don't get in this way," said I. "That is clear."

The garden was a sad wilderness, and grass grew on the broad steps which led up to the door.

As soon as we entered the old threshold I felt the influence of that desolate dwelling creep over my spirits. There was a cold stagnation in the air, and the feebleness of the light in the old rooms that was indescribably depressing. All the lower windows had their pierced shutters fastened, and through each circle of light streamed a ray.

Yet I could have sworn I saw lights in two, at least, of these lower windows. I said so to my companion. He replied:

"Yes. It was in this very room you saw a light, I dare say. This is one in which I have seen lights myself. But I do not wish to spoil my little story by telling you beforehand how. We will leave it, and I will hasten to the lady's bedchamber and dressing-room, where the apparitions and noises are most numerous."

I followed him, but cast a glance round the room before I shut the door carefully. It was partly furnished, however, but on one side was a bed, and beside it an easy-chair. "What name is given to this room? It looks ominous of some evil deed," I said.

"It is called 'could Squire's Murder Room' by the people who know the story connected with it."

"Ah!? I said; "then I may look for a ghost there?"

"You will perhaps see one, or more, if you stay long enough," said Mr. Erle, with the utmost composure. After showing me some other rooms, he added: "Most of the rooms are good enough for a gentleman's household. The rooms I have shown you, and the passages and staircase which lead from one to the other, are the only portions of the house in which you are subjected to annoyance. I have slept in both the rooms, and advise no one else to do so."

"You had dreams?" I asked, with an involuntary smile, as I took my gun from the hall-table, where I had left it.

"As you please," said Mr. Erle, smiling also.

I stretched out my hand to him when we stood at the gate together.

"Good-night!" said I.

"Good-night!" said I. "I think I shall sleep in one of those rooms, and return to you in the morning."

Mr. Erle shook his head. "You will be back at my house within three hours, Tom Whinmore; so, au revoir!"

He strode away over the moor. His fine figure appeared almost gigantic as it moved between me and the setting sun.

"That does not look like a man who should be a prey to weak superstition, any more than good Ralph Thirlston, who drove home alone willingly enough past this same gate and fence at nine o'clock last night." The witching hour, it seems, is just after sunset. Well, it wants a quarter of an hour of that now," I continued, thinking silently. "There will be time enough for me to explore the garden a little before I return to the house and wait for my evening's entertainment."

I walked through the shrubbery and lingered on the grass-grown steps to look at the last rays of the sun, reddening the heather on the distant fell. As I leaned on my gun enjoying the profound stillness of this place, far from all sounds of village, or wood, or sea—a stillness that seemed to deepen and deepen into unearthly intensity—the charm was broken by a human voice speaking near me—the tone was hollow and full of agony—

"Bring me a light! Bring me a light!" it cried. It was like a sick or dying man. The voice came, I thought, from the room next to me on the right hand of the Hall. I rushed into the house and to the door of that room: it was the first which Mr. Erle had shown me. I remembered shutting the door—it now stood wide open; and there was a sound of laughing and mocking within.

"Who is there?" I shouted. No answer came. But there passed by me, as it were, in the very doorway, the figure of a young and, as I could see at a glance, very beautiful woman.

When she moved onward I could not choose but follow, trembling with an indefinable fear, yet borne on by an irresistible attraction. At the foot of the stairs she turned on me again, and smiled, and beckoned me with an upraised arm, whereon great jewels flashed in the gloom. I followed her quickly, but could not overtake her. My limbs—I am not ashamed to say it—shook with strange fear; yet I could not turn back from following the fair form. Onward she led me—up the stairs and through the gallery to the door of the lady's chamber. There she paused, turned, and again turned her bewitching face, radiant with smiles, upon me before she disappeared within the dark doorway. I followed her into the room, and saw her stand before the antique toilet and arrange in her bosom a spray of roses; then she kissed her hand to me and glided to the narrow stairs that led to the little room above. Then came a low, loud, mighty voice—the voice of a woman accustomed to command. It sounded from the little room above, and it could not be the voice of that fair girl. I felt sure. It said:

"Bring me a light! Bring me a light!"

I shudder as I write the sound; I know not why, but I stood there still. I then saw the figure of an old female servant rise from a chair by one of the windows, and commence to ascend the stairs. I saw her light two tapers, with her breath, it seemed.

"Bring me a light!" was repeated in an angry tone from the upper room.

The old woman passed rapidly to the stairs. Thither I followed in obedience to a sign from her; and mounting to the top, saw into the room.

That beautiful girl stood in the centre, with her costly lace gown sweeping the floor, and her black curls drooping to the waist. Her back was toward me, but I could see her innocent, sweet face in the great glass. What a lovely, happy face it was!

Behind her stood another lady, taller, and more majestic. She pretended to caress her, but her proud eyes, unseen by the young lady, brightened with triumphant malice. They glared darkly in the light of the taper which she took from the maid. "God of heaven! can a woman look so wicked?" I thought.

"Watch her!" whispered a voice in my ear—a voice that stirred my hair.

I looked at her. Would to God I could forget that vision! She—the woman, the fiend—bent carefully to the floor, as though to set right the embroidery at the border of the bride's robe. I saw her lower the flame of the candle, and set fire to the dress of the smiling, trusting girl. Ere I could move she was enveloped in flames, and I heard her wild shrieks mingling with the low demoniac laughter of her murderess.

I remember suddenly raising the gun in my hand and firing at the fiend-like apparition. I still she laughed and pointed with mocking gestures to the flames and the writhing figure they enveloped. I ran forward to extinguish them; my arms struck against the wall, and I fell down insensible.

* * * * * * *

When I recovered my senses I found myself lying on the floor of that little room, with the bright cold moon looking in on me. I waited without moving, listening for some more of these demon sounds. All was still. I rose—went to the window—the moon was high in heaven, and all the great moor seemed light as day. The air of that room was stifling. I turned and fled. Hastily I ran down those few steps—quicker yet through the great chamber and out into the gallery. As I began to go down the stairs I saw a figure coming up.

I was now a very coward. Grasping the balluster with one hand, and feeling for the unused pistol with the other, I called out—

"Who are you?" and with stupid terror I fired at the thing without pausing.

There was a slight cry; a very human one. Then a little laugh.

"Don't fire any more pistols at me, Mr. Whinmore. I'm not a ghost."

Something in the voice sent the blood once more coursing through my veins.

"Is it—?" I could not utter another word.

"It is I, Grace Erle."

"What brought you here?" I said, at length, after I had descended the stairs, and had seized her hand that I might feel sure it was of flesh and blood.

"My pony. We began to get uneasy about you. It is nearly midnight. So papa and I set off to see what you were doing."

"What the devil are you firing at, Whinmore?" asked Mr. Erle, coming hurriedly from a search in the lower rooms.

"Only me, papa!" answered his daughter, archly, glancing up at my face. "But he is a bad shot, for he didn't hit me."

"Thank God!" I ejaculated.—"Miss Erle, I was mad."

"No, only very frightened. Look at him, papa!"

Mr. Erle looked at me. He took my arm.

"Why! Whinmore, you don't look the better for seeing the spirits of your ancestors. However, I see it is no longer a joking matter with you. You do not wish to take up your abode here immediately?"

I rallied under their kindly badinage.

"Let me get out of this horrible place," said I. Mr. Erle led me beyond the gate. I leaned against it in a state of exhaustion.

"Here. Try your hand at my other pocket-pistol!" said Mr. Erle, as he put a precious flask of that kind to my lips. After a somewhat free application of the remedy I was decidedly better.

Miss Erle mounted her pony, and we set off across the moor. I was very silent, and my companions talked a little with each other. My mind was too confused to recollect just then all that I had experienced during my stay in the house, and I wished to arrange my thoughts and compose my nerves before I conversed with Mr. Erle on the strange visions of that night.

I excused myself to my host and his daughter in the best way I could, and, after taking a slice of bread and a glass of water I went to bed.

The next day I rose late; but in my right mind. I was much shocked to think of the cowardly fear which had led me to fire a pistol at Miss Erle. I began my interview with my host by uttering some expressions of this feeling. But it was an awkward thing to declare myself a fool and a coward.

"The less we say about that the better," said her father, gravely. "Fear is the strongest human passion, so they tell me, and will lead us to commit the vilest acts if we let it get the mastery."

I acknowledge that I was beside myself with terror at the sights and sounds of that accursed house. I was not sane at the moment I saw your daughter! I shall never—"

"Whinmore, she hopes you will never mention it again! We certainly shall not. Now, if you are disposed to hear the story of your ancestor's evil deeds, I am ready to fulfil the promise I made you last night."

"How long ago I can't exactly find out, but some time between the Reformation and the Great Rebellion, the Whinmores settled in this part of the country and owned a large tract of land. They were iron-handed and ironhearted, stanch Catholics, and stanch Jacobites, during the religious and political dissensions of the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth centuries. After the establishment of the Hanoverian dynasty the Whinmores of Whinmore Hall ceased to take any part in public affairs. They were too proud to farm their own land; and putting trust in a nefarious steward, the Whinmore who reigned at the Hall when King George the Second reigned over England was compelled to keep up appearances by selling half the family estate.

"The Whinmores, in question, 'could squire,' as the people call him, was a melancholy man, not much blessed in the matrimonial lottery. His wife, Lady Mary Whinmore, was the daughter of a poor Catholic Earl. Tradition says she was equally beautiful and proud; and I believe it.

"By reason of his couple had only one child, a son. When Lady Henrietta found that her husband was a gentleman of a moping and unenterprising turn of mind, that she could not persuade him to compromise his principles, and ask favor with the new government, she devoted herself to the education of her son, Graham. As he was a clever boy, of healthy health and good looks, she determined that he should retrieve the fortunes of the family. She kept him under her own superintendence till he was years of age. She then sent him to Eton, with his cousin the little Earl of ——. He was brought up a Protestant, and thus the civil disabilities of the family would be removed. He was early accustomed to the society of all ranks, to be found in a first-class English public school; and his personal gifts as well as his mental excellence helped to win him the good opinion of others. Graham came home from Oxford in his twenty-third year a first-class man. He staid at home for a month or two in repose, after the fatigues of study. One afternoon, as he rode home from a distant town, he passed on the top of Whinmore Hill, which commands a good view of the Hall. The simple bareness of the great hills around, the antique beauty and retirement of the Hall—above all, the sweet impressive stillness of the place, had often charmed Graham, as a boy. Now he gazed with far stronger feeling at it all.

"'I shall not be lost to me and my children,' he vowed, inwardly. 'I will redeem the mortgage on the house, I will win back every acre of the old Whinmore land. And I will work for wealth; but I must lose no time, or my opportunity will be gone.'

"He looked at the ruined part of the house, and began to calculate the cost of rebuilding as he hastened forward. As soon as he entered the house he went to see his father, whom he had not seen that day. He found him in his bed, with the nurse asleep in the easy-chair beside it. His father did not recognize Graham. Graham's mind looked very much changed since the previous day. He left the room in search of his mother; thinking, as she was not home for her, that she neglected her duty as a wife. 'She should be beside him now,' he thought. Still he framed the best excuse he could for her then, for he loved and reverenced her. She was so strong-minded, so beautiful. Above all, she loved him with such passionate devotion. He dreaded to tell her the resolution he had formed. She was an aristocrat and a woman. She did not understand the mutation of things in that day; she would not believe that the best way to wealth and power was not through the Court influence, but by commercial enterprise. He went to her bedroom, the Lady's Chamber, in which you were last night. She was not there, and he was about to retreat, when he heard her voice in anger speaking to some one in the dressing-room or oratory above. Graham went toward the stairs, and was met by an old female servant who was in his mother's confidence, and acted as her maid and bedmate to his father. She came down in tears, murmuring, 'I can not bear it. It was you gave me the draught for him. I will send for a doctor.'

"'A doctor, indeed! He wants no doctor,' cried the angry mistress. 'And don't talk any more nonsense, my good woman, if you value your place.'

"In her agitation the woman did not see her young master, and hastily left the room.

"Astonished at the woman's words, he slowly ascended the stairs to the dressing-room. He found his mother standing before the long looking-glass arrayed in a rich dress of old point lace, over a brocaded petticoat, with necklace, bracelets, and tiara of diamonds. She looked very handsome as her great eyes still flashed and her cheek was yet crimson with anger. She turned hastily to her son's foot was heard on the topmost stair. When she saw who it was her face softened with a smile.

"MY ARMS STRUCK AGAINST THE WALL, AND I FELL DOWN INSENSIBLE."

"'You here, Graham? I have been wanting you.'

"'Where are you going, mother, decked out in the family diamonds and lace?'

"'Have you forgotten?—To the ball at the Lord-Lieutenant's. You must dress quickly, or we shall be late.'

"At that moment hasty steps were heard in the chamber below, and a voice called :

"'My Lady! my Lady! come quick! The Squire is dying!'

"Mother and son went fast to Mr. Whinmore's room. They arrived in time to see the old man die. He pointed to her, and cried with his last breath,

"'She did it! She did it!'

"Lady Henrietta set beside his bed and listened to these incoherent words without any outward emotion. She watched the breath leave the body, and then closed the eyes and mouth. Though she kept up so bravely then, she was dangerously ill for several months after her husband's death, and was lovingly tended by her son and the old servant.

* * * * *

"I must now pass over ten years. Before the end of that time Graham Whinmore had become rich enough to buy back every acre of the land and to build a handsome house, twenty times finer than the old one, if he were so minded. But he was by no means so minded. He restored the old house—and it what it was.

"The Lady Henrietta lived there still; and superintended all the improvements.

"It was the autumn of the tenth year since her husband's death, and she was expecting Graham shortly for his yearly visit to the Hall. She sat looking over papers of importance in her dressing-room; the old servant (who seems to have grown no older) sat sewing in the bedroom below, when a housemaid brought in a letter which the old servant took immediately to her mistress.

"Lady Henrietta opened the letter quickly, for she saw that the hand-writing was her son's. 'Perhaps he is coming this week,' she thought with a thrill of delight. 'Yes, he will come to take me to the Lord-Lieutenant's ball. He is proud of his mother yet, and I must look my best.' But she had not read a dozen words before the expression of her face changed. Surprise darkened into contempt and anger—anger deepened into rage and hatred. She uttered a sharp cry of pain. The old servant ran to her in alarm; but her mistress had composed herself, though her cheek was livid.

"'Did your ladyship call me?'

"'Yes. Bring me a light!'

"In this letter Graham announced his return home the following week with a wife—a beautiful girl, penniless, and without connections of gentility. No words can describe the bitter rage and disappointment of this proud woman. Receive a beggarly, low-born wench for her daughter-in-law?—No! She would not hear of that. She paced the room with soft, firm steps, like a panther. After a time thought became clearer, and she saw that there was no question of her willingness to receive her daughter-in-law, but of that daughter-in-law's willingness to allow her to remain in the house. Ah! but it was an awful thing to see the proud woman when she looked that fact fully in the face. She hated her unseen daughter with a keen cold hatred—a remorseless hate born of that terrible sin, Pride. But she must act a woman to hate passively. She paced to and fro, turning and returning with savage, stealthy quickness. The day waned, and night began. Her servant came to see if she were wanted, and was sent away with a haughty negative. She is busy with some wicked thought,' murmured the old woman.

* * * * *

"Graham Whinmore's bride was, as he had said, 'so good and so lovely,' that no one ever thought of asking who were her parents.' She was also accomplished and elegant in manner. She was in all respects but birth superior to the Duke's daughter whom Lady Henrietta had selected for her son's wife. The beautiful Lilian's father was a music master, and she had given lessons in singing herself. Lady Henrietta learned this and every thing else concerning her young daughter-in-law that could be considered disgraceful in her present station. But she put restraint on her contempt, and received her with an outward show of courtesy and stately kindness. Graham believed that for his sake his mother was determined to forget his wife's low origin, and he became easy about the results of their connection after he had seen his mother caress his wife once or twice. He felt sure that no one could know Lilian and not love her. He was proud and happy to think that two such beautiful women belonged to him.

"The Lord-Lieutenant's ball was expected to be unusually brilliant that year, and Graham was anxious that his wife should be the queen of the assembly.

"'I should like her to wear the old lace and the jewels, mother,' said Graham.

"The Lady Henrietta' evebrows were contracted for a moment, and she shot forth a furtive glance at Lilian, who sat near, playing with a greyhound.

"If Graham had seen that glance! But her words he believed.

"'Certainly, my son. It is quite proper that your wife should appear in the ancient heir-looms. There is no woman of quality in this country that can match them. I am proud to abdicate my rights in her favor.'

"'There, Lilian! Do you hear, you are to eclipse the Duchess herself!'

"'I shall see, if you will it,' said Lilian. 'But I do not think that will annoy me so much as dancing.'

* * * * *

"Balls, in those times, began at a reasonable hour. Ladies who went to a ball early in November began to dress by daylight.

"Lilian had been dressed by her maid. Owing to a certain sentimental secret between her and her husband, she wore her wedding-dress of white Indian muslin, instead of a rich brocaded silk petticoat, underneath the grand lace robe. The diamonds effiteerd gayly round her head and her softly-pounded throat and arms. She went to the old library, where Graham sat awaiting the ladies. She wanted his opinion concerning her appearance. The legend does not tell how he behaved on this occasion, but leaves it to young husbands to imagine.

"You must go to my mother, and let her see how lovely you look. Walk first, that I may see how you look behind.' So she took from his hand a sprays of roses he had gathered, and proceeded with them in her hands, and up the staircase to his mother's chamber. She was in the dressing-room above.

"'Go up by yourself,' said Graham; 'I will remain on the stairs, and watch you both. I should like to hear what she says, when she does not think I hear.' For she never praises much to me, for fear of increasing my blind adoration, I suppose,

"Lilian smiled at him, and disappeared up the stairs. It was now becoming dark, and as he approached the stairs, a few minutes afterward, to hear what was said, his mother's voice, in a strange, eager tone, called from above,

"'Bring me a light! Bring me a light!'

"Then Graham saw his mother's old servant run quickly from her seat by the window, and light a tall taper on the toilet. She carried this up to her mistress, and found Graham on the stair on her return. She grasped his arm, and whispered tearfully,

"'Watch her! Watch her!'

"He did watch, and saw—

"For God's sake, Mr. Erle," I interrupted, "don't tell me what he saw—for I saw the same dreadful sight!"

"I have no doubt you did, since you say so; and because I saw them in myself."

We were silent for some moments, and then I asked if he knew any thing more of these people.

"Yes. Graham Whinmore's descendants live now in lives within twenty miles. Graham Whinmore vowed not to remain under the same roof with his mother, after he had seen his wife's blackened corpse. His grief and resentment were quiet and enduring. He would not leave the corpse in the house; but before midnight had it carried to a summer-house in the shrubbery, where it was arched beside it, and allowed no one to approach, except the old servant who figured in this story. She brought him food, and carried to his servants to the house-hold. From the day of Lilian's death till the day of her burial in the family vault at Whinmore Church, Graham guarded the summer-house where his wife lay, with his drawn sword as he walked by night round about. It was known that he would not allow the family jewels to be taken from the body, and that they were to be buried with it. Some say that he finally took them from the body himself, and buried them in the shrubbery; but the undertakers, tempted by the sight of the jewels on the corpse, might desecrate her tomb afterward for the sake of stealing them. This opinion is supported by the fact that a portion of the shrubbery is haunted by the apparition of Graham Whinmore, in mourning garments, and with a drawn sword in his hand."

"Would you advise me to institute a search for those old jewels?" I asked, smiling.

"I would," said he. "But take no one into your confidence, Tom Whinmore. You may raise a laugh against you, if you are unsuccessful. And if you find them, and take them away—"

"Which I certainly should do," I interrupted.

"You will raise a popular outcry against you. The superstitious people will believe that you have outraged the ghost of your great-grandfather, who will become mischievous in consequence."

I saw the prudence of this remark, and it was agreed between us that we should do all the digging ourselves unknown to any one. I then asked how it was that I was descended from this unfortunate gentleman.

Mr. Erle's story continued thus:

"After his wife's funeral Graham Whinmore did not return to the Hall but went away to the south, and never saw it more again, not even to visit his mother on her death-bed, a year after. The last year of the wicked Lady Henrietta's life was very wretched, as you may suppose. Her hesitating and cherished sins brought their ever reward —and her crowning crime was avenged without the terror of the law. For it is said that every evening at sunset the apparition of her murdered daughter-in-law came before her, wearing the rich dress which was so dear to the 'proud woman;' and that she was compelled to repeat her last act, and to hear her screams and the farewell curses of her adored son. The servants all left the Hall in affright; and no one lived with the wicked lady except the faithful old servant, Margaret Thirlston, who staid with her to the last, followed her to the grave, and survived soon after.

"Her son and his wife were sought for by Jane Whinmore on her arrival here. She gave them a home, and even when they wanted an housekeeper and farm-manager at the Hall. And at the death of Giles Thirlston, his son Ralph became farm-manager in his room. He continued there till 't Leddy's' death, when he settled at the little wayside inn which you have seen, and which he calls 'Leddy Jane's Gift.'"

* * * * *

I have but little more to say. Mr. Erle and I sought long for the hidden treasure. We found it, after reading the directions left by the unhappy, addressed to 'My youngest nephew's youngest son.' In that letter directions were given for recovering the hidden jewels of the family. They were buried outside the garden fence, on the open moor, on the very spot where I can swear I saw the figure of a man with a sword—my great-grandfather, Graham Whinmore.

After I married, we came to live in the south; and I took every means to let my little estate of Whinmore. To my regret the Hall has never found a tenant, and it is still without a tenant aft, or there twenty-five years.

A Valentine Romance of ye olden time

GOVERNOR THOMAS H. HICKS, OF MARYLAND.

HON. JOSEPH HOLT, SECRETARY OF WAR.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GOV. HICKS, OF MARYLAND.

WE know of no man who occupies a more prominent position at the present time than the Governor of the State of Maryland, whose portrait we publish herewith. To his wise and patriotic action, in firmly resisting the tide of partisan feeling in his State, he has so far averted civil war, and preserved Maryland as a nucleus about which, if politic counsels prevail, our glorious Union may be preserved. As a representative man of the times, he should be held up as worthy of imitation by all who desire to aid in the perpetuation of the liberties which have given us so prominent a place among the nations of the earth.

Thomas Holliday Hicks was born in Dorchester County, Maryland, on the second day of September, 1798. His parents were plain, respectable people. His father was a mechanic, but late in life became a land-owner and farmer. Owing to his straitened circumstances, Governor Hicks, the eldest of a large family of children, was compelled to perform constant manual labor in the work-shop and on the farm. This mode of life he followed until he reached the age of twenty-two years; in the mean while utterly deprived of the means of education now so freely offered to every one.

When he reached the age of twenty-two he was appointed a constable for one of the districts of his county; which position he filled faithfully during two years, when he was, without his knowledge, nominated as a candidate for sheriff of the county by the Democratic party of that day. Though that party was then largely in the minority, Governor Hicks defeated his Federal opponent by a handsome majority—that opponent being, too, one of the most popular men in the county, and himself being the youngest man ever elected in that county to fill the important office of sheriff.

In 1829 the Adams party, to which he had attached himself, elected him to the Legislature; and he was returned to that position in the following year. In 1831 he was elected a member of the Electoral College, the duties of which was to choose the State Senators. In 1836 he was again elected to that office; and while in the discharge of his duties at Annapolis he was again elected to the Legislature. This was the exciting period when the nineteen Democratic Electors, by refusing to meet the Electoral College, came very near subverting the Government of the State. In the following year he was again elected to the Legislature, and was made a member of the Governor's Council, which position he held until the Council was abolished. He was then appointed Register of Wills for Dorchester County. In 1844 he was reappointed to that office, and served six years. In the mean while he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention, by which the office of Register of Wills was made elective. Subsequently, the incumbent of the office having died, he was induced to accept the appointment at the hands of the Orphans' Court, and at the next regular election he was elected Register of Wills, which office he held until 1857, when he was nominated for Governor by the American party, to which he had attached himself, and was elected by a large majority. It is not a little remarkable that, notwithstanding the fluctuations of party strength in his county and in the State, he never was defeated at a popular election but once—in 1851—when he was nominated, against his wishes, as the Whig candidate for Lottery Commissioner. In every election at which he has been a candidate he has always led the poll in his own county. This fact is abundant evidence of the great popularity he has always enjoyed among those who knew him best.

In person he is about the medium height, thickset, with iron-gray hair and side-whiskers, and a countenance and mien indicative of the utmost firmness of character. That he is possessed of an iron will is sufficiently indicated by his present position in reference to the crisis. It is that peculiarity which has so deservedly earned for him the soubriquet of "Old Cæsar."

Although now the object of severe abuse among his political opponents, on account of his conservative position, he is cordially indorsed by a large majority of the best men in Maryland; and when the smoke of the serious conflict in which we are now engaged shall roll, it will, we think, be difficult to find an unprejudiced man who will refuse to laud him for his honest efforts to avert the terrible calamities which overshadow us.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AT NEW ORLEANS, SEIZED BY THE STATE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

JOSEPH HOLT,

SECRETARY OF WAR.

THE distinguished occupant of the War Department of the United States was born in 1807, in Breckinridge County, Kentucky. His parents were poor, but he managed, by great industry and energy, to obtain a good education. He was educated a part of the time at St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, and the remainder of his college life was spent in Centre College, Danville. In 1828 he commenced the practice of law at Elizabethtown, Kentucky; and he removed to Louisville in the winter of 1831-'32. In 1852, he was sent as a delegate to a Democratic Convention, held in Harrodsburg, Kentucky; and in that body he made a speech that gave him a widespread reputation throughout the State. In the early part of 1833 Mr. Holt was appointed Commonwealth's Attorney for the Jefferson Circuit, which Louisville is the capital. He carried into that position that integrity, sober clearness of judgment, and indefinite resolution that have been so eminently displayed by him in the national positions he has filled. The Sheriff of the County, an ardent political opponent of Mr. Holt, often said to the writer that he never knew Mr. Holt to fail to be prepared for trial while he held the office. He scarcely ever failed in securing a conviction while he was "Prosecuting" Attorney. During this period the writer heard a number of Mr. Holt's speeches to juries, and then believed all that had been said of his eloquence. On one occasion the writer was standing by Mr. Holt at the conclusion of an address to a jury, when Judge Rowan, often called in Kentucky the monarch of the bar, advanced, took Mr. Holt by the hand, and said to him, "Mr. Holt, permit me to say that the effort just made is the finest specimen of legal eloquence I have ever heard." The writer has heard Clay, Barry, Blackstone, Crittenden, Webster, and Everett, and has never heard as perfect oratory as that of Mr. Holt.

Governor James T. Morehead declared that Mr. Holt was the only Commonwealth's Attorney that faithfully wrote out for the Governor's office a full history of every case of conviction in the judicial district of which he was the representative of the Commonwealth. He so endeared himself to the people of Louisville that, with great unanimity, they petitioned for his reappointment. In the autumn of 1835 Mr. Holt removed to Mississippi, and opened an office at Port Gibson. In the following spring he removed to Vicksburg, and soon came into possession of an immense practice. He was almost constantly pitted against S. S. Prentiss, long Mr. Holt was equally as great an orator as that gentleman, and his superior as a lawyer. In the fall of 1836 Mr. Holt assisted in the prosecution of a murder case in Vicksburg, and thrilled the community by the terrible power with which he used a quotation from Macbeth. Homicide was then almost a daily affair in Mississippi, but this murder was peculiarly horrible. A wealthy planter had murdered his son in circumstances of unusual aggravation. The Prosecuting Attorney was in feeble health, and had a great array of legal talent against him. Mr. Holt volunteered his assistance. The reports of a pistol was heard in the planter's inclosure, and the neighbors made their way into the premises. The son was found murdered, and the father had concealed the weapon. "Thou canst not say I did it," he said, still warm from the discharge. The father denied all knowledge of the deed, and insisted that the body of the son, still warm, should be lifted from the yard and buried. In allusion to the father's nonchalance and his audacity, Mr. Holt said that if the accused son were then to arise and say, pointing sound, the father, "albeit with chattering teeth, would exclaim, 'Thou canst not say I did it!' Should the jury believe it?" Those who present say they never saw such an effect produced in a court-room. The murderer looked as though the avenger had summoned the dead to bear witness.

Mr. Holt acquired an ample fortune by his profession, and returned to Louisville, in 1842, with a serious affection of his throat. In 1848 he made a trip to Europe and to the East. He was absent seventeen months. In the winter of 1856-'57 he removed to Washington. In 1857 he was appointed Commissioner of Patents, to which he at once won the confidence of the country.

In 1859, upon the death of Postmaster-General Brown, Mr. Holt was transferred to that department, the details of which he speedily mastered. His reports for 1859 and 1860 will compare favorably with any ever made by his predecessors.

In January, 1861, Mr. Holt was transferred to the War Department, upon the resignation of Mr. Floyd. The friends of the Union throughout the country hailed this appointment with great satisfaction, because they felt that whatever could be done by energy, fidelity, and inflexible courage, would be done.

Mr. Holt has been married twice. His first wife was the daughter of Dr. Burr Harrison; the second was the daughter of the Hon. John C. Wickliffe. They were eminently lovely women, and deeply devoted to the subject of this sketch.

THE NEW ORLEANS CUSTOM-HOUSE, MINT, ETC.

NATURE marked out the position of New Orleans as the inevitable site of a great commercial emporium. Although more than a hundred miles from the mouth of the Mississippi, it occupies the lowest point where a great city can stand. It is therefore, the natural emporium of the largest and most fertile valley on the globe. Nothing short of some natural catastrophe which shall change the physical features of the country, or some political change which shall force the commerce of the Valley of the Mississippi to find some other outlet than its natural one by the mouths of that river, can reduce New Orleans from its present high position. In 1857 the products of the interior landed on the Levee at New Orleans amounted to $156,000,000. Of this $86,000,000—more than one-half—consisted of cotton; some tobacco, $12,000,000; then sugar, $11,630,000. If the present duty on sugar is abolished, or materially reduced, the plantations of Louisiana must be ruined, and this article no longer appear in the commercial statistics of New Orleans. The cotton trade of New Orleans has kept pace with its production, and must continue to do so. More than half the cotton products of the United States is shipped from this one port. In 1857, out of 2,940,000 bales, 1,485,000 were shipped from New Orleans, 509,000 from Mobile, 332,000 from Savannah, and 404,000 from Charleston. If "cotton is king," his court is at the Crescent City.

New Orleans shows every where traces of the two races—French and American—by whom it is chiefly peopled. Streets of low, red-tiled houses, lighted by lamps suspended from chains in the centre, are but a stone's-throw from the Levee, which presents a scene of commercial bustle exceeded in no city on the globe. The St. Charles, one of the most imposing of all the great American hotels, is thronged by Sellers of Flowers, like in every thing but their darky faces and turbaned heads to those of Paris. The Creole Quarter, next to the parent, perhaps—is as common on the shop-signs, in the street placards, and newspaper advertisements, as the more robust English.

Of public buildings there are many deserving special note, such as three or four of the leading hotels, some churches, the Odd Fellows' Hall, and the Charity Hospital—a noble edifice worthy of its noble purpose. Two, however, are just now of special interest: the New Custom-house, of which the United States has had only a brief occupancy, and the Branch Mint—both of which have been recently seized by the State authorities. The former, as will be seen by our illustration, is a structure worthy of the commercial importance of the city. The Mint, of which we give a drawing on a smaller scale, is likewise a fine building, 232 feet long, with two wings of 29 by 81 feet.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

I went the next morning to take leave of Harpar before starting, but found to my astonishment that he was already off! He had, indeed, hired a small carriage to convey him to Dregenz, and had set out before daybreak. I do not know why this should have annoyed me, but it did so, and set me a thinking over the people before that I should not leave Erfahrungen," says, are born to be dupes. "There is," says he, "a race of men who are 'cingeborenen interest'—native dupes—a kind of happy species who meddly the streams of true benevolence by indiscriminating acts of kindness, and who, by always aiding the undeserving, make themselves accomplices of vice." Could it be that I was in this barren category? Harpar had told me the evening before that he would not leave Lindau till his sprain was better, and now he was off, just as if, having no further occasion for me, he was glad to be rid of my companionship—just as if—. I was beginning again to start another conjecture, when I bethought me that there is not a more deceptive formula in the whole repertory of human error than that which opens with these same words, "just as if." Rely upon it, amiable reader, that whenever you find yourself ready to explain a motive, to trace a cause, or reconcile a discrepancy, by "just as if," the chances are about seven to three that you are wrong. It is not in all the bustle of paying my bill and strapping on my knapsack, I'd convince you on this head, as the morning's post had already brought me, of early autumn, and my path lies along the placid lake, waveless and still, with many a tinted tree reflected in its liquid mirror. I am not one farm produce, and implements too, came floating by, showing what destruction had been effected higher up the river. As I stood gazing on the current, I saw, at a little distance from me, a man standing motionless beside the river, and apparently lost in thought; so at least he seemed, for though not at all clad in a way to resist the storm, he remained there, wet and soaked through, totally regardless of the weather. On inquiring at the inn, I learned that this was the Ishnkutchee—the "vetturino"—of the travelers, and who, in attempting to ascertain if the stream were fordable, had lost one of his best horses, and barely escaped being carried away himself. Until that I had forgotten all about the strangers, whom, it now appeared, were chance prisoners like myself. While the host was yet speaking, the Ishnkutcher came up, and in a tone of equality that showed me he thought I was in his own house, in a loud voice asked if I would sell him one of my nags then in the stable.

"Not caring to disabuse him of his error regarding my rank, I did not refuse him so flatly as I might, and he pressed the negotiation very warmly in consequence. At last, to get rid of him, I declared that I would not break up my team, and retired into the house. I was not many minutes in my room when a courier came with a message from the inn mistress to beg I would speak with her. I went at once, and found an old lady—she was English, as her French testified very well and very broad—who apologized for troubling me, but having heard from her vetturino that my horses were discovered that I might, if they disposed to sell one of them, hire out the entire team, to take their carriage as far as Andecer—By the way, I must thus far, I perceived that she, too, mistook me for a Ishnkutcher. It just struck me what good fun it would be to carry on the joke. To be sure, the lady herself presented no inducement to the enterprise, and as I thus balanced the case, there came into the room one of the prettiest girls I ever saw. She never turned a look toward where I was standing, nor deigned to notice me at all, but passed out of the room as rapidly as she entered; still I had remarked that I had already seen her before, and passed a delightful evening in her company as a little inn in the Black Forest."

When the narrator had got thus far in his story, I leaned forward to catch a full view of him, and with some surprise, and I own to my misery, that he was the German count we had met at the Titi-see. So overwhelming was this discovery to me that I heard nothing for many minutes after. All of that wretched scene between us on the last evening at the inn came full to my memory, and I bethought me of lying the whole night with her hard table, fevered with rage and terror alternately. If it were not that his narrative regarded Miss Herbert now, I would turn my back on the room and out of the inn, and out of the town itself, never again to come under the insolent stare of those wicked gray eyes, but in that name there was a fascination—not to say that a sense of jealousy burned at my heart like a furnace.

The current of my thoughts lost me a great deal of his story, and might have lost me had not the hearty laughter of his comrades recalled me once again to attention.

He was describing how, as a "vetturino," he drove their carriage with his own spanking gray horses to Andecer, and thence to Andeer. He had bargained, it seems, that Miss Herbert should travel outside on the cabriolet, but she failed to keep her pledge, so that they only met at stray moments during the journey. It was in one of these she said, laughingly, to him,

"'Nothing would surprise me less than to learn, some fine morning, that you were a prince in disguise, or a great count of the empire at least. It was only the other day we were honored with the momentous presence of a royal personage; I do not exactly know who, but Mrs. Keates could tell you. He left us abruptly at Schaffhausen.'

"'You can't mean the creature,' said I, 'that I saw in your company at the Titi-see.'

"'The same,' said she, rather angrily. "

"'Why, he is a sublimangue: I saw him the morning I came through Constance with some others of his troop dragged before the maire for causing a disturbance in a cabaret; one of the most consummate impostors, they told me, in Europe.'

"'An infamous falsehood, and a base liar the man who says it,'" cried I, springing to my legs, and standing revealed before the company in an attitude of haughty defiance. "I am the person you have dared to defame. I have never assumed to be a prince, and as little am I a rope-dancer. I am an English gentleman traveling for his pleasure, and I hurl back every word you have said of me with contempt and defiance."

Before I had finished this insolent speech, some half-dozen swords were drawn and brandishing in the air, very eager, as it seemed, to cut me to pieces, and the count himself required all the united strength of the party to save me from his hands. At last, I was pushed, hustled, and dragged out of the room into another smaller one-on the same floor, and the key being turned on me, left to my very happy reflections.

SNAKE STORIES.

I was in the Smithsonian Institution at Washington one torrid August afternoon.

I had examined the exterior of the building, with its spurious Early English arches and windows, and its dark red stone that almost looked like chocolate. A very capacious ponderous Castle of Otranto piece of Gothic it is, I must say. Indeed, Gothic does not thrive in America, and our audacious unmedieval people take much more kindly to Corinthian pillars of white marble, fine Palladian windows, and other anti-Saxon enormities.

As I stood looking at the snakes, secured there in their crystal prison, two rough-looking people from Wisconsin came up.

They had both of them, Saul and Moses, often killed rattlesnakes, "any quantity of them," in the woods of Kentucky, whence they both came; but I had better give the matter, as nearly as I can, in their own language.

"Lor, mister," said Moses, "I've killed a heap of snakes about the Green River—yes, sure; and on the Mississippi banks, yes, I guess, a few. I remember when I was a-chopping sumthin' barn one day in a cane-brake down at Green River, there, some one saying something about snakes, put the darned spotted critters all around me, my hands and I began to feel kinder scared, and my hat to blinder lift up off my head, as if my hair had turned to wire, for just then I heard an awful buzzing like an angry cat, and then the buzz of a snake going so fast that it seemed to show double, one a-top a-top of the other, and it looked and forward with your finger. Lor a-mercy, what a heap did make backward—seventeen feet if it was an inch —a caution to Blendin, I guess. Blue flaping, well yes! if they weren't all a-curled up under a hickory-tree, with its head up, its eye like a big diamond on fire, and its rattle tatoling like castanets gone mad. You may laugh, may well know the rattlesnake don't leap, like other snakes, and that's a kinder blessing to us Americans, so I drew back another step or two, and let fly the charge of my gun, which happened to be loaded, slap into his coils, and then finished him with a stockdoler. Saul Hawkins there can tell you of the pieces —fact—yes, Sir. When I cut off his rattles I found he had fifteen rows of 'em, and one of these, 'cute people in the settlements I'm sure, a rattlesnake varmint must have been fifteen year going about the world doing mischief! Wonder how many children he'd killed and eaten?"

On further questioning Saul and Moses, I found that on opening this same rattlesnake's mouth he had discovered a white slime, which he believed to be the poison, existing in a little bag at the teeth, behind which the serpent carries his small pouches of portable death. The teeth, as he tried to explain to me, and as I found when I afterward from actual examination, acted at once as lancets and injectors. They puncture a wound, and at the same instant discharge the poison into minute holes, project into them the poison. Providence, when it gave the bull its crescent horns, the stag its antlers, the lion its claws, the dog its fangs, its teeth, gave the snake, in these hollow fangs, weapons of offense and of defense not less terrible.

The rattlesnake, Moses assured me, seldom, except perhaps when it had its young round it, pursued its enemy; always, if possible, stole away and avoided the combat; but, if trod on by the hunter, or driven into a corner where it was impossible for it to escape, it instantly flew at the unlucky intruder.

Was there any cure for a rattlesnake bite? I had heard that eau de luce was thought a specific in India in cases of bites from the dreaded cobra, or hooded snake, of Hindostan.

"Wa'al," answered Moses, "I tell you what, Mister; a bite from a rattlesnake is always 'a cavashun,' that's sure; where there is one thing that is good for it, it taken in time, and that's whisky."

Then Moses went on to tell me many instances of the efficacy of whisky, which I have read in the newspapers numerous cases in which whisky had proved a remedy in dangerous snake bites. Saul now came forward, and speaking up very nasally, but still like a man, told us a story of an old "nigger" on his father's plantation "down South," somewhere near Jackson's landing on the Mississippi, who had been bitten in the way after a bite. Directly after the fangs went in he tied a handkerchief above the place (it was in his leg), and washed the wound well with water and then with whisky: for already it began to swell and feel sore. He then drank off all the rest of the bottle left (he was a "nigger" of many ays in these cases takes more whisky that usual to make a man drunk—and then staggered home. Next morning he was quite well, only rather sick and sore, but otherwise as well as usual; and in a week or two he was quite recovered, and able to go about as eaton before.

Moses backed up this narrative by assuring me that once, riding through a Kentucky forest, a rattlesnake bit a mustang mare he was on, in the off hind leg, just above the fetlock. He instantly got off, washed the wound with whisky, and poured a drench into the mare's mouth. She winced, kicked a little, grew convulsed, and then grew very chilled; but next day she was all well again, and three weeks afterward she won a trotting match at Nashville.

Saul here interposed, and snatching me out of the hand of Moses, drew my attention to the fact of the rattlesnake's being unable to leap like the puf-adder or the cotton-mouth. This rendered the rattlesnake much more harmless than it otherwise would have been.

This fact, indeed, rendered it easy to escape from a rattlesnake when you came suddenly upon it in a wood for instance, by a leap backward. A story is told relative to this. On one occasion General Jackson was bivouacking by night during the war, in a log hut which the troops had found in a lonely wood. After a hearty supper the General and staff settled down to sleep when a tremendous and multitudinous hissing showed them that a whole army of rattlesnakes was sheltering itself in the room below. Indeed, by the light of a blazing pine knot they could look down between the gaping planks of the floor, and see the "serpents" coiling and hissing, like so many eels in the well of a punt. The suite instantly "made tracks," and cleared out to light a fire in the open air, or sleep round the fires the soldiers had already lighted. But the general, calm and unshaken, well knowing the constitution of rattlesnakes and their manners, having ascertained that the floor he lay on was too far above them for the snakes to reach, and knowing they could not leap, lay down on the planks, and, though hissed to sleep, enjoyed one of the best night's rest he obtained during the war.

I asked Moses about the cotton-mouth snake: having told him, in return for his information, a story about the barber's pole of Jamaica—snake served about three times a week—and also about a certain snake of South America, whose bite is so deadly that no one was ever yet known to survive it.

Moses hereupon told me that the cotton-mouth was a snake very common in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia—hunting barn one day in a cane-brake down at Green River, there, some one saying something about snakes, put the darned spotted critters all around me, my hands and I began to feel kinder scared, and my hat to blinder lift up off my head, as if my hair had turned to wire, for just then I heard an awful buzzing like an angry cat, and then the buzz of a snake going so fast that it seemed to show double, one a-top a-top of the other, and it looked and forward with your finger. Lor a-mercy, what a heap did make backward—seventeen feet if it was an inch —a caution to Blendin, I guess. Blue flaping, well yes! if they weren't all a-curled up under a hickory-tree, with its head up, its eye like a big diamond on fire, and its rattle tatoling like castanets gone mad. AMERICAN SLAVERY JUSTIFIED.
AMERICAN SLAVERY DISTINGUISHED FROM THE SLAVERY OF ENGLISH THEORISTS, AND JUSTIFIED BY THE LAW OF NATURE. By Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., Author of "Discourses on the Supremacy and Independence of Conscience," etc. 1 vol. 12mo. 318 pp. Cloth extra. $1 00.
The country has been flooded with anti-slavery sermons; anti-slavery societies have persevered in spiritual vigorous, and ingenious efforts to inculcate their peculiar views by means of tracts, pamphlets, newspapers, novels, sermons, tracts, pictures, and other means of influencing the public. Meanwhile, but very little has been done to present the other side of the subject. The American can peruse the facts and the discussion, and, not hardly with to decide any question after hearing only one side, and every thinking man have formed opinions will be willing to consider arguments, even though they tend to differ with cherished opinions, if they are from honest source, and which are at once able, forcible, and kind.
The present work puts such Literature from such a source.

CHANTREY'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON, NOW IN THE STATE HOUSE AT BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

CHANTREY'S WASHINGTON.

As the 22d of February once more recurs, we take pleasure in recalling the character of Washington to our readers by publishing on the preceding page the famous statue of the Great Man by Chantrey.

The statue was ordered by the State of Massachusetts, and executed by F. Chantrey, an English sculptor, at a cost of $15,000. It stands in a vestibule erected to receive it on the first floor of the State House, in Boston. It is colossal, standing nearly eight feet high, and represents the Chief wrapped in the folds of his military cloak in the act of stepping from his tent. As an effort to render the figure of a modern military chieftain classical without clothing it in the antique costume, it must be pronounced a perfect success. The likeness was taken from Stuart's painting, and every lip and mind an impression of Washington as the Pater Patriæ rather than as the Commander-in-chief or President. Indeed the scroll in the right hand, in connection with the cloak wrapped about the figure, seems to indicate the intention on the part of the artist to embody all his attributes of Statesman, Warrior, and Sage. As a specimen of workmanship it is undoubtedly the first in this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

THE SUGAR QUESTION.

THE secession of Louisiana and the recent distress in the sugar trade at Havana and New York naturally leading to some speculation with regard to the future of the sugar trade.

It has been assumed that the civilized world consume a year about 1,600,000 tons of sugar—which are derived mainly from the West Indies, the Southern States of this Union, the Mauritius, British India, and Brazil. Over one-third of the total amount comes from the West Indies. One-fifth of the total amount is derived from Asia and the islands adjacent. Another fifth—which includes refined sugar—is made sugar—is obtained from the United States. One-eighth of the total amount consists of beetroot sugar, raised in France, Germany, Belgium, etc. These figures, it need hardly be observed, claim to be nothing more than a rough average. Nothing is more fluctuating than the sugar crop, especially in our Southern States. In 1853, Louisiana produced 375,000,000 pounds of sugar; in 1856, only 81,373,000; in 1860, about 275,000,000 pounds. But as an average, the above proportion is believed to be generally accurate.

The consumption of sugar is distributed very differently from its production. France produces more sugar than it consumes, though it is a large importer of foreign sugars. The United States consume nearly one-third more sugar than they produce. Assuming 1,000,000 tons to be the annual consumption of the civilized world, the following table will afford a rough idea of the relative consumption and production of certain leading countries:

DISTRIBUTION OF 1,600,000 TONS OF SUGAR PRODUCED AND CONSUMED ANNUALLY IN THE CIVILIZED WORLD.

	Consumption.	Production.
The United States	450,000	250,000
Great Britain	300,000	None.
France	165,000	175,000
The West Indies	160,000	320,000
The East Indies	120,000	325,000
Brazil	75,000	100,000
Continental Europe	465,000	25,000
Other countries	60,000	5,000
	1,600,000	1,600,000

Nothing is more fluctuating than the production of sugar, except its consumption. No trade feels the approach of hard times so quickly as the sugar trade. It is the first thing the poor man deprives himself of, when in distress. Sugar is the basis of thousands of luxuries which the rich cease to consume when they are embarrassed in business. In an early number of this journal we showed, from the trade returns, that the people of the United States, during the troubles of 1857, were reducing their consumption of sugar. The reports of the sugar trade indicate the same thing now. Sugar is now selling at a lower price than during the hardest times of November and December last. Our average consumption, which is set down by statists at 40 pounds per head per annum, is not larger than 23 pounds per head at present.

Under the present tariff, which was enacted in 1857, foreign sugar pays a duty of 24 per cent. in this country. The Louisiana planters have always stated that without this duty they could not grow sugar profitably. It is now proposed to reduce the duty say to twelve per cent. Should this be done, and should the cultivation of sugar in Louisiana be abandoned for the cultivation of cotton, the annual product of the cane, in the civilized world, will be diminished by one-sixteenth. Whether this will produce any effect on the price remains to be seen.

The world contains sugar-producing countries which have never been considered in the reports of political economists. China is a very large producer of sugar, though thus far it has exported but little. It is possible that the changes which recent events are producing in the commercial relations between China and Europe and America may lead to an exportation of Chinese sugar.

THE NEW LOAN.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has called for a new loan of $8,000,000, under the act passed on 8th inst. The money is required to pay soldiers, sailors, and others whose claims on the Government have accumulated to this large amount, and have been left unpaid for some time. The bonds are to be sixes, and are to run twenty years. It is not supposed that the negotiation will be an advantageous one for the Government. It was proposed to obtain for the bonds the indorsement of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Massachusetts; and, thus fortified, it is supposed that they might have commanded par. This proposal was defeated, however, by the objections of Mr. Garrett, of Virginia; and the loan now stands upon its own merits.

ARMY AND NAVY.

EUROPE is laughing pretty heartily at our army and navy arrangements in this country. They say that the late Lord Ellesmere, who proclaimed that the United States was the most warlike nation in the world, must have been a wag. Of late, it must be admitted, these departments of our Government have not shone to advantage.

Of our army, which numbers nearly 15,000 effective men, only 1,000 are now left by the Lieutenant-General commanding for the defense of Washington. There are not 80 at Fort Sumter, and less than 70 at Fort Pickens. Then, the sub-arms of our service are far from being equal to those of European soldiers. With all the bravery in the world, an American regiment could not stand against an English or a French regiment, simply because the latter are so much better armed. This inferiority arises chiefly from the operation of the law of Congress forbidding the War Department to purchase "patented" weapons. It has been asserted by some journals that this law, which was introduced by Ex-Senator Jefferson Davis, was part of a conspiracy to enfeeble the United States army. This is a mistake. Mr. DAVIS introduced the measure to head off a Jewish scheme for the purchase by Government of a quantity of arms patented by the friend of a high official. Its passage most displeased the Jewish Jim and the high official whom it circumvented. But whatever the motive of the Act was, its effect is to deprive our army of the effective weapons of modern warfare, and should be amended so as enable the new Secretary of War to supply these weapons to the troops.

Again, as to our Navy. Whether any blame may legitimately be imputed to Mr. TOUCEY or to Mr. Toucey, whose hands of public life have so nearly run out, we can not say; but certain it is that about one half the vessels in the navy are unfit for service, and quite a number of others are airing their sails in a sublimely useless manner on the coast of China.

Other nations are availing themselves of the discoveries of modern science to improve their navy. England and France have both been building scores of gun-boats, propelled by steam, drawing size to eight feet water, and carrying one, two, and three guns. Russia has also built a frigate, cased in iron, which no cannon-ball can damage, and has ordered ten more on the same model. England has built another iron-cased frigate, the invulnerable Gloire, and a swifter ship; she, too, is about to build more such craft. Meanwhile the Government of the United States does not seem to conceive that such things are done, and progress in the past ten years. No one has even proposed the construction of an iron-cased ship here.

MOTLEY'S GREAT HISTORY IN LIBRARIES.

THE New York Mercantile Library Association have purchased two hundred and fifty copies of MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS for their subscribers. And the Brooklyn Mercantile Library Association have taken ten copies of the same work. These are, so far as we are aware, the first instances of similar purchases by any circulating library in this country. They indicate equal enterprise and sagacity on the part of our Mercantile Library Associations.

In England circulating libraries frequently purchase five hundred copies of a popular book. Mudie, the proprietor of the London circulating library in London, takes fifteen hundred copies of Mr. MOTLEY'S HISTORY. A fewer number would not have answered his purpose. He has several thousand subscribers at a guinea a piece. For their guines (say $5 12) these persons read every thing that is worth reading in the book literature of the day: more good books than a score of guineas would procure for them if expended annually in the purchase of books. But in order to retain these subscribers, Mudie must have a large number of copies of each popular work, so that each may have a chance of getting it for his week or fortnight. Hence the wholesale purchases above mentioned.

Our mercantile and circulating libraries in this country have generally been content, hitherto, with purchasing two or three copies of a popular work. Hence their subscribers, after vainly waiting to get it from the library, have been compelled either to purchase it for themselves, or to do without it altogether. It is probable that the arrangement has been beneficial to publishers, who have thus sold more books to the public directly than they would otherwise have done. But it has manifestly been an injury to circulating libraries, and is doubtless the chief cause of the embarrassment in which so many of them are chronically placed.

The New York and Brooklyn Mercantile Libraries have initiated the new plan in this country: let us watch how it succeeds.

☞ We have to thank Hon. JOHN CAMPBELL, M.C., for public documents.

THE LOUNGER.

THE WISEST, BRIGHTEST, —— OF MANKIND.

MR. HEPWORTH DIXON'S Personal History of Lord Bacon is a brilliant and fascinating book—an impassioned plea for a new trial—a masterly motion to carry the great case of the World against Verulam before the Final Court of Appeals, the slow justice of mankind. That such a lyrical burst of enthusiasm should spring from recondite researches among the state papers of England shows how profound the conviction of the author is, and how his ardor not only survives research, but is fed by it. Whether the reader—until the least you can say is, if Hepworth Dixon is not right, Hepworth Dixon ought to be right. He is a true knight pattring his lance in rest for the rescue of injured fame, and tilting valiantly with the most ancient and reverend prejudices.

The name of Bacon has so long pointed the morals of philosophy, and adorned the tales of sceptics—it has been so doubly damned by the eloquence of Macaulay and the weight of Lord Campbell—that it will be the revulsion of attainder at first attracts by its novelty, and at last commands by its utility. It is peculiarly timely also, for it appears during the publication of what will doubtless be the final and standard edition of his works, edited by James Spedding, and reproduced in this country in the most handsome and satisfactory form. And the effort establishes a doubt and necessary stay of judgment. Hepworth Dixon, as junior counsel, takes the devil opening argument, and James Spedding, with due gravity and elaboration, will close the case.

The book teems with rapid, vivid glimpses of the most famous men and events of the most famous period of English history. It is not a complete and continuous biography, but a presentation of the new facts, and the vital lights upon old facts, which patient and later study has developed. It proves quite clearly in how many points Bacon has been misrepresented and misled by popular estimates of his relations with many conspicuous persons; and establishes that, in the ordinary sense of the term, he got a corrupted name. Of seven thousand judgments made by him as Lord Chancellor, not a hundred were set aside.

Yet though his powers of eloquence and, so far, the great success of his advocate, Bacon remains still cold, remote, statuesque; a man of imperial intellect, but not genial, not a lover of his race. It is perhaps the hard outline of a strictly intellectual habit. A great and wise reformer, a sagacious philosopher, of pure morals, of elegant manners—all this he was, and more, but also a courtier, and a man to devise rather than to do. Thus, in the case of Peacham, who was put to the rack, in the presence of Bacon, "Peacham has been often quoted as proof of his cruelty and cowardice. Mr. Dixon flies to the defense. What would you have?" he says. "Is he more seriously doubted in Bacon's day that truth should be extorted by the torture than it is in ours that murderers should be hung. A hundred years hence, he argues, it may be thought as monstrous that people were hung as we now think it that they were tortured. Every man must live in his own air. He lives in his time.

Ah no, Mr. Dixon; there is the slip. Not "every man." If every man were to continue to approve and countenance whatever he could the next century possibly come to think it monstrous? It is only by some man's having a conviction that it is wrong, and talking and acting upon that conviction, that progress is ever changed. But Bacon must have attended, says his advocate, or have resigned his office. Very likely; but what then? That fact is, that he was in need of the argument. On this particular point Bacon was just like the other men of his time—neither better nor worse. The age doesn't help him. In Scotland a hundred and more years ago teachers of youth used to scare convenient windows at public occasions for the entertainment and instruction of their pupils. Tender-hearted pupils would have staid away, and as they became men would have perhaps remained at home. But those who were not especially tender-hearted would have accepted the universal habit, and have thought of it no more. They could not be reproached with peculiar cruelty, but that is all.

Bacon was intellectual and politically ambitious. He loved power and place. He saw serenely the public welfare, and steadily pursued it. But he was a political philosopher, by Mr. Dixon's own showing, rather than a great statesman. He served a little and man master, and was politically ruined by little and mean men. Let it be enough, as we close this bright and fiery book, that he was not little and mean himself.

BREAKING UP.

It was very clear that the river might break up at any moment; for although, on Thursday night, at Albany, the mercury marked twenty-nine degrees below zero, Monday morning broke soft and warm, and a penetrating rain fell all night. Tuesday followed with the same sunshine. Open windows were pleasant, and in country roads the mud was deep and direful. So when the up-train left the city at half past three, it was doubtful when, and where, and how it might arrive.

The river scenery was never lovelier. The dark purple masses of the Highlands stood against the yellow west, and were reflected in the glowing, watery surface of the rolling ice in the river. You could not but think, leaning your head against the window, and looking across, that the right bank of the river is very far away, and suffers a kind of paralysis, akin to that of the left-side of the body. Because, suppose you are in Athens (upon the Hudson), or Kingston, or Coxsackie, and are very anxious to reach New York at once—and as you hasten to the shore—the river is breaking up! You can not go by land, for it is all mud. You can not go by water, for the ice is running. You can not go at all. And indeed it seemed as if at any moment it might begin to run.

At length the train reached Poughkeepsie. What a capital restaurateur there is in this place, and that the name of the town was merely an ingenious inversion of Keeps-a-pigling?) Five minutes only were allowed for oysters by the benevolent brakeman, who called them "refreshments." But when we had all gulped our oysters, and scalded our mouths with hot tea (hot every but it always is at these station-rooms, where you expect every moment that sudden shriek of the agonized bell), and when we had rushed out to ascertain if our train was still standing upon the track, the five minutes passed, and then six times five, and every lady was left behind. Yet, how comfortably and at length he might have taken his tea, and, avaunt, why are we stopping? The engine fizzed—the passengers sat dumb. One occasionally arose and went out, banging the door. Another put up his window. Another nestled nervously in his cloak. Another said, aloud—to nobody in particular, and as if every body had a right to attend to so novel a suggestion—"I wonder what we're stopping for!" The universal stolidity of indifference in this exclusive car was only broken by the irpsaker nervous, so he threw up his window, and putting his head out, shouted to some imaginary functionary, "What's the matter?" Nobody answered, but the engine fizzed with a dull monotony that suggested profound sleep.

Ha! ding, ding, ding! Now we're off! Every body shakes a little and looks happier. The train moves—Laus Deo! We shall not sleep upon the road, nor be compelled to hear each longer the filthy talk of the two semi-drunken lawyers in the car, who drowsily dived indecency. We move cautiously for the first few gap, and then the bridge over the wild stream that jumps down the rocks, Lashing in the light of the new moon that's blinkin' in the lift, and we're off. But we stop again and recede, and for a long hour yet remain upon the track, until the express from New York at five o'clock overtakes us. Then we hear that a bridge has been carried away at Stockport, above Hudson, for the river is evidently about breaking up. Uniting the trains we go on, through the stars and over the full gleam of the soft ice, to Hudson. There we diverge, and pass over the Hudson and Berkshire road to Chatham, and reach East Albany at one o'clock, instead of half past eight. Some of us push on to Troy; the most cross at Albany. The next morning breaks soft and sunny. Passengers come from Albany to the Hudson shore, and in fifteen minutes from that time the ice is moving—the river is breaking up.

In Troy the steamboats that open upon the river are full of people watching, and wondering how high the water will rise, and what the water will do. The stream of ice-cakes, instead of halting, sliding swiftly and smoothly along. If all is clear below, all will be right. But if the water and the ice should be set back, there will be a terrible destruction of property. So suddenly, to almost instantaneous is the breaking up of the river. Yesterday trusted like the earth; to-day as treacherous as the sea. Yet every year, all the thousands who use the frozen river as a turnpike, scarcely a life is lost in the sudden breaking up.

THE HEIR AT LAW.

THE Bonaparte case now upon trial in Paris (you must not suppose that this means the empire of Louis Napoleon) is one in which we are all interested as a country, for an American woman is a party to the suit. The first Madame Jerome Bonaparte, Miss Patterson, of Baltimore, and her son, Mr. Jerome Bonaparte, of the same city, claim their share of the property of the late husband and father, the old Prince Jerome. The point of the case is, that if their children are the issue of a lawful marriage and its issue are vitiated, and those arrangements of human society, the Princess Mathilde, Madame Demidoff, and the Prince Napoleon as Lucien, who had also tainted the blood imperial by marrying a woman he loved. Brother Lucien replied that he had a great regard for brother Napoleon, but he would rather kill his family with his own hand than stoop to the infamy of dishonoring his wife and disinheriting his children—and he never did.

Brother Jerome appears to have sent no reply to Napoleon; but having crossed the sea and sent his wife to Holland, wrote affectionate letters to her; while she, packing over to England, gave birth there, in July, 1805, to the present Mr. Bonaparte, of Baltimore. She remained in England until the November of that year, still getting the pleasant letters from her husband; and in November she returned with her son to the United States. Meanwhile the Emperor had asked Pope Pius the Seventh to annul the marriage, which his Holiness forcibly refused to do.

But meanwhile, also, the Elector of Wurtemburg had become King of Wurtemburg, by the treaty of Freeburg, and his daughter, the Princess Royal, was a desirable bride for Napoleon's brother Jerome. So, on the 1st of June, the Archbishop of Paris did what the Pope had refused to do, and annulled the Baltimore marriage. On the 16th of July Jerome wrote a few complimentary lines—only four or five—to his young wife, hinting nothing of the future, but cold and commonplace. It was the last letter he wrote to her. And on the 12th of August, in the next year, Brother Jerome married the Wurtemburg Princess, and in the following December was proclaimed King of Westphalia. In May, 1808, the King sent to Baltimore for his son, and wrote to his wife that he should never forget the tender ties, etc., etc.; but Madame Bonaparte refused to surrender her child. The King wrote again in November, offering to make her a queen, and her son "a prince;" if possible would come and live near him and his new wife; and the relations between all the members of the Bonaparte family were resolved. Jerome of Baltimore as the son of his father; and when Mr. Bonaparte went to Paris, in 1854, the Emperor presented him with a paper of state declaring that "M. Jerome Bonaparte is to be considered in France as a legitimate." But the Wurtemburg branch were alarmed, and the next year prayed that the Baltimore Bonapartes should "exercise no rights which belong to the legitimate issue," and should therefore drop the family name. The "Family Council" decreed that they should have the name, but have no rights of succession. At the same time honors were offered to the son of Mr. Bonaparte, of Baltimore, as the Napoleonic Patriarch. He declined them; and his father wrote a most manly letter to the Emperor. "As I was legitimately born," he says, "and as I have always maintained my knowledge as such by my family, by the laws of all countries, and by the whole world, it would be the extreme of baseness and dishonor on my part to accept a brevet of bastardy."

The peculiar importance of this case is that the Prince Napoleon is the heir-apparent after the Prince Imperial. And if his father's first marriage was legal, and the issue therefore legitimate, Mr. Bonaparte, of Baltimore, is at least the elder brother; and if the legitimate elder brother, then the next heir after the young Prince.

INEBRIATE ASYLUM.

THERE is no evil in society, however incalculable it may seem, that will not gradually yield to greater knowledge—as there is no night so long and dark but it will at last melt in the sunrise. The golden ages of lighters upon the horizon, are not in that of the future, not of the past; and "the good old times" is a phrase which describes the condition we are approaching rather than that we have left behind. One by one every bodily infirmity engages the genius of science, and the laws of life being more thoroughly mastered, science suggests a remedy or an alleviation. The sad and the idiotic are not, as of old, cast out of human sympathy and tender care; and at last the drunkard is not hopelessly abandoned to self-destruction.

Crime is held by certain speculative philosophers to be a moral disease; and drunkenness is now considered by many wise men to be likewise a disease, both physical and moral, and they propose that it shall be so treated. Even if it be only an infirmity of the will, they say, what are we to treat that infirmity? They think that they can, and the State Inebriate Asylum has been constituted. The inmates are, and have been, those who, relatively engaged in the work, and without any compensation. They are erecting a building, which is already connected to the front of the jail, and they intend to open it for patients in the autumn. It will accommodate four hundred, and already there have been nearly 4000 applications received from every State in the Union, and every county in the State. The funds have been collected in every part of the State in subscriptions of ten dollars, and the trustees have thus far worked without any compensation. They now propose to ask assistance from the Legislature.

And why not? What citizen would not, in every wise way, try to prevent crime, as well as insist upon its punishment? We can not prevent a man's getting drunk; but if we find that we can conquer the wish to get drunk, is not that worth trying for? And would not the institution, which made the effort, be as proud a monument of the humanity and liberality of the State as any other?

In Dean Ramsay's lately published "Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character," there are some curious anecdotes and details of the hard drinking of Scotland a century ago. Drunkenness was regarded as a manly thing. One "accomplished and worthy gentlewoman" took pains to cultivate the habit of drinking in her sons, holding that all young men should be accustomed "to carry liquor discreetly;" and her son, the young laird, was obliged to drink daily a certain quantity of wine, whether he liked it or not. The young lairds, fathers used to tell their sons "to make their head while they were young." As an illustration of the organized and thoroughly systematic drunken revelral habit of drunkenness, the Dean tells a story of Mackenzie, the "Man of Feeling."

The worthy gentleman was caught at a drinking party, and there was no escape. One by one his companions fell from his side, and dropped under the table dead-drunk. At length, to save himself, he dropped too, and while he lay under the table, waiting for morning, he felt a pair of small hands working at his throat. "What's this?" cried Mackenzie. "Sir," was the reply, "I'm the last that's to loose the neckcloths." In that hospitable house they provided against apoplexy or suffocation!

In the hospitality of Scotland the drinking provision will be made against drunkenness itself.

ASSAULTS UPON THE LANGUAGE.

As you go up the Bowery in the cars, or, strolling upon the sidewalk, look at the signs, you will, in full view, the Cooper Institute, one of our noblest public works. The building itself, if not very beautiful or satisfactory, is certainly not unsightly. It stands just above the parting of the Bowery into the Third and Fourth Avenues, and a little triangular plot of inclosed ground marks the very point of the separation. Opposite, upon the Third Avenue, is the new market and armory of the Seventh Regiment; on the Fourth Avenue the city hall has become one of the handsome bins of the city.

But as you approach the stately Institute, you become aware of some unusual effort to adorn and cities your curiosity. Is it a brief inscription of dedication? Is it an explanatory note of the purpose of the building? Is it a quotation from the Bible or near enough now. We can read it distinctly: A Free Reading Room for Males and Females."

Male and female alike free to read, as the sign completed? Do you think that it means men and women? But why? Women are females, but so are cows. Men are males, certainly, but so are donkeys. Does it mean that males, of course, reading males and females, and that donkeys don't read? Not to-day. Did you never see one with a book in his hand at the Cooper Library, at the least apparently, reading? Besides, are there no learned pigs—no dogs that know the alphabet? Again, if men and women are meant, why not say so? Isn't man as good a word to describe a homo as male? Male is a distinction of sex common to all animals, from the fly to the whale; it is the word that do. Man is a word that describes the reading male. Imagine Mr. Everett beginning an oration, or a priest with Queen Victoria, addressing the throng of intelligent men and women before him. He begins: "Females and males."

Let us leave the Bowery to the right places. The room at the Cooper Institute is doubtless for the use of men and women. Then why not say so?

There is a similar and amusing circumlocution in what the word "official" means. Some of the steamer says: Gentlemen are requested not to spit upon the cushions! You might as well put up a request, Gentlemen are respectfully desired not to pick each other's pockets.

Then what is the matter with the word office, that it should be necessary to say that vilest of all vulgarisms, official? "We used to think that the President of the United States was the chief executive office of the United States, but now he is an official. A Collector is an official. A Postmaster is another official. What has become of the office? Have they all gone off with our and women, leaving the world to males, females, and officials?

DOGBERRY-ING.

LOUNGING about the world, you may hear a great deal said about tolerating other people's views. In this country, the toleration of opinion has rightfully no meaning at all; for it implies that some people or some party have rights which other people and parties have not. Lord Macaulay says that only he said to tolerate freedom of the press, because, by the theory of his government, he is the final judge of what is best. But with us there is no such judge. The Legislature, Judians, for instance, in this country, no more "tolerate" the Quakers than the Universalists tolerate the Methodists. In matters of religion, the State institute right, conceded by the theory of the government, to think as he pleases upon religious subjects. It is precisely so in politics. The State institutes have the same rights. One party doesn't tolerate another, as a man who wears a green coat doesn't "tolerate" a man who wears a yellow one.

Our government is a government of opinion; and every individual citizen holds his opinion of right, and as the government acts upon it, every citizen is legitimately affected only by free thought and free discussion, they are the two fundamental points of our whole system; and the man who talks about tolerating another man's views or opinions is a despot in his heart, and—unconsciously, perhaps, but none the less certainly—a traitor to the spirit of the government.

Give a sick man plenty of air, and give a sick government plenty of free discussion. As Mr. Brady justly said, in his curious and amusing speech at the Cooper Institute, the other evening, half of the difficulty that besets us has arisen from attempted interference with the right of every citizen to think and say what he chooses. A certain New England mayor lately laid down the remarkable doctrine that, if you undertook to express opinions which a mob doesn't like or chose to hear, you do it at your peril. The mayor, probably, did not know that he was made mayor to protect the rights of every citizen against forcible interference. We can imagine a trusty citizen of New England—Mr. Edward Everett, let us say—knocked down and robbed upon the Boston Common. He applies to Mayor Dogberry for redress. "Redress!" exclaims his Honor, "you're a pretty fellow, Mr. Everett; what do you mean by carrying money in your pockets and provoking a breach of the peace? Go your ways, and thank Heaven that I don't commit you as a highwayman!"

When our government was young, and old John Adams was President, he was afraid of the popular tongue, so he prudently resolved to shout, in continental chorus, the Whig lilliburlero that sang the Democrats out of office:

"And with them we'll rout the Tyler Van;
'Tis a sad old tune, but a merry man!"

Or the Democrats—how the Sachems of Tammany would have shrieked unintelligible warcries, had Mr. Buren been invited by summons from Court, that to express their opinion of the Congress which chartered the United States Bank was to "defame" that august body! That a droll old President Adam it must have been! But what a droller government of popular opinion it would have been could such a law have been passed! Harm has been done by the moral pleading for the vial law; but it showed too clearly the tendency, perhaps unconscious, but still decided, of the old federal party—to which it belonged.

We must all honor sturdy old John Adams, nor forget for a moment his masterly services toward the independence of the country; but also ponder how much greater was his success, because Thomas Jefferson, saying in his inaugural that error of opinion need not trouble us while reason is left free to combat it. That is the whole system of our government stated in an axiom. Let us all dedicate a new edition of it with our respectful compliments, to Mayor Dogberry.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A CURE FOR BOLDNESS.—By the ancient law of Hungary a man convicted of boldness was condemned to live with both wives in the same house; the crime was, in consequence, extinguished.

A Scotch minister was once ordered "beef tea" by his physician. The next day the patient complained that it had made him very ill. "Ill!" exclaimed the doctor, "why, I'll try the tea myself." So, putting some in a skillet, he warmed it, tasted it, and told the minister it was excellent. "Man," said he, "you're right, in the way ye say it!"—"What like? why should it be cuppit? It's excellent, I tell you!" "Ah, but," said the minister, "my doctor, but try it wi' the cream and sugar, man! try it wi' that, and then ken how it is!"

GREEDY FELLOWS.—"A Burman is not very particular in his food; he will eat almost any thing. Mr. Lanciego tells of his visit to the house of his followers observed him eating some cheese, and in prowling about the ship they had stolen the rest and quietly begun to be a similar delicacy, but which, to their grief, turned out to be a bar of yellow soap. They could discover their mistake, however, discontinue their attacks upon it, until their mouths were foaming with the soap, and the astonishment at their master's predilection for such nastiness."

A young actor having played a part tolerably well, Elliston one evening called him into the green-room, and complimented him upon it. "Upon my word, you have not only pleased the public, but you have pleased me: and, as a proof which I can give of it, here's a guinea." He had your acceptance of a small piece of plate." It was, beyond all question, a very handsome piece of a silver tooth-pick case.

"REST IN AVOICE."—In the old church at Manchester, now the cathedral, the marriage ceremony is, or was, performed in Latin. Some years ago, when the late Dr. Joshua Brooks, a well-known clergyman of the foundation, had officiated at the marriage of a couple together, two or three unfortunate wights would come up to him with the query, "Now, master, then, I've gotten the wrong woman?" His reply was always the same—"Well, well, lads and lasses, pair as you go out—pair as you go out—rest in avoice!" and it did very well.

A Dutchman being advised to rub his limbs well with brandy for the rheumatism, said he had heard of the remedy, but added, "I have tried it—I drinks de brandy, den I rubs my legs wid de bottle."

"THAT'S very singular!" said a young lady to a gentleman who had been telling her a story. "Oh, well, my dear miss, I will soon make it plural."

LAWYERS' FAY.—A poet young lawyer once boasted to a member of the bar that he had received two hundred dollars for speaking in a criminal case. "Well," replied the counselor, "I received double that sum for keeping silent in the very case."

ROSE, private secretary to Louis XIV., having married his daughter to M. Portail, president of the Parliament, was asked if he thought the son-in-law would be competent to his daughter's ill-temper. To one of these he at length answered, that he was fully convinced of her mischievous, and was resolved to punish her for it: in short, if he heard any more of it he would dishearth her. He heard no more.

A man who commits suicide does a rash act; but he who can leave the world decently does well.

OF a tough, a horse without a girt is only half blessed: it is an orchard without blossoms, and a spring without song. A horse of one is like a fiddle with its strings broken, but daughters by the fireside are like roses in Sharon.

AT Eton once, a boy rendered "Scipio Africanus," "an African walking-stick." Dr. Keate, the head master, remarked with a rare, "Sit down, Sir: you are too great a fool to be flogged."

NOBILITY OF BIRTH.—A west-country editor asserts that he was born a "gentleman." The remark called to mind many person can claim in that he was born a "gentle baby."

"I can't undertake, wife, to gratify all your whims; it would be as much as my life is worth." "Oh, Sir, that's nothing!" she replied

THE PRINCE OF WALES' KISS.—The Canadian journals are disputing over the identity of the girl who it said to have received the only kiss bestowed by the Prince of Wales throughout his tour. The fair one did not expect to have her honors questioned so soon.

Anderson the actor was seldom known to be in a passion. When at Oxford, he was one day debating with a fellow-student, who, not keeping his temper, threw a glass of wine into his face, when Anderson took out his handkerchief, wiped his face, and coolly said, "Think, Sir, was a gentleman I now for the first moment."

The man who follows the sea thinks he shall get up with it one of these days.

Man, unstomach say, changes entirely every seven years. Therefore, says the witty Jones, "my tailor should not remind me of the bill I contracted in 1851. I ain't the man who contracted it."

"YOU should be ashamed, husband, to snore so." "Oh, it is entirely unintentional: I never do it with my eyes open."

Some people have no touch of imagination. A writer describes the vast extent of Cowden's "Ancient Britain" to a hard-headed old lawyer, who listened patiently to the end, and then merely said that the author must have been a horrible fool!

When the affairs of Italy were the subject of general conversation, a lord was very enthusiastic in favor of Murat and his party. He was talking hopefully and warmly on the subject when he met a gentleman with a very cold and stiff and argumentative exterior. The latter said, "I have not much interest in the subject, my lord, except by the name of Hortense, is a clever, amiable, lively French woman. Also my name is Lord Ravensworth, and I am called, 'Napoleon and Frederick II.,' called twice, and raised to such rank, the grandchild of the young man's mother was what a pity for him! He would have been something as a Duroc." The young lord's enthusiasm was chilled.

A man who hoped having bought some pigs, asked a neighbor for the use of a pen for a few days. Said he, "I have bought some pigs from Lord ——, and many wild pigs. I want to put them in your pen till I can fix a stable for them."—"Two thousand pigs!" exclaimed the astonished neighbor, "why, my pen will hardly hold a dozen!"—"Are they so large?" asked Mr. Bent. I don't they two thousand pigs, but two thousand pounds."—"I hear you," said Mr. Bent, "two thousand pigs." Why you must be crazy!" "Crazy! I'm not crazy at all." Indeed, caught, "I mean not two thousand pigs, but two thousand pounds of pigs' flesh."—Oh, that is what you mean, eh? Well, the pen is at your service."

In a very thin house, an actress spoke very low in her concluding speech to the lover. The actor, perceiving it happened to be, exclaimed, with a woeful humor, "My dear, you may speak louder, because I am dead, only rather than a whisper."

A footman learned from his master that mahagropos means "out of place." Meeting a brother footman who had been cashiered, he accosted him, "Ah! my dear fellow, I am sorry for you; you are mahagropos!"

"DO you think," asked Mr. Pepper, rather sharply, "that a little temper is a bad thing in a woman?"—"Certainly not, sir," replied the gallant bachelor; "it is a good thing, and she ought never to lose it."

The late Sir Henry Smith, long M.P. for Colchester, was one of the Tories of the old school, and when the odiousness of reform, his resolute opposition to all change was the theme of every day, he would exclaim that he was not borne out by his real character. On one occasion he was canvassing in the vicinity of numerous farms, and on asking a heavy-looking farmer for his vote, the man replied, "Why, sir, I've got no fear for that, only vote such a fool."—"Fool, am I?" retorted Sir Henry; "then I've got the best reason for supporting you!" The farmer, full of wit went to the farmer's heart, and with a loud guffaw he promised his vote.

"Sambo, is your master a good farmer?"—"Oh, yes, massa fus-rate farmer—he make two crops in one year." "Indeed! how's that, Sambo?"—"Why, massa, he sow de fall, and make money once; den in de spring he sell de hides of de cattle dat die for want of de hay, and make money twice."

Blunders upon the stage have often relieved a dull play; and it is remarkable that if one actor stumbles another is generally ready for example. Charles Mathews, if he once blundered in his part: "As Hodge," was once to make many blunders; purchases from his habit of imitation. Two of the most celebrated stage blunders once occurred in the comedy of "Clandestine Marriage," when one of the characters saw "a candle going along the gallery with in his right hand;" and another "locked the key, and put the door in his pocket."

A DOUBTFUL FEE.—If a man can not sleep, he will probably lose his reason.

EATING OUTDOOR.—To be importuned by your wife to get your life insured.

Goldsborough was once examined as a witness on a trial respecting the originality of a picture, when a counsel endeavored to shake the witness by saying, "I believe you by great stress on a painter's eye—what do you mean by that expression?" "I mean," replied the witness Goldsborough, "it is to him what a lawyer's tongue is to you."

"DON'T you think, husband, that you are apt to believe every thing you hear?"—"No, Madam, not when you tell it."

A citizen of Berlin, Prussia, a man in comfortable circumstances, has been confined for the last fifteen years in a cell of this establishment, for the following remarkable facts. He afterward makes up the loss to the establishment of all the clothing he can fancy he may require for visitors. According to the calculation of his family, in the past year he has been obliged to make good the loss of two hundred and sixty-seven hats. At a recent musical festival, 1,500 pairs of gloves were sacrificed to the enthusiasm; and for the evening's entertainment he paid a hundred and fifty-nine thalers.

OFFICERS' QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.—[FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER OF MAJOR ANDERSON'S COMMAND.]

THE OFFICERS' QUARTERS AT FORT SUMTER.

SUCH intense interest is felt in every thing which concerns the garrison at Fort Sumter that we are glad to present our readers with the accompanying picture of the Officers' Quarters at Fort Sumter, from a sketch kindly sent us by one of our military correspondents in that work. It shows that the gallant officers are comfortable.

GOOD-BY TO FORT SUMTER.

WE publish herewith a picture of the good-by waved to Fort Sumter by the wives and children of the soldiers quartered in that work, as they steamed past in the Marion, on 31 inst., on their way to New York. The scene is thus described in a note from one of the passengers on board the Marion:

"On Sunday, the 3d inst., as the steamer Marion was proceeding down Charleston harbor, bound for New York, and leaving on board among the passengers the wives—about twenty in number—and children belonging to the soldiers stationed in Fort Sumter, a somewhat exciting scene occurred. On nearing the fort the whole garrison was seen, mounted on the top of the ramparts; and when the ship was passing fired a gun and gave three heart-thrilling cheers as a parting farewell to the dear loved ones on board, whom they may possibly never meet again this side the grave.

"The response was weeping and waving adieus to husbands and fathers. A small head peep up in an isolated fort, and completely surrounded by instruments of death, as few feet could be seen from the steamer's deck, with their guns pointing toward Sumter.

"As the ship proceeded on her voyage, the earnest prayer of many sympathizing hearts on board was that no collision would ever take place between these men, so hostilely arrayed against each other, but who are in reality brothers."

REV. NICHOLAS MURRAY, D.D.

THE death of the Rev. Dr. Murray, of Elizabeth, New Jersey, which occurred on the 4th of February, 1861, is a loss to the Church and the world. We present his portrait in this paper, and desire to record, in a few words, our sense of his worth and his greatness, and our personal sorrow in the decease of a valued correspondent and a beloved friend.

He was a native of Ireland, and largely endowed with the finest qualities peculiar to the noblest sons of the Emerald Isle. His warm and glowing heart, his genial humor, his sparkling wit, the ready repartee, the enthusiastic temperament, the generous disposition, were the natural traits of character that made him the best of company and the most constant of friends.

He was born on Christmas-day, in the year 1802. While he was yet a mere boy his father died, and young Nicholas was put into a store to begin, almost without education, the struggle and labors of life. At the early age of twelve he was keeping a set of books in a store in Dublin. Induced by the reports from America to believe that his chances of success would be greater here, he came to this country in 1819, and immediately found employment in the establishment of Harper & Brothers, and a home in the family of his employers. While here, he was brought into such associations and under such influences as led him to forsake the Roman Catholic Church, in which he had been born, and first connecting himself as a probationer with the John Street Methodist Episcopal Church, soon after became a member of the Brick Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Spring was and is the pastor.

While yet at work at the printing press he commenced study in preparation for the ministry, in connection with a fellow-apprentice, now the Rev. J. C. Oakley, of Cold Spring, New York. He graduated Williams College, under the Presidency of the distinguished Dr. Edward Dorr Griffin, and graduated with honor in 1826; and afterward pursued a thorough course of theological study at the Seminary in Princeton, New Jersey. After a few months of itinerant service in connection with the American Tract Society, he was settled over two churches in Wyoming Valley, Wilkesbarre and Kingston, Pennsylvania. His remarkable pulpit talents and his high promise attracted attention, and in 1833 he was called and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown, New Jersey, one of the largest churches in the Presbyterian denomination. Here he spent the remainder of his life, twenty-eight years of eminent usefulness, untiring labor, and the most enviable of human distinction—a career marked by ceaseless devotion to the best interests of his people and the highest good of the human family. The various institutions of Christian benevolence called him to their councils, and he served them with self-denying activity. The cause of education in the Church and in the State was an object to which he gave constant attention; and colleges, seminaries, and schools found him an appreciating director, supporter, and friend.

In the year 1847 he addressed a series of letters to Bishop Hughes, the distinguished prelate at the head of the Roman Catholic Church in New York. These letters first appeared in the New York Observer, and were extensively reprinted in other papers, languages, and lands. They presented the history of the writer's progress from Romanism to Protestantism, and examined the reasons for adhering to the Church of Rome. The vivacious style, the genial humor, biting sarcasm, anecdotes, incidents, illustration, argument, and appeals blended so harmoniously as to give them a popularity perhaps without a parallel in religious literature. The first series was followed by a second and third. The nom de plume of the writer, KIRWAN, could not conceal the New Jersey divine, and his name became familiar in all Christian lands. Crossing a ferry in Scotland the boatman approached him, and saying he had been told by some one on board that he was from America, asked "if he had ever seen a man by the name of Kirwan there?" He had been reading his letters to Bishop Hughes, and would like to hear about the author.

Dr. Murray made two or three journeys in Europe, seeking relaxation from his arduous labors, and gathering materials for those contributions which he gave to the press. His letters have been collected in volumes, and are published under the following titles: "Letters to Bishop Hughes;" "Romanism at Home;" "Men and Things in Europe;" "American Principles on National Prosperity;" "Parish and Other Pencilings;" "The Happy Home."

On Friday, February 1, he was attacked by neuralgia in the chest; the distress continued without awakening serious apprehension until Monday the 4th, in the evening, when a sudden fainting fit, under intense pain, gave him warning that his hour had come. "My work is done," he said; and giving his dying counsel to his family, sending messages to absent friends, commending those he loved, his church, and his country, and his own spirit to the God whom he served, he lifted up his hands, pronounced a parting blessing on all around him, and with all the calmness and composure of one "lying down to pleasant dreams," he fell asleep.

In person Dr. Murray was a model of manly vigor; of middle height, broad chest and shoulders, with a round ruddy face, a high forehead, and benevolent, pleasant expression of countenance, his appearance was at once attractive and commanding. In conversation, overflowing with humor, he was the soul of good company. As a pastor he was always at work, ready at every call; in the chamber of sickness, in the homes of the poor, among the young—every where he was found, and always a welcome guest. His preparations for the pulpit were made with the greatest care, his sermons being completed as if for the press, and often far in advance of the time when they were to be delivered.

His funeral was attended on Friday, February 8, with every demonstration of respect and affection that could be paid by the most affectionate people. All the places of business in the city were closed. The bells of all the churches tolled in concert as the procession walked the streets. A hundred clergymen wept over his lifeless clay. Eloquent eulogies were pronounced in the church that was draped in mourning and crowded to its utmost capacity by a mourning congregation. His remains were laid in the yard adjoining the church, in the midst of his children and his beloved flock.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

A NOVEL.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE journey from our town to the metropolis was a journey of about five hours. It was a little past mid-day when the four-horse stage-coach by which I was a passenger got into the ravel of traffic frayed out about the Cross-Keys, Wood Street, Cheapside, London.

We Britons had at that time particularly settled that it was treasonable to doubt our having and our being the best of every thing; otherwise, while I was scared by the immensity of London, I think I might have had some faint doubts whether it was not rather ugly, crooked, narrow, and smoky.

Mr. Jaggers had duly sent me his address; it was Little Britain, and he had written after it on his card, "just out of Smithfield, and close by the coach-office." Nevertheless, a hackney-coachman, who seemed to have as many capes to his greasy great-coat as he was years old, packed me up in his coach and hemmed me in with a folding and jingling barrier of steps, as if he were going to take me fifty miles. His getting on his box, which I remember to have been decorated with an old weather-stained sea-green hammer-cloth, moth-eaten into rags, was quite a work of time. Altogether, it was a wonderful equipage, with six great coronets outside, and ragged things behind for I don't know how many footmen to hold on by, and a horror below them, to prevent amateur footmen from yielding to the temptation.

I had scarcely had time to enjoy the coach and to think how like a damp straw-yard it was, and yet how like a rag-shop, and to wonder why the horses' nose-bags were kept inside, when I observed the coachman beginning to get down, as if we were going to stop presently. And stop we presently did, in a gloomy street, at certain offices with an open door, whereon was painted Mr. Jaggers.

"How much?" I asked the coachman.

The coachman answered, "A shilling—unless you wish to make it more."

I naturally said I had no wish to make it more.

"Then it must be a shilling," observed the coachman. "I don't want to get into trouble. I know him!" He darkly closed an eye at Mr. Jaggers's name, and shook his head.

When he had got his shilling, and had in course of time completed the ascent to his box, and had got away (which appeared to relieve his mind), I went into the front office with my little portmanteau in my hand, and asked, Was Mr. Jaggers at home?

"He is not," returned the clerk. "He is in Court at present. Am I addressing Mr. Pip?"

I signified that he was addressing Mr. Pip.

"Mr. Jaggers left word would you wait in his room. He couldn't say how long he might be, having a case on. But it stands to reason, his time being valuable, that he won't be longer than he can help."

With those words the clerk opened a door, and ushered me into an inner chamber at the back. Here we found a gentleman with one eye, in a velveteen suit and knee-breeches, who wiped his nose with his sleeve on being interrupted in the perusal of the newspaper.

"Go and wait outside, Mike," said the clerk.

I began to say that I hoped I was not interrupting—when the clerk shoved this gentleman out with as little ceremony as I ever saw used, and tossing his fur cap out after him, left me alone.

Mr. Jaggers's room was lighted by a skylight only, and was a most dismal place; the skylight eccentrically patched, like a broken head, and the distorted adjoining houses looking as if they had twisted themselves to peep down at me through it. There were not so many papers about as I should have expected to see; and there were some odd objects about that I should not have expected to see—such as an old rusty pistol, a sword in a sandpaper scabbard, several strange-looking boxes and packages, and two dreadful casts on a shelf of faces peculiarly swollen, and twitchy about the nose. Mr. Jaggers's own highhocked chair was of deadly black horse-hair, with rows of brass nails round it like a coffin; and I fancied I could see how he leaned back in it, and bit his forefinger as the clients. The room was but small, and the clients seemed to have had a habit of backing up against the wall; for the wall, especially opposite to Mr. Jaggers' chair, was greasy with their shoulders. I recalled, too, that the one-eyed gentleman had shuffled forth against the wall when I was the innocent cause of his being turned out.

"YOU INFERNAL SCOUNDREL, HOW DARE YOU TELL ME THAT?"

I sat down in the clerical chair placed over against Mr. Jaggers's chair, and became fascinated by the dismal atmosphere of the place. I felt called to mind that the clerk had the same air of knowing something to every body else's disadvantage as his master had. I wondered how many other clerks there were up stairs, and whether they all claimed to have the same detrimental mastery of their fellow-creatures. I wondered what was the history of all the cold litter about the room, and how it came there. I wondered whether the two swing doors were proof of Mr. Jaggers's family, and, if he were so unfortunate as to have had a pair of such ill-looking relations, why he stuck them up in that dusty perch for the blacks and flies to settle on, instead of giving them a place at home. Of course I had no experience of a London summer day, and my spirits may have been oppressed by the hot exhausted air, and by the dust and grit that lay thick on every thing. But, as I sat wondering and waiting in Mr. Jaggers's close room, until I really could not bear the two casts on the shelf above Mr. Jaggers's chair, and got up and went out.

When I told the clerk that I would take a turn in the air while I waited, he advised me to go round the corner and I should come into Smithfield. So I came into Smithfield, and the shameful place, being all smeary with filth and tallow and blood and fame seemed to stick to me. So I rubbed it off with all possible speed by turning into a street where I saw the great black dome of Saint Paul's bulging at me from behind a grim stone building which a by-stander said was Newgate Prison. Following the wall of the jail, I found the roadway covered with straw to deaden the noise of passing vehicles; and from this, and from the quantity of people standing about, smelling strongly of spirits and beer, I inferred that the trials were on.

While I looked about me here, an exceedingly dirty and partially drunk minister of justice asked me if I would like to see the way in to hear a trial or so: informing me that he could give me a front place for half a crown, whence I should command a full view of the Lord Chief Justice in his wig and robes—mentioning that awful personage like wax-work, and presently offering him in the reduced price of eighteen pence. As I declined the proposal on the plea of an appointment, he was so good as to take me into a yard and show me where the gallows was kept, and also where people were publicly whipped, and then he showed me the Debtors' Door, out of which culprits came to be hanged: heightening the interest of that dreadful portal by giving me to understand that "four on 'em" would come out at that door the day after to-morrow at eight in the morning, to be killed in a row. This was horrible, and gave me rather a sickening idea of London: the more so as the Lord Chief Justice's proportions were (from his late portrait in his book, and up again to his pocket-handkerchief inclusive) mildewed clothes, which had evidently not belonged to him originally, and which, I took it into my head, he had bought cheap of the executioner. Under these circumstances I thought myself well out of him for a while.

I dropped into the office to ask if Mr. Jaggers had come in yet, and I found he had not, and I strolled out again. Then I made the tour of Little Britain, and turned into Bartholomew Close; and now I became aware that other people were waiting about for Mr. Jaggers as well as I. There were two men of secret appearance lounging in Bartholomew Close, and thoughtfully fitting their feet into the cracks of the pavement as they talked together, one of whom said to the other when they first passed me, that "Mr. Jaggers could do it if it was to be done." There was a knot of three men and two women standing at a corner, and one of the women was crying on her dirty shawl, and the other comforted her by saying, as she pulled her own shawl over her shoulders, "Jaggers is for him, Melia, and what more could you have?" There was a red-eyed little old woman come into the Close while I was loitering there, in company with a second little Jew whom he sent upon an errand, and while the messenger was gone, I remarked this Jew, who was of a highly excitable temperament, performing a jig of anxiety under a lamp-post, and accompanying himself, in a kind of frenzy, with the words, "Oh, Jaggerth, Jaggerth, Jaggerth! all otherth ith Cap-Maggerth, give me Jaggerth!" These testimonies to the popularity of Mr. Jaggerdom made a deep impression on me, and I admired and wondered more than ever.

At length, as I was looking out at the iron gate of Bartholomew Close into Little Britain, I saw Mr. Jaggers coming across the road toward me. All the others who were waiting saw him at the same time, and there was quite a rush at him. Mr. Jaggers, putting a hand on my shoulder and walking me on at his side without saying any thing to me, addressed himself to his followers.

First, he took the two secret men.

"Now, I have nothing to say to you," said Mr. Jaggers, throwing his finger at them. "I want to know no more than I know. As to the result, it's a toss-up. I told you from the first it was a toss-up. Have you paid Wemmick?"

"We made the money up this morning, Sir," said one of the men, submissively, while the other perused Mr. Jaggers's face.

"I don't ask you when you made it up, or where, or whether you made it up at all. Has Wemmick got it?"

"Yes, Sir," said both the men together.

"Very well; then you may go. Now, I won't have it!" said Mr. Jaggers, waving his hand at them to put them behind him. "If you say a word to me I'll throw up the case."

"We thought, Mr. Jaggers—" one of the men began, pulling at his hat.

"That's what I told you not to do," said Mr. Jaggers. "You thought! I think for you; that's enough for you. If I want you, I know where to find you; I don't want you to find me. Now, I won't have it. I won't hear a word."

The two men looked at one another as Mr. Jaggers waved them behind again, and humbly fell back and were heard no more.

"And now you!" said Mr. Jaggers, suddenly stopping, and turning on the two women with the shawls, from whom the three men had meekly separated.—"Oh! Amelia, is it?"

"Yes, Mr. Jaggers."

"And do you remember," retorted Mr. Jaggers, "that but for me you wouldn't be here and couldn't be here?"

"Oh, yes, Sir!" exclaimed both women together. "I'm sure of that."

"Then why," said Mr. Jaggers, "do you come here?"

"My Bill, Sir!" the crying woman pleaded.

"Now, I tell you what!" said Mr. Jaggers. "Once for all. If you don't know that your Bill's in good hands, I do. And if you can't come here, bothering about your Bill, I'll make an example of both your Bill and you, and let him slip through my fingers. Have you paid Wemmick?"

"Oh yes, Sir! Every farden."

"Very well. Then you have done all you have got to do. Stop! Another word—the single word—and Wemmick shall give you your money back."

This terrible threat caused the two women to fall off immediately. No one remained now but the excitable Jew, who had already raised the skirts of Mr. Jaggers's coat to his lips several times.

"I don't know this man!" said Mr. Jaggers, in the same devastating strain. "What does this fellow want?"

"Ma thear Mithter Jaggerth. Hown brother to Habraham Latharuth!"

"Who's he?" said Mr. Jaggers. "Let go of my coat."

The suitor, kissing the hem of the garment again before relinquishing it, replied, "Habraham Latharuth, on thuthpithion of plate."

"You're too late," said Mr. Jaggers. "I am over the way."

"Mithter Jaggerth!" in a moment! My hown euthen'th gone to Mithter Wemmick at thith prethent minute, to hoffer him hany thrumth. Mithter Jaggerth! Half a quarter of a moment! If you'd have the condethenthun to be bought off from the t'other thide—at hany thapperior prithe—money no object!—Mithter Jaggerth—Mithter—!"

My guardian threw his supplicant off with supreme indifference, and left him dancing on the pavement as if he were clog-shoed, while I took into my head, he had bought cheap of the executioner. Under these circumstances I thought myself well out of him for a while.

"He is the shrewdest fellow alive," said Mr. Jaggers to me, "and he knows what business is best worth attending to. Now, you're a pretty fellow, and you've been here before."

"Yes, Sir," said I, trembling.

"Then you know what to do. Now, I won't have it!" said Mr. Jaggers, waving his hand at them to put them behind him. "If you say a word to me I'll throw up the case."

"We thought, Mr. Jaggers—" one of the men began, pulling at his hat.

"That's what I told you not to do," said Mr. Jaggers. "You thought! I think for you; that's enough for you. If I want you, I know where to find you; I don't want you to find me. Now, I won't have it. I won't hear a word."

"Ma thear Mithter Jaggerth. Hown brother to Habraham Latharuth!"

"Who's he?" said Mr. Jaggers. "Let go of my coat."

The suitor, kissing the hem of the garment again before relinquishing it, replied, "Habraham Latharuth, on thuthpithion of plate."

"You're too late," said Mr. Jaggers. "I am over the way."

"Mithter Jaggerth! Half a moment! My hown euthen'th gone to Mithter Wemmick at thith prethent minute, to hoffer him hany tharuth. Mithter Jaggerth! Half a quarter of a moment! If you'd have the condethenthun to be bought off from the t'other thide—at hany thapperior prithe—money no object!—Mithter Jaggerth—Mithter—!"

My guardian threw his supplicant off with supreme indifference, and left him dancing on the pavement as if he were clog-shoed, while I took into my head, he had bought cheap of the executioner. Under these circumstances I thought myself well out of him for a while.

I dropped into the office to ask if Mr. Jaggers had come in yet, and I found he had not, and I strolled out again. Then I made the tour of Little Britain, and turned into Bartholomew Close; and now I became aware that other people were waiting about for Mr. Jaggers as well as I. There were two men of secret appearance lounging in Bartholomew Close, and thoughtfully fitting their feet into the cracks of the pavement as they talked together, one of whom said to the other when they first passed me, that "Mr. Jaggers could do it if it was to be done." There was a knot of three men and two women standing at a corner, and one of the women was crying on her dirty shawl, and the other comforted her by saying, as she pulled her own shawl over her shoulders, "Jaggers is for him, Melia, and what more could you have?" There was a red-eyed little old woman come into the Close while I was loitering there, in company with a second little Jew whom he sent upon an errand, and while the messenger was gone, I remarked this Jew, who was of a highly excitable temperament, performing a jig of anxiety under a lamp-post, and accompanying himself, in a kind of frenzy, with the words, "Oh, Jaggerth, Jaggerth, Jaggerth! all otherth ith Cap-Maggerth, give me Jaggerth!" These testimonies to the popularity of Mr. Jaggerdom made a deep impression on me, and I admired and wondered more than ever.

At length, as I was looking out at the iron gate of Bartholomew Close into Little Britain, I saw Mr. Jaggers coming across the road toward me. All the others who were waiting saw him at the same time, and there was quite a rush at him. Mr. Jaggers, putting a hand on my shoulder and walking me on at his side without saying any thing to me, addressed himself to his followers.

First, he took the two secret men.

"Now, I have nothing to say to you," said Mr. Jaggers, throwing his finger at them. "I want to know no more than I know. As to the result, it's a toss-up. I told you from the first it was a toss-up. Have you paid Wemmick?"

"We made the money up this morning, Sir," said one of the men, submissively, while the other perused Mr. Jaggers's face.

"He is dressed like a spectable piecman. A sort of a pastry-cook."

"Is he here?" asked my guardian.

"I left him," said Mike, "a settin on some door-steps round the corner."

"Take him past that window, and let me see him."

The window indicated was the office-window. We all three went to it, behind the wire blind, and presently saw the client go by in an accidental manner, with a murderous-looking tall individual, in a short suit of white linen and a paper cap. This gentle violence-connoiseur was not by any means sober, and had a black eye in the great stage of recovery, which was painted over.

"Tell him to take his witness away directly," said my guardian to the clerk, in extreme disgust, "and ask him what he means by bringing such a fellow as that."

My guardian walked took me into his own room, and while he lunched, standing, from a sandwich-box and a pocket-flask of sherry (he seemed to bully his very sandwich as he ate it), informed me what arrangements he had made for me. I was to go to "Barnard's Inn," to young Mr. Pocket's rooms, where a bed had been sent in for my accommodation; I was to remain with young Mr. Pocket until Monday; on Monday I was to go with him to his father's house on a visit, that I might try how I liked it. Also I was told what my allowance was to be—it was a very liberal one—and I had reminded to me from one of my guardian's drawers the cards of certain tradesmen with whom I was to deal for all kinds of clothes and other things as I should find in reason want. "You will find your credit good, Mr. Pip," said my guardian, whose flask of sherry smelled like a whole cask-full, as he hastily refreshed himself after his meal, "and you may be able to check your bills, and to pull you up if I find you outrunning the constable. Of course you'll do it as wrong somehow, but that's no fault of mine."

After I had pondered a little over this encouraging sentence, I asked Mr. Jaggers if I could send for a coach? He said it was not worth while, I was so near my destination; Wemmick should walk with me himself when I dressed.

I then found that Wemmick was the clerk in the next room. Another clerk was rung down from up stairs to take charge while he was out, and I accompanied him into the street, after shaking hands with my guardian. We found a new set of people lingering outside, but Wemmick made a way among them by saying coolly yet decisively, "I tell you it's no use; he won't have a word to say to one of you," and we soon got clear of them, and went on side by side.

CHAPTER XX.

CASTING my eyes on Mr. Wemmick as we went along, to see what he was like in the light of day, I found him to be a dry man, rather short in stature, with a square wooden face, whose expression seemed to have been imperfectly chipped out with a few strokes of a hatchet. There were some marks in it that might have been dimples, if the material had been softer and the instrument finer, but, as it was, were only dints. The chisel had made three or four of these attempts at embellishment over his nose; but had given them up without an effort to smooth them off. I conjectured him to be a bachelor from the frayed condition of his linen, and he appeared to have sustained a good many bereavements; for he wore mourning rings, and his watch-guard had a brooch representing a lady and a weeping willow at a tomb with an urn on it. I noticed, too, that several rings and seals hung at his watch-chain, as if he were quite laden with remembrances of departed friends. He had glittering eyes, small and black, and a firm mouth and thin wrinkled lips. He had had them, to the best of my belief, from forty to fifty years.

"What kind of a office is Little Britain?" said Mr. Wemmick to me.

"No," said I.

"So you were here once," said Mr. Wemmick. "Rum to think of now!"

"You are well acquainted with it now?"

"Why, yes," said Mr. Wemmick. "I know the ways of it."

"Is it a very wicked place?" I asked, more for the sake of saying something than for information.

"You may get cheated, robbed, and murdered in London. But there are plenty of people any where who'll do that for you."

"If there is bad blood between you and them," said I, to soften it off a little.

"You're right, I know about bad blood," returned Mr. Wemmick; "there's not much bad blood about. If there's any thing to be got by it."

"That makes it worse."

"You think so?" returned Mr. Wemmick. "Much about the same, I should say."

He was very shy indeed, of his head and looked straight before him: walking in a self-contained way as if there were nothing in the streets to claim his attention. His mouth was such a post-office of a mouth that he had a mechanical appearance of smiling. We had got to the top of Holborn Hill before I knew that it was merely a mechanical appearance, and that he was not smiling at all.

"I collect you are a pupil of Mr. Matthew Pocket's?" I asked Mr. Wemmick.

"Yes," said he, nodding in the direction. "At Hornsey, north of London."

"Is that far?"

"Well! Say five miles."

"Do you know him?"

"Why, you're a regular examiner!" said Mr. Wemmick, looking at me with an approving air. "Yes, I know him. I know him!"

There was an air of toleration or depreciation about his utterance of these words that rather depressed me; and I was still looking sideways at his block of a face in search of any encouraging note to the text when he said here we were at Barnard's Inn. My depression was not alleviated by the announcement, for I had supposed that establishment to be a hotel kept by one Barnard, to which the Blue Boar in our town was a mere public-house. Whereas I now found Barnard to be a ghost, and his inn the dingiest collection of shabby buildings ever squeezed together in a rank corner as a club for Tom-cats.

We entered this haven through a wicket-gate, and were disgorged by an introductory passage into a melancholy little square that looked to me like a very confined burying-ground. I thought I had the most dismal views in it, but the most dismal sparrows, and the most dismal cats, and the most dismal houses (in number half a dozen or so), that I had ever seen. I thought the windows of the sets of chambers into which these houses were divided were in every stage of dilapidated blind and curtain, crippled flower-pot, cracked glass, dusty decay and miserable makeshift; while To Let To Let To Let glared at me from empty corners, as if, in no new version of my game there, and the vengeance of the soul of Barnard were being slowly appeased by the gradual suicide of the present occupants and their unholy interment under the paved. A frowzy mourning of soot and smoke (I thought) attired this funereal creation of Barnard, and it had strewn ashes on its head and on all its members, and was undergoing penance and humiliation as a mere dust-hole. Thus far the sense of sight; and the scents and sounds that assailed the nose and ears that rot in neglected roof and cellar, rot of rat and mouse and bug and coaching-stables near at hand besides, impressed themselves finally to my sense of smell, and moaned, "Try Barnard's Mixture."

So much for the realization of the first of my great expectations, that I looked in dismay at Mr. Wemmick. "Ah!" said he, misreading me; "it's a amazing retirement reminds you of the country. So it does me."

He led me into a corner and conducted me up a flight of wooden stairs, appointed to be so slowly collapsing into sand-dust, so that one of these days the upper lodgers would look out of their doors and find themselves without the means of coming down—as a set of chambers on the top-floor. MR. POCKET, JUN., was painted on the door, and there was a label on the letter-box, "Return shortly."

"He hardly thought you'd come so soon," Mr. Wemmick explained. "You don't want me any more?"

"No, thank you," said I.

"As I keep the cash," Mr. Wemmick observed, "we shall most likely meet pretty often. Good-day."

"Good-day."

I put out my hand, and Mr. Wemmick at first looked at it as if he thought I wanted something. Then he looked at me, and said, correcting himself,

"To be sure! Yes. You're in the habit of shaking hands?"

I was rather confused, thinking it must be out of the London fashion, but said yes.

"I have got so out of it!" said Mr. Wemmick—"except at last. Very glad, I'm sure, to make your acquaintance. Good-day!"

When we had shaken hands and he was gone I opened the staircase window, and had nearly blinded and choked myself in the effort to get a dry breath and relieve my heated eyes. On the floor below, a set of chambers was being revolutionized. It was so quick that I had not put my head out, before a man with a broom and a pail of water came out at the door, and seeing me, turned the pail and himself and broom into the room. Simultaneously with the entrance of this implement, a woman with a bundle of bedding under one arm and a broom in the other, shouldered her way into the room. Both of these new comers dealt largely in the article of mud, and perhaps they had been sanguine of getting a good day for their job, but they certainly had not got it.

Remembering what Mr. Wemmick had said about his not being wanted, and seeing that my room was not to be entered on account of the muddy irruption, I withdrew my head, and sat down by the window. I had been there but a few minutes, when I observed a wafer-faced boy of about my own age, pass up the staircase with a parcel under his arm, and look at the door-plates. Finding that he stopped at the door-plate which bore my name, I concluded that he brought something for me, and opened the door to him.

"Pip?" said the boy.

"Yes," said I.

"Mr. Pip, Barnard's Inn?"

"Yes," said I.

"Then these are for you," said the boy, handing in a brown paper parcel, and producing a dirty slate for me to write a receipt on.

I had hardly got my head out of the window, and sat down to my breakfast, when I observed the same boy coming up the staircase with a second parcel. This was for Mr. Pip, Barnard's Inn, and was from my tailor. Then came a boy with a parcel for Mr. Pip, Barnard's Inn, and that was from my hatter. Then came a boy with a parcel for Mr. Pip, Barnard's Inn, and that was from my boot-maker. All these articles were beautifully fitted, and were charged in the tradesmen's bills at exactly the sum I had expected. Lastly, there came a boy with a hamper, containing a bottle of sherry, another bottle of port, a pineapple, and a cold roast fowl. Not wishing to be uncharitable, I felt that I could have spared the pineapple, which was not ripe, and which I feared would prove hard of digestion.

Mr. Pocket, Junior's, idea of Shorly was not mine, for I had nearly made myself sick with looking out for half an hour, and had written my name with my finger several times in the dirt of every pane in the window, before I heard footsteps on the stair. Gradually there arose before me the hat, head, neckcloth, waistcoat, trowsers, boots, of a member of society of about my own standing. He had a paper-bag under each arm, and a pottle of strawberries in one hand, and was out of breath.

"Mr. Pip?" said he.

"Mr. Pocket?" said I.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed. "I am extremely sorry; but I was rendered so by master's your part of the country at mid-day, and I thought you would come by that one. The fact is, I have been out on your account—not that that is any excuse—for I thought, coming from the country, you might like a little fruit after dinner, and I went to Covent Garden Market to get it good."

For a reason that I had I felt as if my eyes would start out of my head. I acknowledged his attention apprehensively, and began to think this was a dream.

"Dear me!" said Mr. Pocket, Junior. "This door sticks a little."

As he was fast making jam of his fruit by wrestling with the door while the paper-bags were under his arms, I begged him to allow me to hold them. He relinquished them with an agreeable smile, and combated with the door as if it were a wild beast. It yielded so suddenly at last that he staggered back upon the opposite door, and we both laughed. But still I felt as if my eyes must start out of my head, and as if this must be a dream.

"Pray come in," said Mr. Pocket, Junior. "Allow me to lead the way. I am rather bare here, but I hope you'll be able to make out tolerably well till Monday. My father thought you would get on more agreeably through to-morrow with me than with him, and might like to take a walk about London. I am sure I shall be very happy to show London to you. As to our table, you won't find that bad, I hope, for it will be supplied from our coffee-house here, and (it is only right I should add) at your expense, such being Mr. Jaggers's directions. As to our lodging, it's not by any means splendid, because I have my own bread to earn, and my father hasn't any thing to give me, and shouldn't be willing to take it if he had. This is our sitting-room—just such chairs and tables and carpet and so forth, you see, as they could spare from home. You mustn't give me credit for the table-cloth and spoons and casters, because they come from the coffee-house also. This is my little bedroom—rather musty; but Barnard's is musty. This is your bedroom; the furniture's hired for the occasion, but I trust it will answer the purpose; if you should want any thing, I'll go and fetch it. The chimes are retired, and we shall be alone together: but we shall be all right, I dare say. Now, mum, I beg your pardon, you're holding the fruit all this time. Pray let me take these bags from you. I am quite unused to property."

As I stood opposite to Mr. Pocket, Junior, delivering him the bags, One, Two, I saw the startling appearance come into his own face that I knew to be in mine, and he said, falling back:

"Lord bless me, you're the prowling boy!"

"And you," said I, "are the pale young gentleman!"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Friday, 8th, in the Senate, the resolution for extending the time for receiving testimony with regard to the M'Carmick papers, was called up by Senator Wade of Ohio, and the special order being postponed, debate upon it was resumed at considerable length by Senators Wade, Douglas, Iverson and others. The resolution was finally passed. The bankrupt bill was then taken up. Its effect of defeating the proposed extension of the patent. In the House a message was received from the President, heading the correspondence between himself and Colonel Hayes, special agent from South Carolina, relative to the surrender of Fort Sumter to the authorities of that State. It appears from these documents that the conditions for the surrender of the Fort is preempted, and that the refusal to surrender is quite unqualified. The House then resumed consideration of the report of the Committee of Thirty-three, and speeches were made by Messrs. Dunham, of Tennessee; Hughes, of Maryland; opposing his State being dragged into secession; Kellogg, of Illinois, who made a speech in favor of the amendment to the Delivery Act; Porter; and Smith, of North Carolina, who said that his State would not be a party to the dismemberment of the Union so long as her rights and honor were safe within it. An evening session was held, at which several speeches were made to almost empty benches.

On Saturday 9th, in the Senate, the Naval Appropriation bill was passed. The Chairman of the Committee of Conference on the amendments to the Delivery Act reported their inability to accept, and the Committee was discharged. A message was made by Senator Hale, that the Senate recede from its amendments; was laid over under the rule. [Yeas 24, Nays 20.] A long and stormy executive session making invasions of the Secretary of the Treasury on his refusal to resign the relation of his office. The bankrupt bill was amended so as to include an inquiry relative to the seizure of arms destined for the South, by the Police of New York, before the bill was taken up for consideration, and Mr. Cochrane gave notice that he intended to call up next day. A resolution was passed calling upon the President for the correspondence between our Government and Lord of Derry, relative to the free navigation of the Amazon and its tributaries. On motion of Mr. Corwin, of Ohio, the vote on the report of the Committee of Thirty-three was still further postponed, until next Tuesday, and debate upon the subject was continued until the adjournment. The postponement is in consequence of desire to await the action of the Peace Conference.

On Monday, 11th, in the Senate, Senator Green, of Missouri, offered a resolution, which was laid over, asking the President to communicate any correspondence which may have occurred relative to the extradition of the fugitive slaves. Another resolution was introduced calling for the Defensive Bill was appointed. A petition for a Territorial Government in Nevada was presented. The Naval Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and was considered during the remainder of the day. The appropriations for the Pneumatic Survey were struck out. Senator Wade, of New Hampshire, offered an amendment providing for the building of seven steam sloops of war. Senator Hunter, of Virginia, opposed it, as it looked too much like an intention to coerce seceding States. It was opposed by Senators Grimes, of Iowa; Fessenden, of Maine; and King, of New York. The debate was closed. In the House, a preamble and resolution were offered by Mr. Craig, of Missouri, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, instructing the President to recognize the existence of a Southern Confederacy, and to receive in their official capacity such Commissioners as may be sent by the Government of that Confederacy to Washington. A resolution offered by Mr. McDermid, of Illinois, was adopted, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information relative to the coinage of the Mint and Custom-house at New Orleans. Mr. Perry, of Connecticut, offered a resolution, which was objected to by Mr. Winslow, of South Carolina, instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of amending the Constitution so as to make it impossible for any State to secede without the consent of all the other States. Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, offered a resolution, which was adopted, recommending the celebration of the 22d instead of the 23d of Washington's birthday, 1861, as a national holiday. Mr. Palmer, of New York, introduced a resolution instructing the Committee that neither the Federal Government nor the people of the Northern States have a proper or constitutional right to interfere with slavery in any State of the Union; and the other resolution was laid over. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the admission of Kansas, Mr. Corbin in the chair. Mr. Curtis, of Iowa, made a speech in favor of the bill, but the first one finally passed, by a majority of nine votes. Before the debate and explanations then ensued, and it was again passed [Yeas 24 to 4. A reconsideration was carried, both, after still further debate, by Messrs. Foster of Ohio, offered a substitute, declaring that neither Congress nor the Legislature of non-slaveholding States have the right to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the slaveholding States. The House refused to give action to that proposition, and it was passed unanimously. Mr. Pidgeon's second reading was then considered.—In being read a second time, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Seward, Mr. Douglas, and others spoke in favor of the measure. The Committee then rose, and the House took a recess until 7 o'clock.

On Tuesday, 12th, in the Senate, among the petitions presented was one by Senator Crittenden, from 23,000 citizens of Massachusetts, asking for the adoption of his compromise. He accompanied its presentation with a few complimentary remarks; and was followed by Senator Bunnage, who declared that those who signed the petition could not have known what they were asking for—that the proposed compromise went even further than the Seceding States themselves demanded. In the course of the discussion of Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky, by adding an inquiry relative to the conduct of the Peace Conference at Washington, and passed.

FORT PICKENS, PENSACOLA HARBOR, FLORIDA.—LOOKING SEAWARD. FORT M'RAE IN THE DISTANCE.—FROM A SKETCH BY MRS. LIEUTENANT GILMAN, JUST ARRIVED FROM PENSACOLA.—[SEE PAGE 122.]

FORT JEFFERSON, TORTUGAS (KEY WEST), FLORIDA.—FROM A SKETCH BY A MEMBER OF THE GARRISON.—[SEE PAGE 122.]

FORT PICKENS, FLORIDA.

We publish on page 120, from a drawing kindly furnished us by Mrs. Gilman, wife of Lieutenant Gilman, United States Army, second in command at Fort Pickens, a view of that work, showing Fort M'Rae in the distance. The harbor of Pensacola —as is shown by the map published in this journal two weeks since—being the best harbor in the Gulf, is protected by no less than three batteries, exclusive of the Navy-yard. These are Fort Pickens on Ross Island; Fort M'Rae, a water-battery on the main land, fronting Fort Pickens; and Fort Barrancas, situate near the Navy-yard, between that point and Fort M'Rae.

Fort Pickens is the commanding work of the eight. It is a pentagon, with a bastion at each angle. It has a counterscarp and glacis on one (the land) side, mounts guns in barbette on all sides, and has a tier of casemates on the four water sides. Its ditch is usually so full of moccasin and rattlesnakes as to be a peculiarly bad place of transit. In fact, the whole island is infested with them.

If fully equipped Fort Pickens would mount 215 guns, and would require a garrison of 2000 men. It contains, at present, only eighty-seven men, under the command of Lieutenant Slemmer, with whom is Lieutenant Gilman.

We have described, in previous numbers of this journal, the surrender of the United States Navy-yard at Pensacola to the Florida troops, and the occupation of Fort Pickens by Lieutenant Slemmer. Mrs. Slemmer said to a city reporter:

"The exodus from the Barrancas Fort was made necessarily in such haste, there being little time except to hurriedly pack up the most valuable of their articles of furniture and wardrobe. No personal violence was offered to those remaining women and children; but the mob in said peaceable breaking up of so many peaceful households, and the violent separation of family ties, were exact of great distress. To many the parting of husband and wife was as if for the last time, and tears bedewed many a hardy cheek when the last 'good-by' was spoken.

"The excitement produced upon the officers when they saw their flag at the Navy-yard hauled down, Mrs. Slemmer says, was most intense. It was a sight they never expected to see, and they had never conceived of the deep feeling of humiliation and vexation that the spectacle excited in every breast.

"During the day and night of the evacuation of Barrancas, and the transfer of the garrison to Fort Pickens, every person—men, the officers, and their wives—performed prodigies of labor, and never obtained a wink of rest. Nearly twenty-four hours' and the hard work fell about equally upon all, without regard to rank or sex. The ladies cheerfully performed their part throughout the trying ordeal. On the day following the embarkation of the families on board of the Supply, Mrs. Gilman and Mrs. Slemmer, accompanied by officers from the guardship, went on shore under a flag of truce, to obtain a last interview with their husbands.

"Every step of their progress was met by armed officials. They were obliged, first, to obtain permission from the new Commandant of the Navy-yard—Randolph, who for days before had respected his commission in the Navy. This was very reluctantly granted, after appeals had been made to him as a husband and father. They then had to pass the Barracas forts, whose commanders, after some hesitation, allowed them to pass. In this place, so lately deserted by their peaceful and happy families, all was now confusion. The undisciplined soldiery or their understrappers had broken open some of the trunks and boxes containing the wardrobes and household relics of Colonel Winder, late Commander, probably in pursuit of stabbing for their own use; and they saw ladies' dresses and family daguerreotypes scattered about with little regard to their vaunted respect for the rights of personal property."

At latest dates from Pensacola, the Mississippi troops had returned home, but the Alabama troops were still there, bent on trying to storm Fort Pickens. There were five United States vessels anchored off Pensacola. The Brooklyn was among the number, having just arrived, and presented a warlike appearance. The Alabama troops regarded this fleet as a menace, and were disposed to fire into them. The insurgent troops were quartered at the Navy-yard, having taken possession of all the stores belonging to the United States. In fact, it was the only means of subsistence which they had. They had also sent large requisitions of these supplies to other points on the coast.

FORT JEFFERSON, TORTUGAS,

on page 121, from a very accurate drawing sent us from Fort Jefferson, Florida, a picture of that work, which is destined, in all probability, to play a prominent part in the events of the year. On 18th ult. the Joseph Whitney hailed at this fort Major Arnold's company of artillery, which places it in a position to resist an assault.

This fortification extends over the whole surface of Garden Key, and has an area of over fifteen acres. It is completely closed against surprise by escalade, though its armament is incomplete. The first and second tiers, however, are finished, and the twelve outworks of bastions and curtains can mount three hundred and fifty guns. The fort is further fortified by a wide ditch, reaching to the water, and protected by a strong counterscarp. The guns of the fort command the inner harbor, but the outer bay is beyond their long range.

The whole armament of the fort, when complete, is 450 guns, and the garrison necessary for its defense 1000 men. Captain Meigs, of the engineer corps, is now in command of the fortress, and is in a position now, with Arnold's reinforcement, to defend it against any thing less than a regularly-equipped besieging army.

The following extract from a letter from Key West describes the reinforcement of Fort Jefferson by the Joseph Whitney:

"It was on the 18th of January that the Joseph Whitney was descried by those maintaining possession of this important fortress. The steamer did not show any flag, and her motions were watched with intense anxiety by Captain Meigs and his small band of laborers, composed of about fifty persons (a part of whom were negroes), engaged in putting the fort in a state of defense. No flag was flying from the fort, and the steamer's company were far from certain that the insurgents had not surprised and captured it. Therefore, to ascertain how matters stood, a boat, in which were the first mate and Lieutenant Bowen, went on shore to ascertain the actual posture of affairs with regard to the power holding the post. The relief of Captain Meigs and party may be supposed at receiving the agreeable information that the dreaded contemplated reinforcements with the view of preserving the fort to the United States, instead of a filibuster party to seize it for traitorous purposes. His gratification was increased by the fact that a rumor had prevailed that a steamer, with an armed force of two hundred men, would be sent from some Florida port to wrest the fort from its rightful possessors."

"Hæc olim meminisse iuvabit."

Or pictures hath my soul good store,
Skilled mistress of encaustic art;
Instate, ever gathering more
In the full chamber of the heart.

And tenderly, in after days,
The faint and fading lines are scanned,
Memorials of oft-trodden ways,
Dim sketches of a traveled land.

Then, as she turns them o'er and o'er,
On some she casts a lingering eye,
Trends and re-treads the dusty floor,
Would fain, yet can not, lay them by.

That irked gable why regard?
That sloping meadow, fringed with wood?
That olden idyll, half seared,
Japanned by many an inky flood?

Beneath that roof the boy has slept;
Full oft in that green field has played;
O'er that old table laughed and wept;
Learnt many a line beneath that shade.

As one who in a long ascent
Looks back the misty vale to scan,
Trace I those scenes, all dimly blent,
The paths I trod ere toil began.

The hill, where many a summer's day
To watch the game our master stood;
Below, the mossy pool we play'd
Above, the overhanging wood.

The long, low boat-house on the shore
Of lazy, shadow-loving Wear,
Now lashed to spray by laboring oar,
Now startled by the school-boy's cheer.

The mill, unvexed by clacking wheel,
Long given to silent, mouldering ease;
Whose waters, idly pent, reveal
The hole and branch of stately trees.

Three flood-strained arches of a bridge
Superimposed on lowlier lowers;
The reflex of a shadowy ridge,
O'ertopped by crumbling Norman towers.

Hard by that solemn house of God
The turf 'neath which our master lies;
Turf which in sport we lightly trod,
Life's chances hidden from our eyes.

There let me stand and look my last,
As once, dear master, at thy side
I stood, and burying all the past,
Strove hard in joy my grief to hide.

Nor I alone; for in that place
Where three lives closing met in love and fear,
Was gathered many a sorrowing face,
Repressed was many a rising tear.

We brought a gift; but thou didst prize
The love that made each bosom swell—
Love, beaming forth from honest eyes,
Love, striving with the word "farewell!"

Love, that on thee and thine attends,
Locked in the silent breasts of men
Who for thy sake, O best of friends!
Would live their boyhood o'er again.

FROST PICTURES.

CHAPTER I.

FIFTEEN degrees below zero! The snow crealed beneath the passing wheels as if in pain; wayfarers, muffled yet shivering, hurried by, each blowing a cloud of vapor at every exhalation—icicles clung to the beard and bushy locks of many a hirsute pedestrian; while poor teamsters and wagon-drivers swung their numb arms to and fro, and made the cold an excuse for numberless drinks of unexampled strength. From the river a clothline steam was going up, white and fleecy, while in the docks and along the piers the ribbed ice walled the timbers in a glittering barrier. In many a warm parlor sat rosy children, trying industriously to trace a circle on the window pane; but Jack Frost as resolutely repainted its surface, shutting the outer scene from their view.

In a cheerless garret of one of the cheap houses where poverty huddles and hides, sat a wan, hungry child, vainly trying to keep life and warmth in the blue fingers and stiffening limbs. The scanty supply of fuel was exhausted, and but a few white ashes remained on the hearth to recall the memory of a fire that had been there the day before. Harry, more weak from long illness, worn out with hunger, and heart-sick from loneliness, was silently crying as he sat by the hearth, with his head resting on the old chair beside it, and the poor worn blanket drawn around his shoulders.

"Mother, dear mother, where are you! Harry will die here all alone." Then with pain and weariness, the child drew the old arm-chair to the window to watch and wait for her coming, if indeed a more dread visitant should not enter before that time; for Harry knew that the chill and the stupor coming on were fatal symptoms. In quiet resignation he laid himself up within the tattered covering, and leaning his head backward, gazed dreamily on the tracery the frost had woven on the shattered pane. It was new to an aristocrat, and his patterns are as beautiful and complicated on the cracked surfaces of the poor man's window as on the polished French plate of the brown stone front.

Harry gazed on the fairy pictures fully until fancy drew them into landscape and waterfall, forest and streamlet; and their changing forms blended with his dreams while the chilling life-blood grew colder and stiller. There seemed to be the grove of nodding trees and the grassy dell where he was born. There was even the tiny cataract behind the house, and the rolling road beyond the brook. Soon it changed, and there seemed a mournful funeral train, and he knew that it was headed by his father's father. The feathery evergreens lined the way, and plumes were on the horses' heads. Shadowy mourners, ghost-like and weird, were following close behind, and their long garments trailed along the way.

Then, like the changes of the magic lantern, he saw a sunny open sea, where the wooded islands seemed faded in summer haze, and where myriads of white-winged birds circled over the gleaming expanse. And even as he looked the snowy figures took the form of white-winged and white-robed, who seemed to beckon. Still, as in a dream, he saw the spirit band bending over a dying child, and in the light that fell from their brace, and gliding slowly, swiftly on and up through the clear sky, to vanish there. His eyes were shut on the poor dead such helpless beside him, and the faint flicker of the heart-beat was the only token of life remaining.

CHAPTER II.

AND the boy's mother—here was she when her child was dying of cold and hunger? In one of the aristocratic houses on the Avenue the poor seamstress was busy as she might be in the payment of her bill. She was in Mrs. May's nursery, whither she had been directed to wait that lady's coming, as soon as she could finish the guests' dress for the house was vexed with the sound of merry laughter, as one after another arrived, and came tripping up the stairs to lay aside their warm bright wrappings. The chill of silver and gay glass in the dining-room below betokened a dinner party. Mrs. May stood by the fire warming her chilled hands, as the cold chill at her heart froze as she thought of the suffering child at home. She glanced from the window, and found that the twilight had almost set in, and she felt inclined to go home penniless as she had come. "Wait a few moments," Mrs. May had said, and now an hour had passed, and the moments were all out of her reach; she could not intrude herself among the brilliant guests below, even if she had known the way to find them. She looked around the room where she sat, and her eye fell on the child's bed, where the soft warm blanket and pillows were ready to infold the little sleeper. Then, as she remembered her own sleeping baby in his rickety chair and tattered covering at home, she groaned aloud, and fairly wrung her hands in agony. The tears, which had been long in coming, now fell like rain, for the thin hand could not check them; and, unstrung by want and sorrow, she could not be brave any longer.

A slight rustle, a tiny footfall, and a childish voice at her side lisping out, "Is you sick?" roused her; and she looked with wild eyes at the little creature that stood beside her in rosy robes and flowing ribbons, with blue eyes like stars amid a cloud of golden curls, and her pity changed into delight as she bent forward to look in her face, "Is you sick?" and the sweet sympathy of childhood for sorrow and woe dimmed the blue eyes as she repeated her query. It was some moments before she could speak to tell the grief that was so heavy at her heart. Gravely and silently the baby-angel listened, then, with a little clasped hand behind her, until the short tale was told, when she said, with a smile, "I know—mamma forbid," and away she bounded, leaving a gleam of sunshine in the seamstress's heart. It was not many moments before she returned dragging mamma by her rich robe, saying, all the while, in the same musical, soft tone, "You fordot, didn't you, mamma?"

Pretty little Mrs. May, with her bright attire and cheeks all flushed with dancing in so full a compunction for her carelessness, of heart-felt sorrow for her fault, that, sorely tried as Mrs. More had been, she could not be angry long. The bill was soon adjusted; but in her quick way Mrs. May said, "Wait!" and off she flew. "Here, Sarah, right away! get a basket. Now a big quilt from the nursery bed. Thomas—quick!—be ready to take this bundle—put in as much wood and coal as you can carry. Sarah, go to cook for some cold meat, and you'll get a bottle of wine, and Lilly shall help put up sugar and tea for us." And thus she flew around chattering, and adding to the hurried bustle the servants began to cry. And the said cook, being in a severe mood, echoed the sentiment—"Just like her, sending you out when it's most dinner-time!" and she pranked the game she was preparing for the fire viciously. Small difficulties it would have made to Mrs. May at that moment what their views might be. She was too full of self-reproaches to heed them; and after she had dispatched the messenger and received Mrs. More's heart-felt thanks, she did what just such a warm-hearted, careless little woman would be sure to do—she "had a good cry," and scolded herself in this wise: "Freezing and starving, and I was keeping her waiting. I'll never be good for any thing! I am afraid." Then Lilly's soft voice and caress recalled her, and she hurried her eyes and smoothed her thin ringlets anew; and if there was in her manner that might a new grace, and in her eye a new light, it was the grace of humility when she remembered duty procrastinated, and the glow of charity from the outgushing of a warm heart.

Through the long avenues, down the cold, dark alley, and, up to the cheerless room walked, or rather ran, poor Mrs. More with a step so rapid that Thomas could scarcely keep pace with her. But when the crazy door was opened, and the white form of the little child was seen in the chair pale and still, when from the lips of the unwearying caress greeted the poor mother, stout-hearted Thomas fairly quailed before her bitter grief. At first they thought him dead, but a faint throb over the heart and a tremor of the eyelids gave them hope. Pouring wine down his throat, rubbing his stiffened hands, and wrapping him in the warm bed covering they had brought, at last they saw the life slowly ebbing back; and by the time the fire was lighted on the hearth the boy opened his eyes as if in a dream, and smiled as he spoke that one dear word "Mother."

For a long while in the years that came after this, when Mrs. More and her son had gone off to the country, and they met no more, Lilly would listen to no story with so much pleasure as this; and when she was grown to put it into words—and what was the task for to-day, as she was very likely to do, Mrs. May would only touch her hand gently and say, "Lilly, we cannot, dear Harry More, don't we, and how sorry mamma was that she put off her duty?" and the work was done without another word. Years rolled away, and lent new beauty to the angel face of Harman May's only daughter; and the world wondered that she should be so good as well as beautiful—for her qualities were so prompt, her promises so truly kept, and her kind deeds so thoughtfully planned and executed.

CHAPTER III.

HARMAN MAY had dined, and smoked half a choice Havana, and read a few items of news, as prelude to his favorite chair and evening, some years after the date at which our story commences. Now it was no unusual thing for him to dine, still more to smoke or read after that hour, but to write paper or cigar until either was quite finished was unusual. So Mrs. May, a little stouter and more matronly than in that by-gone time, looked up, and with knowing eyes interrogated her husband as Lilly glanced up from her book and forgot the thread of the story therein contained, and thought to herself that her father was in an ugly mood. A rose, turned his back to the fire, and announced, "I am going to Millow to-morrow. I have heard a great deal to make me suspect that all is not nicely managed; the accounts are unsatisfactory; I am afraid the operatives are not fairly managed; and I must take Gilford with me—he knows something of him about it when he was here last week. I thought him a very trust-worthy young man when I sent him up there; but—I don't know."

"But, Harman, it is so cold and snowy," began his wife; but he answered quickly,

"Can't help it. I never put any thing off, you know." She dropped her eyes, for she remembered the lesson on that precept, and smiled, wondering meanwhile if he intended the reproof.

"Oh, father, may I go too?" pleaded Lilly, "to improve in skating, you know; oh, I should enjoy it so much, and Furnace Pond would be splendid! Carrie Wyman was one to come to the country in the winter;" and her face was all aglow with excitement as she coaxed, holding fast to her father's button as perfunctorily as ever the office-seeker did the like by a member of the House.

"Nonsense, child, you would freeze to death," was the first answer to her request; and the last was, "Well, well, if mother says Yes, you may go: ten o'clock to-morrow, no delay for trunks and dresses to be packed. Shawls and hats, warm cloak and hood all you need. No conquests to be made at Millow, I warrant." And thus it was arranged, and the evening of the next day set them down at their destination; and Lilly's dreams were full of visions of skating like a bird, with Carrie Wyman's pleasant laughter for music. Mr. Wyman was a wild fanatic, and his passion was very delightful to both, and Lilly hoped that the business would not be adjusted very soon. So with those dreams and hopes she fell asleep at night.

There was considerable confusion in her ideas when she woke in the morning as to where she was, when she was, and what was the cause of the mill-bell ringing so early, instead of the noise of vehicles rolling by and the milkman's shrill yell, which usually aroused her at that hour at her own home. Then the sunshine came peeping in at the window by her bedside, and, leaning on her elbow, she saw the bright, level fields of snow, and remembered the glittering rime on every bush, the very roads white and pure, and far off the shining ice of Furnace Pond.

Then breakfast—and away the two girls started for a walk on the hard snow, to plan out walks and ship-sticks and skating parties innumerable; and Mr. May to the counting-room of the mill, where no sign of life betokened the faithful agent who was supposed to be there on all occasions. The mill young gentleman was at that moment just about arraying himself for a hunting expedition, after which he proposed to hire a team and proceed to the next town for a pleasure excursion, and settle all bills out of the money deposited in his hands for the purchase of wool and for the payment of the few hands engaged in some minor operations during the stoppage of the big wheel, which was now fast fettered by the thick ice. DAVIS AND STEPHENS, PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

PRESIDENT DAVIS AND VICE-PRESIDENT STEPHENS.

THE accompanying portraits of Jefferson Davis and Alexander Stephens will introduce to our readers the newly-elected President and Vice-President of the new Southern Confederacy, organized at Montgomery, Alabama, on 4th February.

JEFFERSON DAVIS, the new President, was born in Kentucky about 1809, and is consequently about 54 years old. Having migrated to the Territory of Mississippi, with his father, when a boy, he owed to President Monroe the favor of being admitted at West Point, from which institution he graduated in 1828. He was lucky enough to be employed on active service at once, under Colonel (afterward President) Z. Taylor, and served throughout the Black Hawk War. His capture of the chief Black Hawk, and the friendship which sprang up between him and his prisoner, are among the most romantic episodes of the history of the war. In 1835, having married a daughter of General Taylor, he settled down on a cotton plantation in Mississippi, and acquired some wealth. In 1845 he was elected to Congress from that State; but at the outbreak of the Mexican War he resigned his seat in Congress, volunteered, raised a regiment in Mississippi, of which he was Colonel, and accompanied General Taylor in his campaign, distinguishing himself signally at Buena Vista. In 1848 he was chosen to the United States Senate. In 1851 he resigned his seat in the Senate to run for Governor of Mississippi, as the representative of the disunionist party, but was handsomely defeated by Mr. Foote, the Union candidate. In 1853 he entered the Cabinet of Mr. Pierce as Secretary of War, and held the office till the election of Mr. Buchanan. He then accepted the seat in the Senate which he filled till the State of Mississippi passed an ordinance of secession. He was recently chosen by the Montgomery Convention First President of the Southern Confederacy. Personally, Mr. Davis is a very gentlemanly man, with a soldierly bearing, and rather stern manners: as a speaker, he is fluent, clear, forcible, and sometimes eloquent.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia, the Vice-President of the new Southern Confederacy, was born in Georgia on 11th February, 1812, and is consequently forty-nine years of age. In his youth he was poor, and owed his education to the kindness of friends. In 1834 he took his position at the Georgia bar, and instantly gave proof of the talents which have since led him to be considered the "strongest man in the South." In 1843 he was elected to Congress as a Whig; but at the dissolution of the Whig party he acted with the democracy of the South, and soon became their leader in Congress. He remained in Congress till the election of 1858, when he refused to be a candidate any longer, and withdrew—as he supposed—from public life. Mr. Stephens is a remarkable example of what energy may do for a man. He has all his life been a martyr to disease, and has never weighed over ninety-six pounds. His voice is shrill, and at first quite unpleasant to the ear; but his eloquence is so sure and practical, and his judgment so reliable, that, wherever he is, he is sure to be a leader. He was a warm opponent of the secession movement in Georgia.

THE BLACK SPOT.

THERE was much mirth in Hong Kong. The ball at the club-rooms in Victoria Town eclipsed those which the governor and the chief justice, and the 117th in their white-washed mess-room, and the admiral on board his gayly lighted flagship, had given during the past fortnight.

Beyond comparison—the belle of the ball-room—was the beautiful Mrs. G——, a fair young wife, almost a bride, who had just come out from England with her husband, Captain G——, the junior captain of the Rifles. All the ensigns and middies, and half the lieutenants, naval and military, to say nothing of the par-boiled young gentlemen in mercantile houses, were fairly raving about the angelic stranger. The foolish boys devoured her with their eyes, and wrote sonnets to her eyebrows, for nought I know, and she never moved along the little parade at band-time without an overwhelming escort, but no one ever said that Geordie was not worthy of the good luck he had found, and the great prize he had drawn in the lottery matrimonial—he, the "best fellow" in the service. On this night Mrs. G—— was in the highest spirits, and waltzed, and flirted, well to all appearance, and was the very centre of attraction—the target of all eyes. Geordie, who knew her too well to be easily made jealous, was in very good spirits, too; so were most people. Mrs. G—— went through dance after dance, as the band played on with admirable taste and spirit, and still partners buzzed about her, and her little ivory memorandum-book was as filled with writing as a bank ledger.

When she entered the tea-room on one occasion, early in the evening, the old compendor Ching-Lung, who presided over the waiters, and was steward of the club, started as he looked keenly at the beautiful "Fankwi" lady. She passed by him, repressing, good-naturedly, a smile at his outlandish dress and figure. He stared after her with seeming rudeness or curiosity, and then gave a grunt, and wheeled off to his avocations. Several officers noticed this, but Ching was a character, and no one asked what he meant, or if he meant any thing. It was an hour or more before Mrs. G—— left the ball-room again. This time she entered the supper-room, leaning on her partner's arm. While the latter procured her some refreshment, the old Chinaman hovered near, looked sharply at the fair "barbarian," and then drew back with a muttered remark in his native tongue. Mrs. G—— never noticed him. Two minutes after, Ching-Lung was seen in close confabulation with the doctor of the Rifles, a sensible, experienced surgeon, who had been three years in Hong Kong, who had served on the medical staff in the old war, and who was regarded as the chief professional authority on the island. Dr. Rogers was a man who knew China well. He seemed much disturbed as Ching took him by the lappet of his coat, and whispered some communication. The two men's eyes ranged across the ball-room, in the door-way of which they stood a little apart, and fixed on Mrs. G——. The eyes of several loungers followed theirs by a common impulse. What did they see? Surely no terrible sight, but a young, happy, high-bred Englishwoman, radiant with beauty, health, and gayety, crowned with flowers, and sweeping through the ball-room like its queen. What was there in all this to make old Ching purse up his expressive Chinese mouth, and Dr. Rogers lift his eyebrows, and bite his lips, with a brow that knit with a spasm of involuntary anxiety? Smoothing his ruffled brow, the doctor stepped from his place, passed Mrs. G——, and looked full and steadily on her face. She looked surprised, and a little annoyed, but presently turned away smiling. She thought the doctor, no doubt, an odd, rude old gentleman. Very much compressed were the doctor's lips, and very often did the frown of care return to the doctor's brow, as he threaded his way through the crowd, most of whom had some slight or merry remark to bestow on so popular a character, until he reached the place where Captain G—— was talking to the Colonel's wife and two other ladies seated on an ottoman. The doctor drew Geordie aside; they were old friends; and begged as a particular favor that he would take his wife home, away from the ball, but without alarming her.

"Alarming her!" said Geordie, quite in the dark as to the other's meaning. "Why, what a Blue Beard you would make us turn out, doctor! She's engaged twelve deep, I'll be bound, and it wants an hour of supper-time, and I can't get her away. Besides, she's not tired. Why should she go, you know?"

To this Dr. Rogers merely answered that he begged as a favor that Captain G—— would take Mrs. G—— home. It must be done, and would be for the best. And being hard pressed for his reason, the doctor said Mrs. G—— was about to be ill. It was his duty to ask her husband to take her away from the crowded room.

Captain G—— laughed incredulously at first, but it was a hollow and forced laugh. It was plain that he did not believe in his own disbelief, and he knew the good old Medico too well to suspect him of jesting on such a point. His voice quivered a little as he asked for an explanation.

"Well, if you will have it," said Dr. Rogers, laying his hand on Geordie's arm, "there is something wrong with your wife. Old Ching noticed it first, and told me of it, and I have seen it myself, and I have seen such a thing but twice before, and both times in China. Pray Heaven that this may not end as it did in those two instances!"

"Speak out, man, you torture me!" said Captain G——, gasping for breath and very pale.

"It is a trifling matter, in appearance at least," replied Dr. Rogers, gravely and kindly; "it is a small black spot on your wife's face—in her left cheek—that is all, and—"

"And what is it? For the sake of all that's sacred, what is it?" asked G——, quite fiercely.

The doctor, noticing how quickly the group was increasing, drew his friend a few paces back, and whispered something in his ear.

The effect on Geordie was terrible. The brave strong man trembled visibly, and shook from head to foot, while his bronzed face became of an ashen paleness. Then, followed by the doctor, who waited for him to keep pace with him, he hurried up to the place where his wife was wheeling in the mazes of the waltz. His strode recklessly in among the dancers; his wild haggard looks and brusque gestures came some confusion and surprise. His wife saw him, and started, and with a word to her partner stood still. How beautiful she looked! flushed and excited with the dance, crowned with flowers, richly yet tastefully dressed; how, too, her fair fresh English bloom contrasted with the pallor of most of the other pretty women present! how her softly bright blue eyes rested with wonder on G——with apprehension for him, lest he should be ill. Certainly, if one of those two eyes were in mortal danger, any observer would have selected the husband as the one who bore the marks of it. But G—— was careless of that, and in his rage was in his gaze, as he beheld in the centre of his wife's blooming cheek a small black spot, not much larger than the head of a large black pin, and quite circular. It did not disfigure her; only a keen eye could distinguish it; and, when seen, it resembled one of those "beauty patches" which in the belles of the last century used to give an additional piquancy to their charms. Yes, there it was, the black spot the doctor had described. Its angry effect on G—— smoothed his features, and tried to smile, as he begged pardon of the company. He had interrupted them very rudely, he added; they had all left off dancing by this time—and he begged they would go on, and not mind him. The musicians had ceased playing; he waved his hand impatiently to them to go on. His wife approached him, her partner beside her, a Naval Commander, who did not fool at all disposed to forego the rest of his dance with the queen of the ball. "What is it?" she asked, in an anxious whisper. "No, no," he was not ill: but he wished she would come away—home with him directly. He would give no reason. His manner was irritable, harsh, unusual. The young wife looked at him with surprise; many gathered in her large eyes; but she was not without spirit, and she dashed them proudly away. She could not leave yet, she said; she was engaged for several dances. If there was no reason to be given for leaving so abruptly, she could not be so unkind to her partners. And in a moment more the Commander whirled her off.

G—— set his lip. She danced once, twice, thrice more. G—— stood moodily watching her, the doctor at his elbow. It was sad, agonizing to poor G——, to watch that glorious creature, and to know that she bore on her face the mark of—what? Even the doctor shrunk from telling G—— all he feared. His angry misery lured of hot womanly pride was over; the sight of her husband's anxious face disturbed her; her gayety fled; the compliments of her partners were unheard; she begged to be excused; left the gentleman on whose arm she leaned, and came up to G—— with a sunny smile. "I will be good now, and come home."

The doctor whispered to G—— to introduce him. G—— hurriedly complied. His wife remembered the old gentleman who had stared so pertinaciously at her; his eyes observed her still. He whispered a word to the Captain. Geordie tried to be calm as he asked his wife if she—if she was aware that there was a small black spot, a mere speck, on her left cheek. She blushed and laughed. Yes, she saw it in the glass when dressing. She could not rub it away. She thought it would go of itself. It had annoyed her a little, because it looked so like one of those absurd patches, but she hoped nobody noticed it.

"Excuse me, madam," said Dr. Rogers; "it may be of some consequence than you are aware of... I am an old doctor, and may be allowed to ask questions. Does it give you any pain?"

"Now—none at all."

The doctor looked graver still.

"There is a glass nearly opposite. Please to look, and see if it has not increased in size."

The lady, half frightened, complied. "Yes, it has indeed—it is four times as large as it was, almost as large as a pea—how tiresome!"

"One more question," said the doctor. "Have you any idea what brought it?"

"None," answered Mrs. G——. "George, love, I think I would rather go."

"Think again," pressed the doctor. "Has any reptile—any insect?"

"Yes, Dr. Rogers," answered the now fast paling beauty; "yes, but no! that could not be it, and I was silly to think twice of so trifling a thing as the bite of a fly."

"A fly! What sort of fly?" exclaimed the doctor.

"One of those black flies that were in the veranda, a tiresome buzzing thing: it stung me very sharply just there, on the left cheek where the spot is. I thought nothing of it when the pain went off. It was a long sort of fly, with a shining body and glistening greenish wings."

"The Bal-Tser! the Black Jupiter Fly! I knew it. Ching know it," said a hoarse grumbling voice close behind.

It was the old compradore, half horror-struck, half vain of his sagacity! Hastily they drew her from the room, wrapped her shawl around her, and hurried her home. Geordie, scarcely heeding the dance went on, supper succeeded (a very sumptuous affair), and then followed more dances, but by degrees the ninth hanguilloh, and a sort of uncomfortable feeling of apprehension and gloom pervaded the guests. Strange whispers, muttered hints, went round; the very Chinese servants had an unusual look. By degrees almost every body steamed aware that some mischance had befallen the fair young Englishwoman whom they had just welcomed among them. Two or three officers went to seek the doctor in his quarters, late as it was, to learn the truth. The doctor was absent. He was at Captain G——'s house, they, his servant said. He had sent for his portable medicine chest. Also the physician to the forces, and the marine surgeon, had been called up. The next morning, when most of the officers were at breakfast in the barrack mess-room, a subaltern entered hastily.

"Have you heard about poor Mrs. G——?"

"What? Dead!"

It was even so. She had been cut down in the very prime of her beauty and loveliness, and youth. It was awfully sudden. It broke her husband's life and hope at a blow. He never was seen to smile after that. The shock seemed to unman his old friends; he left the Rifles, exchanging into a regiment that was serving in Upper India, and died of fever in the Terai.

Now to clear up the seeming mystery of the Black Spot. There is a fly which, for the mischief it does, is known and feared throughout the East, and which is usually the cause of the bite of the Jupiter Fly. Its bite is generally most fatal to cattle. This fly is seldom very hurtful to the human race, except when it has been irritated by the curious, and thus communicates the morbid virus of decomposed animal matter to the veins of a living being. This occurs frequently both in Europe, and in the case of the common house-fly and the "buzz," or greenish carrion-fly. But this is rare, indeed, and the ordinary cases of pain and smarting from such bites are recorded within the last six or seven years on the continent of Europe. In the East, with its tropical heat, and its great festering of disease, the deaths from this insidiously administered poison are more frequent, and the poison itself is more virulent and rapid. It was in this manner that poor Mrs. G—— met her death. The black spot, unnoted at first by all eyes save her own, and neglected by herself, was the mark of its object in being selected by one of the compradore's agents to be poisoned by the fly. The doctor took blame to himself for not having insisted in defiance of ordinary rules, on the young lady's quitting the ball-room at once; but the hope that he might be mistaken, and a wish to spare G—— as much as possible, made him hesitate in speaking out. It was the opinion of all the medical men on the island, that when the compradore first called the doctor's attention to the mark of death on the face of the doomed beauty, the mischief was beyond remedy.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

I HAD no writing materials, but I had just copied a long letter for Count Rinnez on the outrageous treatment and false imprisonment of a British subject in Austria, when my door was opened by a tall, powerful, broad-faced man, in uniform, who announced himself as the Rittmeister von Mahony, of the Keyser Hussars.

"A countryman—an Irishman," said I, eagerly, glasping his hand with warmth.

"That is to say, my generations back," replied he; "my grandfather's brother was a lieutenant in Trenck's Horse, but since that none of us have ever been out of Austria."

If there was little of nobility in my heart just beginning to glow with the ardor of home and country, I soon saw that it takes more than two generations to make a foreigner lose sight of a man's nature. The honest Rittmeister, with scarcely a word of English in his vocabulary, was as keen a sympathizer as if he had never journeyed out of the land of Bog.

"He had heard 'all about it,'" he said, he were of everything that had happened since mine filled me; and he added, "And the more fool myself to notice the matter." Asking me, quaintly, if I never had heard of some native maxim that says, "One man ought never to fall upon forty?" "Well," said he, with a sigh, "what's done can't be undone; and let us see what's to come next? I see you are a gentleman, and the worse luck yours."

"What do you mean by that?" asked I.

"Just this: you'll have to fight; and if you were a 'gemeiner' you'd get off."

I turned away to the window to wipe a tear out of my eye; it had come there without my knowing it, and, as I did so, I devoted myself to the death of a hero.

"Yes," said I, "die is in this incident—she has her part in this scene of my life's drama, and I will not disgrace her presence. I will die like a man of honor rather than that her name should be disparaged."

He went on to tell me of my opponent, who was brother to a reigning sovereign, and himself a royal highness—Prince Max of Swabia. "He was not," he added, "by any means a bad fellow, though not regarded to be perfectly sane on certain topics." However, as his eccentricities were very harmless ones, merely exhibiting an exaggerated personal vanity, it was supposed that more active service, and a little more intercourse with the world, would cure him.

"Not," added he, "that one can say he has shown many signs of amendment up to this, for he never makes an excursion of half a dozen days from home without coming back filled with the relentless passion of some young queen or archduchess for him. As he forgets these as fast as he imagines them, there is usually nothing to lament on his subject. Now you are in possession of all that you need know about him. Tell me something of yourself; and first, have you served?"

"Never."

"Was your father a soldier, or your grandfather?"

"Neither."

"Have you any connections on the mother's side in the army?"

"I am not aware of one."

He gave a short, hasty cough, and walked the room for two or three minutes, stopped at his back, and then, coming straight in front of me, said, "And your name? What's your name?"

"Potts I have the honor to bear, my name."

"Potztausend!" cried he, with a grim laugh; "what a strange name!"

"I said Potts, Herr Rittmeister, and not Potztausend!" explained I, haughtily.

"And I heard you," said he; "it was involuntary on my part to add the termination. And who are the Potts you belong to?"

"Nothing of the kind—respectable middle class folk: some in trade, some clerks in merchants' houses, some in the civil government employments, one, perhaps the chief of them all, an eminent apothecary."

As if I had touched the most irresistible joke, at this word he held his hands over his face and shook with laughter.

"Excuse me," he cried he, at last, "this is too good! The Prince Max going out with an apothecary's nephew, or, maybe, his son!"

His son, indeed," said I, gravely.

He did not reply for some minutes; and then, leaning over the back of a chair, and regarding me very fixedly, he said,

"You have only to say who you are, and what your belongings, and nothing will come of this affair. In fact, what with your little knowledge of German, and your imperfect comprehension of what the prince said, and your own station in life, I'll engage to arrange every thing and get off myself scot-free."

"In a word," said I, "I am to plead in formal inferiors—isn't that it?"

"Just so," said he, puffing out a long cloud from his pipe.

"I'd rather die first!" cried I, with an energy that astonished myself.

"Well," said he, after a pause, "I think it's very probable that will come of it; but if it be your choice I have nothing to say."

"Go back, Herr Rittmeister," cried I, "and arrange the meeting for the very earliest moment."

I said this with a strong purpose, for I felt if the event were to come off at once I could behave well.

"As you are resolved on this course," said he, "do not make any such confidences to others as you have made to me; nothing about those Potztausends and their trade. Say you're a gentleman, and you are the high and well-born Potts of Pottsheim. Not a word more."

I bowed assent, and he continued, "It is always best to be explicit," cried he; "I was not counting upon this; and as the sabre is the prince's weakest arm, we'll select it."

I bowed again, and more blandly.

"There is but one more move," said he, turning about just as he was leaving the room. "Don't forget that in this case the gross provocation came from him, and therefore be satisfied with self-defense, or at most a mere flesh wound. Remember that the prince is a near connection of the royal family of England, and it would be irreparable ruin to you were he to fall by your hand." And with this he went out.

Now, had he gravely bound me over not to strangle the lions in the Tower, it could not have more effectually restrained me than this last injunction, and if there had been in my heart the smallest fund of humor, I could have laughed at it; but, Heaven knows, none of my impulses took a mirthful turn at that moment, and there never was invented the drollery that could wring a smile from me.

I was sitting in a state of stupor—I know not how long—when the door opened, and the Rittmeister's head peered in.

"To-morrow morning at five!" cried he. "I will fetch you half an hour before." The door closed, and he was off.

It was now a few minutes past eight o'clock, and there were therefore something short of nine hours of life left to me. I have heard that Victor Hugo is an amiable and kindly disposed man, and I feel assured, if he ever could have known the tortures he should have inflicted, he would never have written the terrible record entitled Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné. I conclude it was written as a sort of appeal against death punishments. I doubt much of its efficacy in altering legislation, while I feel assured that if ever it fall in the way of one whose hours are numbered, it must add indescribably to his misery.

When, how, or by whom my supper was served, I never knew. I can only remember that a very sleepy waiter roused me out of a half-drowsy reverie about midnight by asking if he were to remove the dishes, or let them remain till morning. I bade him leave them, and me also, and when the door was closed I sat down to my meal. It was cold and unappetizing. I would have dressed it myself—indeed, too, but I remembered that the poor stomach I was destined for would never be called on to digest it, and so for once I might indulge myself without the fear of dyspepsia. My case was precisely that of the penniless traveler, who, when stopped on the road by the robber, just as if want ever suggested melody, or that hunger ever was a reason for song. So with me my excess was supposed to be not just because it was impossible!

"Still," thought I, "great criminals—and surely I am not as bad as they—eat very hearty." And I sent the tough fowl vigorously to two and placed half of it on one side. I filled myself out a whole goblet of wine, and drank it off. I repeated this, and felt better. I felt to now with a will, and really made an excellent supper. There were some potted sardines that I secretly resolved to have for my breakfast, when the sudden thought flashed across me that I was never to breakfast any more. I verily believe that I tasted in that one instant a whole lifetime of mental distress.

There was in my friendless, lone condition, my youth, the mild and gentle traits of my nature, and the circumstances singularly just that combination of circumstances which would make my fate peculiarly pathetic, and I imagined my countrymen sitting beside the fire next morning and muttering "Poor Potts!" till I felt my heart almost bursting with sorrow over myself.

"Cut off in the three-and-twenty!" sobbed I; "in the very opening bud of his promise!"

"Misfortune is a people with many facets," says the Chinese adage, "and wise is he who turns it around till he find the smooth one."

"Is there such here?" thought I. "And what would it be?" With all my ingenuity I could not discover it, when at last the sacred my mind how the event would figure in the daily papers, and be handed down to remote posterity. I imagined the manner of life described in the language almost of a lion-hunt. "Potts, who had never till that moment had to record his having killed Potts, literally at this time severely wounded, and bleeding profusely, nothing dismayed by the ferocious attack of his opponent, who had assumed his guard with all the coolness of a consummate swordsman." How I wished my life might be spared just to let me write the narrative of the contest! I would like, besides, to show the world how generously I could treat an adversary, with what moderation I could respect his motives, and how nobly deal even with his injustice.

"Was that two o'clock?" said I, starting up, with the warning sound of the gong still filling the room. "Is it possible that but three hours now stand between me and—" I gave a shudder that made me feel as if I was standing in a cold wind. However, I had actually looked up to see if the window were not open; but no, it was closed, the night calm, and the sky full of stars. "Oh!" exclaimed I, "how I envy Pottses up among you yonder, I hope destiny may deal more kindly by them than down here. I trust that in those glorious regions a higher and purer intelligence prevails, and, above all things, that dueling is proclaimed the greatest crime. I feel a commission of homicide is worse ten thousand times; it is the whole suit, costume, and investure of an uncivilized age. "Poor Potts!" said I; "you went out upon your life-voyage with very generous intentions toward posterity. I wonder how it will treat you? I hope it celebrates your memory, uphold your fame, and dignify your motives! Will it be said, in history, 'Among the memorable events of the period was the duel between the Prince Max of Swabia and an Irish gentleman named Potts?' To understand fully the circumstance of this remarkable conflict, it is necessary to premise that I was not what is vulgarly called a Potts constitutionally brave; but he was more. He was—Ah! there was the puzzle. How was this miserable hesitation ever to arrive at the secret of an organization fine and subtle as mine? If I could but leave it on record—if I could but transmit to some age still more refined after me the invaluable key to the mystery of my being—a few days would suffice—a week, perhaps, would do it—still I should be afraid. I not have time given me to do this? I will certainly propose this to the Rittmeister when he comes. There can be little doubt but he will see the matter with my own eyes.

As if I had summoned him by enchantment, there he stood at the door, wrapped in his great white cavalry cloak, and looking gigantic and ominous together.

"There is no carriage-road," said he, "to the place we are going, and I have come thus early that we may stroll along leisurely, and enjoy the fresh air of the morning."

Until that moment I had never believed how heartless human nature could be! To talk of enjoyment, to recall the world and its pleasures, in any way, to one situated like I, was a cold and scarcely credible cruelty; but the words did me good service—they armed me with a sardonic contempt for life and mankind—and so I protested that I was charmed with the project, and out we set.

My companion was not talkative, he was a quiet, almost depressed man, who had led a very monotonous existence, with little society among his comrades; so that he did not offer me the occasion I sought for of saying saucy and sneering things of the world at large. Indeed, the first observation he made was that we were in a locality that ought to be interesting to Irishmen, since an ancient shrine of St. Patrick marked the spot of the convent to which we were approaching. No remark could have been more ill-timed; to look back into the past, one ought to have some vista of the future. Who can sympathize with by-gones when he is counting the minutes that are to make him one of them?

What a bore that old Rittmeister was with his antiquities, and how I hated him as he said, "If your line was not so limited, I'd have taken you over to St. Gallen to inspect the manuscripts." I felt choking as he uttered these words. How was my time so limited? I did not dare to ask. Was he barbarous enough to mean that if I had another day to live I could have passed it pleasantly in turning over musty missals in a monastery?

At last we came to a halt in a little grove of pines, and he said, "Have you any address to give me of friends or relations, or has you any peculiar directions on any subject?"

"You made a remark last night, Herr Rittmeister," said I, with a dull dread at the moment produce the profound impression upon me that subsequent reflection has enforced. You said that if his trophies were so fully aware that his antagonist was the son of a practicing chemist and apothecary—"

"That I would have put off this event; true enough, but when you refused that alternative, and insisted on satisfaction, I myself, as your countryman, took the guarantee for your rank, which nothing will now make me retract. Understand me well—nothing will make me retract."

"You are pleased to be precipitate," said I, with an attempt to sneer; "my remark had but one object, and that was my personal disinclination to obtain a meeting under a false pretext."

"Make your mind easy on that score. It will be all precisely the same in about an hour hence."

I nearly fainted as I heard this, it seemed as though a cold stream of water ran through my spine and paralyzed the very marrow inside.

"You have your choice of weapons," said he, curtly; "what say you best at?"

I was going to say the "javelin," but I was ashamed, and yet should a man sacrifice life for a false shame? while I reasoned thus, he pointed to a group of officers close to the garden wall of the convent, and said,

"They are all waiting yonder, let us hasten on."

If I had been mortally wounded, and was dragging my limbs along to rest them forever on some particular spot, I might have, probably, effected my progress as easily as I now did. The sluggishness and inequality of ground tripped me, and I stumbled at every step.

"You are cold," said my companion, "and probably unused to early rising; taste this."

He gave me his flask, and I drank it, and I dashed it off at a draught. Blessings be on the man who invented alcohol! all the ethics that ever were written can not work the same miracle in a man's nature as a glass of whisky. Talk of all the wonders of chemistry, and what are they to the simple fact that two pennyworth of cognac can convert a coward into a hero?

I was not quite sure that my antagonist had not resorted to a similar sort of aid, for he seemed as light-hearted and as jolly as though he was out for a picnic. There was a jauntiness, too, in the way he took out his cigar and scraped his leicher match on a beech-tree that quite struck me, and I should like to have imitated it if I dared.

"If it's the same to you take the sabre, it's his weakest weapon," whispered the Rittmeister in my ear, and I agreed. And now there was a sort of confusion about the choice of the ground and the places, in which my friend seemed to stand by me most manfully. Then there followed several measurements of swords, and a fierce comparison of weapons. I don't know how many were not thrust into my hand, one swing of this, it is well balanced in the wrist, or if you like a heavy guard, here's your arm!"

"To me, it is a matter of perfect indifference," said I, jauntily. "All weapons are alike."

"He will attack fiercely, and the moment the word is given," whispered the Rittmeister, "so be on your guard; keep your hilt full before you, or he'll slice off your nose before you are aware of it."

"Be not so sure of that till you have seen my sword-play," said I, fiercely; and my heart swelled with a fierce sentiment that must have been courage, for I never remember to have felt the like before. I know I was brave at that moment, for if, by one word, I could have averted the combat, I would not have uttered it.

"Is your place, cried the umpire, "and on your guard! Are you ready?"

"Ready," re-echoed I, wildly, while I gave a mad flourish of my weapon round my head that threw the whole company into a roar of laughter; and, at the same instant, two figures, screaming fearfully, rushed from the beech copse, and bursting their way through the crowd, fell upon me with the most frantic embraces, amidst the louder laughter of the others. Oh shame and ineffable disgrace! Oh misery never to be forgotten! It was Vätterchen who now grasped my knees, and Tintenfieck who clung round my neck and kissed me repeatedly. From the time of the Laocoon no one ever struggled to free himself as I did, but all in vain —my efforts, impeded by the sword, lest I might unwillingly wound them, were all fruitless, and we rolled upon the ground inextricably commingled and struggling.

"Was I right?" cried the prince. "Was I right in calling this fellow a saltimbanque? See him now with his comrades around him, and say if I was mistaken."

"How is this?" whispered the Rittmeister. "Have you dared to deceive me?"

"I have deceived no one," said I, trying to rise, and I poured forth a torrent of not very coherent eloquence, as the mirth of my audiences seemed to imply. Fortunately, Vätterchen had now obtained a hearing, and was detailing in very fluent language the nature of the relationship that existed between him, in his boundless gratitude I seemed more than human; and his praises actually shamed me to hear them. How I had first met them he recounted in the strain of one assisted by the gods in classic times; his description made me a sort of Jove coming down a rope cloud to succor suffering humanity; and then came in Tintenfieck with her broken words, marvelously aided by "action," as she appeared forth the heap of gold upon the grass and said it was all mine!

Wonderful metal, to be sure, for enforcing conviction on the mind, there is a sincerity about it far more impressive than any vocal persuasion. The very clink of it implies that the real and the positive are in question, not the imaginative and the ideal. "This is all his!" cried she, pointing to the treasure with the air of one showing Aladdin's cave, and though her speech was not very intelligible Vätterchen's "vulgate" ran underneath and explained the text.

"I hope you will forgive me. I trust you will be satisfied with my apologies, made thus openly," said the prince, in the most courteous of manners. "One who can believe with such magnanimity can scarcely be wanting in another species of generosity." And ere I could well reply, I found myself shaking hands with every one, and every one with me; nor was the least pleasurable part of this recognition the satisfaction displayed by the Rittmeister at the good issue of this event. I had great difficulty in resisting their resolution to carry me back with them to Bregenz; the numerous fêtes, the plans and projects devised for my entertainment, Field sports, sham-fights, rifle-shooting, all were displayed attractively before me; and it was clear that, if I accepted their invitations, I should be treated like the most favored guest. But I was firm in my refusal; and, pleading a pretended necessity to be at a particular place by a particular day, I started once more, taking the road with the "vagabonds," who now seemed bound to me by an indissoluble bond; at least so Vätterchen assured me by the most emphatic of declarations, and that, do with him what I might, I could never shake off his debts.

"Who is ever completely happy?" says the sage; and with too good reason is the doubt expressed. Here, one might suppose, was a situation abounding with the most pleasurable incidents. To have escaped a duel, and come out with honor, to have found friends, to have refound not only my missing money, but to have my suspicions relieved as to those whose honest name was dear to me, and whose discredit would have darkened many a bright hope of life—these were no small successes; and yet —I shame to own it—my delight in them was dashed by a sense of mortification insignificant that I have scarce courage to recall it. Here is, however. While I was taking a kindly farewell of my late companions, handshaking and protesting interminable friendships, I saw, or thought I saw, the prince, with even a more affectionate warmth, turn back and shake Tintenfieck! If he had not his arm actually round her waist, there was certainly a white leather cavalry glove curiously close to her side, and one of her cheeks was deeper colored than the other, and her bearing and manner seemed confused, as she answered, when spoken to, at cross purposes.

"How did you come by this brooch, Tintenfieck? I never saw it before."

"Oh, it was pretty? It is a violet; and these leaves, though green, are all gold."

"Answer me, girl! who gave it thee?" said I, in the vision of jealousy.

"Must I tell?" murmured she, sorrowfully.

"On the spot—confess it!"

"It was one bade me keep it till he should bring me a prettier one."

"I do not care for what he said, or what you promised; I want to know his name."

"And that I was never to forget him till then —never."

"Do you say this to irritate and offend me, or do you prevaricate out of shame?" said I, angrily.

"Shame!" repeated she, haughtily.

"Ay, shame or fear."

"Or fear! Fear of what, or of whom?"

"You are very daring to ask me. And now, for the last time, Tintenfieck—for the last time, I say, who gave you this?"

As I said these words we had just reached the borders of a little rivulet, over which we were to cross by stepping-stones. Vätterchen was, as usual, some distance behind, and now calling to us to wait for him. She turned at his cry, and answered him, but made no reply to me.

This continued defiance of me overcame my temper altogether, sorely pushed as it was by a stupid jealousy, and seizing her wrist with a strong grasp, I said, in a slow, measured tone, "I insist upon your answer to my question or—"

"Or what?"

"That we part here, and forever."

"With all my heart. Only remember one thing," said she, in a low, whispering voice; "if you left me once before—you quitted me, in a moment of temper, just as you threaten it now. Go, if you will, or if you must; but let this be our last meeting and last parting."

"It is as such I mean to good-by!" I sprang on the stepping-stone as I spoke, and at the same instant a glittering object sparkled into the stream close to me. I saw it, just as one might see the lustre of a trout's back as it rose to a fly. I don't know what demon sat where my heart ought to have been, but I pressed my hat over my eyes, and went on without turning my head.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, THE PRESIDENT ELECT, ADDRESSING THE PEOPLE FROM THE ASTOR HOUSE BALCONY, FEBRUARY 19, 1861.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MR. LINCOLN AT THE ASTOR HOUSE.

MR. LINCOLN, the President-elect, arrived at New York on Tuesday, 19th, as announced in the programme of his journey. An enormous crowd lined the streets to gaze at him as he passed. When he reached the Astor House there must have been some five thousand people assembled at the door, and they soon gave audible evidence of their wish to hear the distinguished visitor. With his usual good nature, Mr. Lincoln stepped out of a window, in company with a member of the Common Council, and, standing on the balcony, addressed them as follows:

"FELLOW-CITIZENS,—I have stepped before you merely in compliance with what appeared to be your wish, and with no purpose of making a speech. In fact, I do not propose making a speech this afternoon. I could not be heard by any but a very small fraction of you at best, but what is still worse than that is, that I have nothing just now to say worth your hearing. (Loud applause.) I beg you to believe that I do not now refuse to address you through any disposition to disoblige you, but the contrary. But at the same time I beg of you to excuse me for the present."

Mr. Lincoln then bowed again to the several gentlemen who were then presented to him, all of whom he cordially received.

EUROPEAN OPINION UPON OUR TROUBLES.

WE have published, from time to time, articles from the leading journals of France and England upon the lamentable events which have lately occurred in this country; we now publish, in the news columns, an extract from the Queen's Speech, just sent to the British Parliament, and an extract from the debates of one of the most authoritative bodies in France—the French Academy. Both, as will be seen, breathe the kindest spirit and the most earnest wish for a peaceable settlement of our difficulties.

An idea has long prevailed in this country that foreign governments were anxious to see this Union dissolved. A design to bring about disunion has been familiarly imputed to the British aristocracy in particular; and many persons, otherwise well-informed and sound-minded, have seriously and honestly believed that the British House of Peers was so solicitous for the dismemberment of the Confederacy of the United States that their influence and their means were at the service of any traitors who proposed to effect this result. The events of the past few weeks—chameleon as they have been in other respects—have, we think, had the effect of exploding this delusion, and teaching us sounder views on the attitude of foreign countries toward the United States.

No Power in Europe—not even excepting the Papacy—really desires to see the calm and successful career of this nation cut short by intestine broils. It is the interest of every foreign nation in the world that the United States should thrive, should remain united, and should increase steadily. For the United States have grown to their present magnitude by the cultivation of peace, commerce, and ordinary industry; by establishing with all countries commercial relations as beneficial to them as to us; by offering a safe home to exiles of all sorts; by relieving overcrowded European countries of their surplus population; and by setting a memorable example of a peaceful government carried on exclusively for the benefit of the governed.

Forty years ago, perhaps, in the days when the Tories ruled in England, when the divine right monarchy flourished in France, and when Holy Alliances met at Laybach and elsewhere to enforce popular submission to despotic theories, the success of the system pursued in the United States might have provoked jealousy and even opposition in Europe. But men's minds change a good deal in forty years. At the present time England is as democratic in sentiment as this country; France has established universal suffrage as the corner-stone of her Empire; Russia is liberalizing her institutions; Italy is consolidating a constitutional monarchy on a popular basis; Germany is steadily growing more and more democratic. All the nations of Europe are marching in our footsteps. British, French, German, Italian, Spanish, and Swedish journals, while taking sides pretty plainly in our domestic quarrel, all sympathize warmly with us in our trouble, and hope that it may be settled without war.

It is said that this sentiment is not wholly disinterested. A civil war in this country would no doubt derange our trade with all the nations of Europe, and put all of them to some inconvenience. But it would be unjustifiable to ascribe all this sympathy we receive to the interested impulses of European traders. Trade is not paramount in Europe, as it is here. Many expressions of good feeling have reached us from sources far beyond the control of the counting-house. The mercenary instinct has had its influence, no doubt; but beyond and above it, a friendly voice, proceeding from the open heart of our friends across the ocean, reaches us through such channels as the Queen's Speech, and teaches us a lesson of international good feeling and fraternity which ought not to be forgotten.

METROPOLITAN CROWDS.

IF New York had no other claim to the rank of the metropolis of America, her crowds would establish her right to the title. In no other city in this country can a truly metropolitan crowd be gathered together. Large numbers of people occasionally assemble in other cities, and impede the thoroughfares; but a genuine crowd, numbering 50,000, 75,000, 100,000, or 150,000 individuals, all animated by the same purpose, all conscious of their responsibilities, and all keenly alive to their rights, is a sight which can only be seen in three cities in the civilized world—Paris, London, and New York.

The greatest crowd ever gathered together in the streets of New York was undoubtedly that which greeted the eye of the Prince of Wales on his arrival here. It is probable that 250,000 people were afoot that day, in Broadway, the Fifth Avenue, and the adjacent streets, bent on seeing "the Prince." This is, of course, a small assemblage in comparison with the crowd which assembled on Kennington Common and the vicinity, in London, on 11th April, 1848; and with the crowds which Napoleon the Third occasionally summons to the Champ de Mars, or the Champs Elysées. In London and Paris it is supposed that half a million of people can be collected by an extraordinary occasion; and, considering the size of New York, 250,000 people is a very large muster. It is nearly one-third the total population of the city, and when we remember how many individuals must remain at work, how many must stay at home, how many are under age and sick, an actual muster of one-third the aggregate population in a few streets seems a genuine metropolitan love for sight-seeing.

It is supposed that, next to the Prince of Wales' crowd, the assemblage which gathered to see the Japanese land, and which was recollected to inaugurate the Atlantic telegraph, were the largest ever seen in New York. After these the greatest crowd ever gathered in Broadway was assembled on Tuesday last to see Abraham Lincoln, President-elect.

The last, though a very large crowd—probably exceeding 100,000 persons in number—was far less than the crowd which saw the Prince of Wales and the Japanese Princes, mainly from the fact that it contained few or no women. It would seem that the ladies, who suffered much from the dust of the Fifth Avenue, and endured some hardships to look at "Tommy," did not care about seeing Mr. Lincoln. Whether the absence of military display had any thing to do with the fact we will not undertake to decide.

It is gratifying to notice that our crowds, like those of Paris, and unlike those of London, are generally orderly and peaceable. In the British capital, a crowd always fills the police stations and the hospitals. In Paris, a few more pickpockets than usual are arrested, but fights seldom occur. In New York many quarrels will, never theless, be settled; the only acts of violence noticed have been committed by overzealous and brutal policemen; even the Bowery boys have behaved themselves quietly.

A metropolitan crowd is intelligent, quick-witted, and though (outside of London) naturally peaceable, easily roused to fury. A Parisian fight, of the most sanguinary description, will divert itself a whole day in the sunshine without a single blow struck; but if your ones rouse them, they fall to barricades naturally, and nothing short of cannon does or grape-shot quiets them. We rather think that, as New York grows, its crowds will develop similar characteristics. Large masses of men are dangerous bodies. Our rulers should watch our crowds and study them.

PATRIOTISM.

"PATRIOTISM," says the Dictionary, "is love of country." "Patriotism," said Dr. Johnson, the Tory, "is the last refuge of a scoundrel." "A man devoid of patriotism," says a leading philosopher, "is capable of the greatest crimes." Sings Walter Scott:

> "Lives there a man with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land?"

The subject of patriotism is in a fair way of being more thoroughly ventilated than it ever was before. Every body appears to admit that patriotism is a virtue, and that a man should love his country. But what constitutes love of country?—What is our country? Smith, in South Carolina, says that the United States is his country, and that he loves the stars and stripes; for which expression of opinion he is instantly exiled from the State under pain of a prosecution for treason. On the other hand, Jones, born in Georgia, but in the service of the United States, declares that the secession of Georgia requires him to resign his commission, and to proceed forthwith to Milledgeville to prepare for war against the United States; for which proceeding he is denounced at the North as devoid of patriotism, and by many as an absolute traitor. Jones protests that he is the purest kind of patriot, and that he will lay down his life for Georgia. The question seems to be—How much country must a man love to be a genuine patriot?

Smith says—You must love your whole country as represented by and included under the national flag. Jones says—No, it suffices to love your own State. Upon this Robinson takes his stand and says that, in his opinion, it is sufficient to love your own county. Brown is of opinion that he fulfills his duty by loving his town. And Thomson fiercely claims the title of patriot because he loves his native farm.

It is pretty clear that Thomson, at all events, is wrong. His patriotism is mere selfishness, and has no merit at all of a public nature. It is also clear that Smith is right, although it may be pretended by Jones and the others that he demands too much—when he claims the title of patriot for loving his whole country. The question which will engage some attention in the course of the pending revolution.

About thirteen years ago the people of Italy were unanimous in favor of national independence, and the overthrow of the Austrian power. Every Italian wanted the same thing. In those days Charles Albert, King of Piedmont, the only Italian Potentate who had both an Italian soul and an Italian army, said to the people of the peninsula: "Join me, and we shall free Italy." There were people throughout Italy who were not responding badly. Yes. But when it came to the fighting-point, the Venetians said they were Venetians, the Tuscans said they were Tuscans, the Romans said they were Romans, the Neapolitans said they were Neapolitans, the Sicilians said they were Sicilians: and lo! there were no Italians in all Italy. Charles Albert's appeal failed; Austria triumphed, and for thirteen years more Italy groveled in chains. It would seem that the event—which is in every one's memory—sheds some light on the law of patriotism.

THE LOUNGER.

PRESIDENTIAL.

IF any enterprising newspaper could have secured Ariel as its special reporter during the last two or three weeks we should have had some striking and valuable letters. For Mr. Ariel would have seen three great processions in the three great cities of modern times, each in honor of the progress of the age, and each, in addition to the notion upon its intimate and important relations. The Queen of England, the Emperor of France, and the President of the United States have each marched in state to the seat of their several Governments.

The contrast of the marching is instructive. The Queen, as the chief of an aristocratic class, surrounded by every kind of pageantry, in which the military is most conspicuous, gives London a holiday. The Emperor, a General, and the wise head of a military government, addresses his Assembly through his bright camp of Paris. The President, the plainest and simplest of citizens, without knight or cavalry, without a soldier or a drum, with a band of constables to clear the way, and another to restrain the pressing crowd, rides quietly with his head in an open barouche, followed by a dozen other barouches, and saluted from sidewalk and window and balcony by the most extraordinary and spontaneous and voices loyal to their country and its Government, and quickened to deep enthusiasm by the proud flag—the symbol of national greatness. The pageantry which fixed at intervals down the long vista of the street.

The contrast of the spectacle was the difference of the political systems. Ours rests upon opinion, upon rational conviction: the others, upon the military arm. With us, the sword is the unsheathed defense of the necessary rights of every government, which represents the popular will lawfully expressed; in the others, it is the emphasis and argument of a single dynasty, which may or may not be that of the nation. Other systems presuppose two powers—the government and the people. In our system there is not, and the antagonism is between the people and discontented or rebellious individuals. And our system secures to each of those individuals the same right to personal respect as all the other citizens of the justice of their opinions, and therefore the opportunity of making them legally prevail.

The wit of man could not devise a plan more perfect; and the event of the last week was the entry of the lately-elected representative of that will into the city of New York. A simple, earnest, sincere-looking man, gazing curiously at the noble street and the vast crowd that filled it, he bowed at intervals to the people, yet abstractedly, as if he were instinctively conscious, as he has so frequently said, that it was not he, but the majesty of the nation visible in his person, that aroused the profound interest of the people. It was a very striking contrast to the Japanese wonder and the pageant that welcomed the Prince of Wales. They were pretty spectacles, in which nobody had any particular interest; but the intent interest of every citizen of the country at this moment made the quietly with which the new President was regarded significant and solemn. There was the same kind of hushed interiority of feeling as he passed which one may imagine in the crowds that watched Washington.

The Lounger, like his fellow-citizens, has seen more than one Presidential progress. He saw the acting-President Tyler as he drove through the streets of Boston to hear the oration of Daniel Webster at the completion of the Bunker Hill Monument; and before that he saw, with all New York, the progress of President Van Buren as he passed up Broadway from the Battery—the occasion which is also memorable for the advent of Fanny Kemble to journalism: for the town was favored next day with a description of the President's bedchamber and dressing-room. But neither of those scenes was of more than superficial interest. The entry of President Lincoln will be always memorable; for we were looking upon a man to whom greater and more trying duties were to be assigned than were ever assigned since Washington: and all that he has said and done, all that is told of his life, certifies the deep sincerity of his words when he says that he relies for the just performance of those duties upon the favor of God and the support of the people.

CRABBED AGE AND YOUTH.

THE man of sixty, as he waits for his wife in the dressing-room, and hears the throbbing beat and passionate movement of the dancing music below, looks with a half-delighting, regretful curiosity upon the eager youth around him, buttoning their gloves and surveying their neck-ties, and sympathizes with them in his heart, though he has seen too late, and that all the high festival of life was ended before they arrived to enjoy it.

He sees in the glances of other days, the belles that were belles, the sweet tingle of excitement in the nerves, the fine delirium of love and youth, and pities them while he thinks that the ball to-night can be what the ball was in '20, when Mrs. Ptoleuy Philadelphus, who is now chiefly intent upon terrapin at supper, was the superb Cleopatra of the court homage. The play is done, his musing, melancholy glance seems to say to the impatient youth of to-day: The lamps are put out; they only smoke now and spoil unpleasantly. The lively partners are grandmothers and unmarried aunts in the corner; 'tis all a mistake to sport young gen tlemen: this ain't life; this is only a carnival of spectres—a ghastly satire.

The light rustle and sweep of airy dress floating down the staircase into the ball-room, the music and flowers and gems and beaming faces below, does not disturb the fidelity of his faith in the past. He cities the whole: he distributes it all: he can not persuade himself that they are truly happy as he was happy, long ago. Could some kind fairy whisper that when he was young, and eager, and hopeful, there were also the musing, melancholy men of sixty, who disbelieved as heartily in his enjoyment, he might pause a moment and wonder; and as his wife appeared, no longer a sylph in muslin, but a brocaded, diamonded dowager, the conviction might slowly steal into his mind that it was the man, and not the nature, that had changed; that twenty is as blithe and hopeful as ever twenty was before; and that the skeptical man of sixty may be happy still, if he can secret, and regret that the heart kindled and the foot bounded no more with the passionate persuasion of the dancers dancing in time.

It was with the same skepticism of sixty that a gentleman whom the Lounger saw upon the late festival of good Bishop Nicholas looked at gayety and merry a group of school-girls as was ever seen. It was in a small village, and afternoon school was out. Not less than forty or fifty little faces of girls and forms, from five and six years up to fifteen, were packed in a shouting, gabbling throng around the window of the post-office, all pushing and struggling to be in front; and when the most energetic reached the spot, and the grave-faced boy of seventeen asked the name, there was such hilarious forgetfulness of her own name in every case, that the impatient expectants behind all shouted it in chorus of childlike treble, and the bashful girl in the window had not entirely wished she had been less so energetic and successful. There was the most gleesome babble, and nobody thought of doing any thing but enjoying the tender mirth to the very eye, and reading them and there. "Ain't you ashamed, Almiry Jane, to step up the way so?" "Emma Hutchin! Emma Hutchin! let us up." "Oh! Hannah, it's too bad! It's real selfish to stand there!" Then a general, merry, wrangling hubbub and squeal, and the delicious little farce for the purposes of trade was then and there suspended.

"What infernal nonsense!" said the neighbor of the Lounger—waiting, like him, for his wife to get near enough to drop in a letter. "Here, children, get out of the way! Don't make such a noise! What are you doing here? Why don't you go home and behave yourselves?"

The gleesome noise died before this rough excursion as the cooing of doves in the sunny air in the shadow of a storm. The little faces were turned up in timid doubt; the throng parted, and the gentleman dropped his letter and departed.

Why do we so easily forget that we have been young, and that youth is always the same? The instinctive feeling of each bright-eyed child in that pretty crowd was, of course, "Here's a man that I am not that man's child!" Yes, and how sorry they would have felt, if they had been as old as the Lounger, for that man's children! Let no hope that his oldest boy has sent that beautiful valentine over which Almiry Jane is blushing, and that his next vows that never Fate shall sever his heart from the clutchin' of Emma Hutchin; while his third declares in capital letters that his heart is a banner engraved with Hannah, which never shall be furled in this dreary world, but forever and hay continue to flap.

That would be poetic justice. Their pleasure should thus come out of his pocket, if not out of his heart.

SCOLDING.

To call a man a liar is not to prove him false: to denounce him as a traitor is not to establish his treason. The eloquence which consists of personal aspersion is a gun of which the recoil is much more fatal than the discharge; and since cursing is much easier than convincing, when a man begins the one you may be very sure that he despairs of the other.

But the fatal difficulty with wholesale personal vituperation is that its tendency is to compel men to your own course not by persuasion and conviction, which are the only honorable motives of conduct, but by the fear of abuse or the desire to avoid the expectoration of scurrility. Vituperation is akin to the ad*hominem* argument. If you cross me, it says, I will make you small as badly as I can. Vituperation propupetes infallibility. "I think," it says, "I can be the only way to avoid a terrible injustice is to do this, and I think so honestly." You don't agree with me; you pretend to believe that it can be avoided in some other way. Pooh! you are dishonest, treacherous, weak, and time-serving. You are a traitor, a fool, a perjurer, a knave. You are a liar, a scoundrel, a thief, and a murderer."

What rightly pertains to this gross assault but pity and contempt, and the silent appeal to the heart of mankind, which is just at last.

There is a plea which is sometimes made for this acrimonious personal criticism and aspersion of motives. It is this: "Here I am," says the orator, "in a country where the leaders are not to be set as examples, not to certain principles as its guides. Now I may talk till I am hoarse about the duty of honest. Every appeal to principle, but open to following the models who act unjustly. If then I say distinctly 'this model of yours is a mean, time-serving man, honest in any circumstance he does unjustly,' the followers are aroused by their personal interest and outraged sense of propriety to see just what I mean. If the leaders are not to young men are base, show and say that they are so, and their worship will corrupt the young men no more."

This is the plea. It does not always mend the case. It is not showing that the plea is base merely to say that it is so. It is necessary, first of all, to establish the character of the man, and when you have done that you do not need to blacken him. The proof of his dishonesty is sharper sting than lies in any word of yours. But to assume his dishonesty because he differs from you, and proposes to pelt him with bad names, that is a folly and a fault which the universal instinct of men perceives and condemns. It may hold to your own side a little newer so sincerely, yet you do not believe a bit more honestly than the man who profoundly differs from you. It will not allow that men may honestly differ, and that you owe to what seems to you honest error in another man precisely the same consideration that you claim from him for your own sincere faith, you are really a monomaniac. Moral despotism is equally hateful in a triple crown and a jacket, or a tiara of straw. We learn it slowly, this truth slowly, but we learn it surely, thank God!

HISTORICAL GROUPING.

It was a memorable spectacle to those who saw it, the late admission of Father Lacordaire to the French Academy. Got, the last minister of the last king of the younger Bourbon branch in France, whose infexibility hastened the revolution of '48, introducing the reign of imperial honor of the late Mademoiselle Montijo, now Empress of the French. Pleo-Pleo and his sister Matilde representing the Bonaparte line. Lamoricière, the Pope's late General-in-Chief, and the republican chieftain of '48. Changarnier, the special friend of the President lends Napoleon, not so special friend of his Imperial Majesty, and finally Lacordaire himself, a Dominican monk, chosen to the seat of De Tocqueville. What a group! What associations!

Obedient to the custom of the Academy, Lacordaire pronounces an oration upon the life and genius and virtues of his late member. He humbly praises the sagacious Frenchman who knew the worth of the democratic principle. The stern old Huguenot could not withhold the courtly and eloquent Dominican. Nor is it surprising that the historian of modern civilization should have found in the very circumstance of the occasion a most pregnant illustration of the great theme of his studies. Civilization puts out one of its fairest flowers when it puts out the friendliest revolution. And it is not yet three centuries since the massacre of St. Bartholomew!

In a grave and stately old age, Guizot lives only as student still, and a spectator only of public affairs. The France he tried to govern he sees governed by Louis Napoleon. There are new men and new principles in power, but he doubtless thinks the old times best, and the novelty but the fashion of an hour. Has the history of civilization taught him that the greatest and most successful governor is he who bases his government more and more upon political justice? It only needed the experience of Elam in the Academy to have completed the picture. Would the Guizot of 1840 have believed that the adventurer of Boulogne could teach him the principles of governing? Would he probably allow that, of all the Louises of France, the present one is really le grande novateur?

NAUGHTY BOYS AT ALBANY.

If a score of school-boys had behaved themselves in school as the legislators of this State have behaved in the Capitol at Albany during the last week, they would all have been soundly spanked, and judicious parents and guardians would have responded an echoing "Amen" after every timely thwack. The child is clearly father of the man, for children do conduct themselves as the legislators have done about the reception of the President-elect.

The point seems to have been to stand upon dignity! But waiving the question of the possibility of our Legislature finding any such quid as is dignity under such circumstances? In a case of mere ceremony, and entirely unprecedented, dignity is good-humor and common sense, and not the gratification of personal or partisan malice. In a system like ours, if we can not agree to differ we may as well abandon the experiment at first as at last. And it is just as true of little matters as of large. The point in the reception of the President-elect was, that he should be received as the capital by an official representative of the people of New York. Now both the Governor and the Legislature are such representatives, and whether the one or the other welcome the guest it is the people welcoming him through their officer.

The affair is long since passed; but every such event teaches the great truth of the popular principle, that there is no more wisdom, but only more convenience for specific purposes, in masses of men. The aggregate is never wiser than the wisest individual. The Legislature is no stronger than the strongest man in it; and, as we pondered a little, pondered when that composes it fall to foolish and bitter wrangling upon a point no-point, every school-boy in the State seemed to us the more dignified, which they offend decency and common sense, and longs for the time when he shall be old enough to have outgrown a good thrashing, while, by reason of ampler experience, he deserves it more than ever.

THE CENTRAL PARK COMMISSION.

All Loungers are particularly interested in the Central Park, which has been rendered a hill at Albany to have a new commission appointed. Why? Who asks for it. The people of the State last year, upon representation, ordered an inquiry. The inquiry was made. The report established that the Central Park was doing a great deal better than could be expected. What new facts have been developed? Why are new charges alleged? It is peculiarly a subject of interest for the city. It is especially a matter with which private quarrels and political intrigue should have nothing to do; and every citizen ought to take care that the success of so great a work for his benefit should be paid for by the State.

It is one of the disadvantages of our political system, which although superior to any other in not utterly perfect, that the legislative progress of great enterprises can be suddenly and rudely thwarted by political changes that can not possibly affect them, and may only supply opportunity of patronage. And in that view, it is fortunate that the political dominance in the Legislature will probably remain with the party under whose auspices the present commission was appointed, long enough to secure the virtual completion of the Park. It would be against all decency, and right, and common sense, if the Legislature should begin to cobble the work which its committee have just reported to it needs no cobbling, and which, in its present hands, is very sure not to be cobbled.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE VARIATION HUMBUG.

There is perhaps more humbug talked, printed, and practised in reference to Music than to any thing else in the world, excepting the whole art of the musical humbugs extant, the Variation Humbug is the greatest. This puny bug has the same place to attract a tune for himself, but takes somebody else's, and starting therefrom, as an overbold jaque for a spring-board, jumps himself into a musical reputation on the strength of the other party's idea. Where would be such a poet who should try to make himself renown by his kind of thing—taking a well-known poem of a predecessor's, and doing Variations on it after this fashion?

BUGGINS'S VARIATIONS ON THE BUSY BEE.

How doth the little Busy Bee
Improve each shining hour,
And gather honey all the day
From every opening flower.
From every opening flower, flower, flower,
From every opening flower.

How skillfully she builds her cell,
How neat she spreads her wax,
And labors hard to store it well
With the sweet food she makes.
With the sweet food she makes, makes, makes,
With the sweet food she makes.

In works of labor or of skill
I would be busy too,
For Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do.
For idle hands to do, do, do,
For idle hands to do.

In books, or work, or healthful play
Let my first years be passed,
That I may give for every day
Some good account at last.
Some good account at last, last, last,
Some good account at last.

I'll shun the broad way,
For Satan's found some mischief still
For busy hands to do.

There! Would a Poet get much reputation for these Variations, which are much better in their way than most of those bad puns upon tunes? Would the poetical critics come out, as the musical critics do, with "Upon Watts's marble foundation Buggins has raised a sparkling alabaster palace;" or, "The old-fashioned Watts has been brought into new lamp by the chiselled Buggins;" or, "We love the old tune, but we have room in our hearts for the thirty-like formation of last-song which Buggins has let start from it?" Buggins would have no such luck: the moral to be deduced from which fact is, that a Musical Prig is luckier than a Poetical Prig.

CHILDREN IN CRINOLINE.

It is an old saying, that the child is father of the man: and if this be so, why every year has to be true that, when feminine, the child is mother of the woman. On this supposition we may look for what there is at present for dressing little girls in Crinoline on every state occasion. If indeed there be any thing in ordinary life. As a juvenile party where we lately danced attendance, we observed that the little girls of the evening aged four was fully six times and a half as broad as she was long: and many of the happy little fellows were present were, in their magnitude of petticoat, almost equally as great. Now, this love of a thing, when implanted in a child, the chances are, we think, that it will grow with the child's growth, and will by and by have increasingly developed. They who look, therefore, for Crinoline to be declining in the fashionable world this season, have no hope for this in seeing children wear it. On the contrary, the children are, than ever, going to grow up they will be found far more extensive in their dress than were their mothers at the same time. Crinoline increase in the like fashion there will really be no guessing to the enormous witness it will be displayed by one (with emphasis we may regard them as great grandchildren).

DINNER AND TEA TRAITS.

You never hear one woman invite another woman out to dinner, any more than you ever hear one man ask another to come and take tea with him. No! it would seem that women's hearts melted and softened over the tea-cup, and that they could not look each other with the table-cloth. Who is there to explain it? It takes several halves and fortes to sing into a man's heart the glorious sense in the simple key of the tea-caddy will unlock a woman's breast at any time.

THE NAKED TRUTH.—He who travels through life in the hope of jumping into the chaussure of another mostly goes on a bootless errand.

THE ONLY CURE.—A Strong minded Lady says that the only possible way of curing gentlemen of the filthy habit of chewing is for the ladies to enter into a solemn compact to adopt the same practice themselves. The gentlemen would then see how disgusting as well as senseless the custom was, and, out of mere regard to decency, if not to reason, they would be compelled to abandon it. The lady in question is a widow, and her husband's decease a very high rank in the First Bolgravian Blues) authorities to the effect that she would bring the first herself to set the noble example. She is perfectly ready and willing to abandon the habit, for the sake of a cigar, or even a pipe, for the benefit of her suffering sisters. Any thing to shame the men out of their filthiness, and to ridicule them into a sense of the proper respect that ought to be paid to the fair sex. But, because that plan of a tobacco-smoke, she maintains, is Lovely Woman's due!

FASHION FOR THE PRE-PLACE.

We have seen a recent thing in muslin for morning dress. It is a light, airy, and graceful garment admirably adapted for expansion on the most extensive Crinoline. But the pattern of it is the most striking feature. It is figured all over with flames and little prostrate figures, considerably burnt, in consequence. The new wrapper in which the Spanish Inquisition used to adorn the victims about to be sacrificed at the stake, and which, it is supposed, led to fashion, this elegant and ladylike garment has been directly by the nonsense of the ladies have lately been burned alive in consequence of their delightfully wide skirts catching fire.

WORSE AND WORSE.

What's the difference between a Man with a sore throat and a Manilla cheroot?—Why, the one is a Man ill, and the other's a Man like!

(Don't frown, reader, please. The cold weather has really frozen the wits of many of us, and this is a la first symptom of its having been to thaw.)

TWO FEATURES ROLLED INTO ONE.

A City Gent, praising a lady for her beauty, said, in a burst of rapture, "Her eyes are such a round eye!"

Every one was astonished, and upon questions being asked as to what was meant by "round eye," our friend pointed to a lady present, who, he said, had eyes something like an Ribbon by the same token that when flushed with wine "she was a 'hazel eye'" the City Gent had meant to say. For the life of him, however, he could not have us to keep it, because he had said a lady had "a mazel eye." He got little angry at last, and said that which was a great relief to every one present, as his absence enabled all the guests to join in one unanimous shout of guffaw.

A THOUGHT FOR TRADE.—Impudence is like an umbrella —when once we have lost it, we must never hope to see it back again!

A MAN CALLED OUT OF HIS NAME.—We can't conceive a greater misnomer than that of the Plaintiff in the great case of Paterson vs. Bonaparte now being tried in Paris.

So there is a question of Paterson vs. Bonaparte, when the very question at issue is, whether he is to be allowed to be the lawfully-begotten child of his own Pater—and the chances are a hundred to one against it!

INCONVENIENT HORSES!—Wonder has its sorrows as well as Poverty. Sir Francis Drive, who has every thing he can wish for, complaining bitterly the other day. "I have a horse that's a regular wonder, I assure," he said, laconing. "They jib going up-hill, and bolt going down-hill!"

WELL, WE ARE, ETC.—If you say that dear boy Walter Shakspeare quotation would you use?—"Wat's in an aim."

AT BREAKFAST.

Q. What is the Schleswig-Holstein question. Papa?

A. Well, my dear boy, I am pleased to see that you have an inquiring mind, and a desire of what is said in your presence, and I will endeavor to make you understand. Schleswig-Holstein is a question that is not exactly in Denmark, at least Schleswig may be called so, but not Holstein. The Holstein that may be considered Danish, or, if you like a long word better, Scandinavian, is that which is called Lay-a-Dy. Holstein is the German division of the territory, and Schleswig is an ancient fief (you know what a fief is) of the Crown, and was ceded in 1816; that is to say, Holstein was ceded, not Schleswig. Holstein having been an ancient fief of Germany, and therefore you see Prussia takes an interest in the question, as part of the German Confederation; but Lord John Russell is only in the matter as a mutual friend, and he thinks that Prussia and Austria—no, I mean Denmark, yes, of course Denmark, that concessions shall be made to Holstein—to Holstein does not want concessions, but a vote (that is Latin for, I forbid) upon taxation and other things, and Schleswig to be allowed to speak German—well, Lord John thinks this fair, but the Prussian minister does not think that Prussia—at least Denmark, has any right to impose conditions of this sort, because there was a promise of a Constitution to Schleswig or Holstein, I forget which, but the principle is the same, and there are some other points mixed up with it which you might not be able to understand as easily as the simple outline of the case which I have given you. Pass my cup to your mamma.

THE WRONG MAN FOR THE WORK.

A Work is announced by Dr. Tick, called "Memory, and How to Aid It." The name is a bad one for a lecturer on Mnemonics—for, so far as we have seen, those who have had most to do with Tick are decidedly the people of short-term memory.

REVIVAL OF THE ORDER OF FLAGELLATA.—The Yankees say, "the Brotherhood ship the rest of the world, and we ship the Britishers." Now Punch seems to "exhilirate" they're genius to whip themselves."

CHAOS.—A woman putting your room to rights—just after you have been thoroughly arranging every thing to your satisfaction, and elaborately assorting your papers with methodical care that you could put your finger upon each separate one in the dark—that is what I call Chaos. Then are the days when a bundling comes to the babies than women are in lingering men's papers. The mixing of damages, and deadening of spirits, and thorough disturbance of temper for the rest of the day, that is another matter. But before practice surpasses all belief.—A Confirmed Old Bachelor.

AN OLD BOOT.—Italy has often been compared to a Boot, but what is still more odd, it is a Boot that is not without its Gaeta.

NEVER SAW HIM DRINK.—A witness in a certain court, on being interrogated as to whether the defendant in a certain case was drunk, replied, "Well, I can't say that I have seen him drunk exactly: but I once saw him sitting in the middle of the street, making grabs in the air, saying that he'd be hanged if he didn't catch the bed the next time it ran past him."

The late Mr. Mathews used to tell a story of a gentleman who was so huge, though not so witty, as Falstaff. When his carriage was traveling, he took two places, and thus secure half the inside to himself. One day he sent his servant to the Bath. The man returned with the following pleasing news: "Sir, I have booked you; there were no two places inside left, so I booked you one in and one out."

A celebrated geologist, member of the Academy of Sciences, was lately traveling in the South of France. On his return to Paris, he was questioned by his friends and on nothing in the milestone inn where he lodged (i. was the St. Charles of the place) but a meagre omelet, and that was overdosed with garlic.

"Great Heavens, Professor," said he to the hostess, "why did you put so much garlic in the omelet?"

"Good me, Sir, how many eggs were we to?"

WANTED TO PATENT.—The filter of misfortune, to separate true friends from false.

DUVAL, the famous Austrian librarian, was once consulted upon a subject of which he was not wholly the master, by a young nobleman who was not his friend.

"I do not know," was his frank response.

"But," said the other, "you attend the Minister;" "the Emperor pays you for knowing!"

"I do. Emperor pays me for what I know," said Duval; "if he paid me for what I do not know, the whole treasury of his kingdom would not suffice."

CARDS.—Sheridan, in a speech, said that, when establishing his school-children, he had asked the meaning of "Fabers, provoke not your children to wrath. For a time there was a question whether the primitive verse of a poor pole boy replied, "Licking them so as to make them angry."

BORES OF SOCIETY.—There are two principal bores in society, from which all the little bores spring: viz., those in the high bore, the man who knows all, and the bore No. 2—the man who knows too little. Both are decidedly bores.

Coventry Patmore, in his new poem, gives the following advice:

"So let no man, in desperate mood,
Wed a dull girl because she's good."
To which we might add:
"And let no woman, in her plight,
Wed a bad man because he's bright."

A young lawyer arose to an old limb of the law, which read thus: "Is there any gentleman present in your country which I can get into?"—Answer: "There is an opening in my back yard, twenty-thirty feet deep, no curb around it. If it will suit, come on."

A "settler" in Australia was taken before a justice very drunk, and inquiry being made into the reasons put to him, he persistently spluttered out—"Your Honour is very—hic—kind to—hic—ask me, but I—hic—am very sorry—hic—for either answer, the justice ordered him to be locked up till next day, when he was again brought up.

"Why, John," said the justice, "you were as drunk as a beast yesterday. When I asked you any questions the only answer you gave me was—'Your Honour's very kind.'"

"Did I say so?" quoth the defendant. "Then I must have been drunker than I thought."

To rob a man of his money is to wound him in the chest.

"That which thou hast to do, do it with all thy might," said a man to his son one morning.

"Why, I suppose," said the enthusiastic gleam in his eye.

"Ah! what was it, darling?" and the father's finger ran through the offspring's curls.

"Why, I suppose," said Edwards till he yelled. You should just have heard him holler, dad."

The father looked unhappy, while he explained to him that the precept did not apply to an act like that.

A young great recently regaled the ears of his "bright particular" with a somewhat protracted serenade, at the close of which the chamber window opened, and a small white package descended therefrom. The enamored youth hastily entered the luscious missive, and retired to a place of safety, and with a trembling hand proceeded to unfold—a nightcap and a spout.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA BATTERIES.

WE publish herewith, from drawings kindly sent us by an officer of Major Anderson's command at Fort Sumter, views of the batteries which the South Carolina troops have raised on Sullivan's Island and other points in the Bay of Charleston, in order to attack Fort Sumter. They need no description. We would, however, draw attention to the view of the iron-clad battery on Cumming's Point. This battery is faced with bars of railroad iron placed side by side, so as to form a complete coat of mail. Whether it will answer the purpose or not remains to be seen. Some officers of engineers and artillery, who have studied it, seem to think that after a few shots the iron will splinter, and that it will add infinitely to the dangers of the garrison of the battery.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE pale young gentleman and I stood contemplating one another in Barnard's Inn until we both burst out laughing. "The idea of its being you!" said he. "The idea of its being you!" said I. And then we contemplated one another afresh, and laughed again. "Well!" said the pale young gentleman, reaching out his hand good-humoredly, "it's all over now, I hope, and it will be magnanimous in you if you'll forgive me for having knocked you about so."

I derived from this speech that Mr. Herbert Pocket (for Herbert was the pale young gentleman's name) still rather confounded his interference with his execution. But I made a modest reply, and we shook hands warmly.

"You hadn't come into your good fortune at that time?" said Herbert Pocket.

"No," said I.

"No," he acquiesced: "I heard it had happened very lately. I was rather on the look-out for good fortune then."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. Miss Havisham had sent for me, to see if she could take a fancy to me. But she couldn't—at all events, she didn't."

I thought it polite to remark that I was surprised to hear that.

"Bad taste," said Herbert, laughing, "but a fact. Yes, she had sent for me on a trial visit, and if I had come out of it successfully, I suppose I should have been provided for; perhaps I should have been what-you-may-called it to Estella."

"What's that?" I asked, with sudden gravity.

He was arranging his fruit in plates while we talked, which divided his attention, and was the cause of his having made this lapse of a word. "Affianced," he explained, still busy with the fruit, "betrothed. Engaged. What's-his-named. Any word of that sort."

"How did you bear your disappointment?" I asked.

"Pooh!" said he, "I didn't care much for it. She's a Tartar."

"Miss Havisham?" I suggested.

"I don't say no to that, but I meant Estella. That girl's hard and haughty and capricious to the last degree, and has been brought up by Miss Havisham to wreak revenge on all the male sex."

"What relation is she to Miss Havisham?"

"None," said he. "Only adopted."

"Why should she wreak revenge on all the male sex? What revenge?"

"Lord, Mr. Pip!" said he. "Don't you know?"

"No," said I.

"Dear me! It's quite a story, and shall be saved till dinner-time. And now let me take the liberty of asking you a question. How did you come there that day?"

I told him, and he was attentive until I had finished, and then burst out laughing again, and asked me if I was sore afterward? I didn't ask him if he was, for my conviction on that point was perfectly established.

"Mr. Jaggers is your guardian, I understand?" he went on.

"Yes."

"You know he is Miss Havisham's man of business and solicitor, and has her confidence when nobody else has?"

This was bringing me (I felt) toward dangerous ground. I answered with a constraint I made no attempt to disguise, that I had seen Mr. Jaggers in Miss Havisham's house on the very day of our combat, but never at any other time, and that I believed he had no recollection of having ever seen me there.

"He was so obliging as to suggest my father for your tutor, and he called on my father to propose it. Of course he knew about my father from his connection with Miss Havisham. My father is Miss Havisham's nephew; not that that implies familiar intercourse between them, for he is a bad courtier and will not propitiate her."

Herbert Pocket had a frank and easy way with him that was very taking. I had never seen any one then, and I have never seen any one since, who so strongly expressed to me, in every look and tone, a natural incapacity to do any thing secret or mean. There was something wonderfully hopeful about his general air, and something that at the same time whispered to me he would never be very successful or rich. I don't know how this was. I became imbued with the notion on that first occasion before we sat down to dinner, but I can not define by what means.

He was still a pale young gentleman, and had a certain conquered languor about him in the midst of his spirits and briskness that did not seem indicative of natural strength. He had not a handsome face, but it was better than handsome: being extremely amiable and cheerful. His figure was a little ungainly, as in the days when my knuckles had taken such liberties with it; but it looked as if it would always be light and young. Whether Mr. Trabb's local work would have sat more gracefully on him than on me, may be a question; but I am conscious that he carried off his rather old clothes much better than I carried off my new suit.

As he was so communicative, I felt that reserve on my part would be a bad return, unsuited to our years. I therefore told him my small story, and laid stress on my being forbidden to inquire who my benefactor was. I further mentioned that as I had been brought up a blacksmith in a country place, and knew very little of the ways of politeness, I would take it as a great kindness in him if he would give me a hint whenever he saw me at a loss or going wrong.

"With pleasure," said he, "though I venture to prophesy that you'll want very few hints. I dare say we shall be often together, and I should like to banish any needless restraint between us. Will you do me the favor to begin at once to call me by my Christian name, Herbert?"

I thanked him, and said I would. I informed him in exchange that my Christian name was Philip.

"I don't take to Philip," said he, smiling, "for it sounds like a moral boy out of the spelling-book, who was so lazy that he fell into a pond, or so fat that he couldn't see out of his eyes, or so avaricious that he locked up his cake till the mice ate it, or so determined to go birds'-nesting that he got himself eaten by bears who lived handy in the neighborhood. I tell you what I should like. We are so harmonious, and you have been a blacksmith—would you mind it?"

"I shouldn't mind any thing that you propose," I answered; "but I don't understand you."

"Would you mind Handel for a familiar name? There's a charming piece of music by Handel, called the Harmonious Blacksmith."

"I should like it very much."

"Then, my dear Handel," said he, turning round as the door opened, "here is the dinner, and I must beg of you to take the top of the table, because the dinner is of your providing."

This I would not hear of, so he took the top, and I faced him. It was a nice little dinner—seemed to me then a very Lord Mayor's Feast—and it acquired additional relish from being eaten under those independent circumstances, with no old people by, and with London all around us. This again was heightened by a certain gipsy character that set the banquet off: for while the table was, as Mr. Pumblechook might have said, the lap of luxury—being entirely furnished forth from the coffee-house—the circumjacent region of sitting-room was of a comparatively paperless and shifty character: imposing on the waiter the wandering habits of putting the covers on the floor (where he fell over them), the melted butter in the arm-chair, the bread on the bookshelves, the cheese in the coal-scuttle, and the boiled fowl into my bed in the next room—where I found much of its parsley and butter in a state of congelation when I retired for the night. All this made the feast delightful, and when the waiter was not there to watch me my pleasure was without alloy.

When we had made some progress in the dinner I reminded Herbert of his promise to tell me about Miss Havisham.

"True," he replied. "I'll redeem it at once. Let me introduce the topic, Handel, by mentioning that in London it is not the custom to put the knife in the mouth—for fear of accidents—and that while the fork is reserved for that use, it is not put further in than is necessary. It is scarcely worth mentioning, only it's as well to do as other people do. Also, the spoon is not generally used over-hand, but under. This has two advantages. You get at your mouth better (which after all is the object), and you save a good deal of the attitude of opening oysters, on the part of the right elbow."

"I HOPE YOUR MAMMA IS QUITE WELL!"

He offered these friendly suggestions in such a lively way that we both laughed, and I scarcely blushed.

"Now," he pursued, "concerning Miss Havisham. Miss Havisham, you must know, was a spoiled child. Her mother died when she was a baby, and her father denied her nothing. Her father was a country gentleman down in your part of the world, and was a brewer. I don't know why it should be a crack thing to be a brewer, but it is indisputable that which you can not possibly be genteel and bake, you may be as genteel as never was and brew. You see it every day."

"Yet a gentleman may not keep a publichouse; may he?" said I.

"Not on any account," returned Herbert; "but a public-house may keep a gentleman. Well! Mr. Havisham was very rich and very proud. So was his daughter."

"Miss Havisham was an only child?" I hazarded.

"Stop a moment. I am coming to that. No, she was not an only child; she had a half-brother. Her father privately married again—his cook, I rather think."

"I thought he was proud," said I.

"My good Handel, so he was. He married his second wife privately, because he was proud, and in course of time she died. When she was dead, I apprehend he first told his daughter what he had done, and then the son became a part of the family, residing in the house you are acquainted with. As the son grew a young man he turned out riotous, extravagant, undutiful—altogether bad. At last his father disinherited him; but he softened when he was dying, and left him well off, though not nearly so well off as Miss Havisham. Take another glass of wine, and excuse my mentioning that sum as a body does not expect one to be so strictly conscientious in emptying one's glass as to turn it bottom upward with the rim on one's nose."

I had been doing this, in an excess of attention to his recital. I handled him and apologized. He said, "Not at all," and resumed.

"Miss Havisham was now an heiress, and you may suppose was looked after as a great match. Her half-brother had nothing more means again, but what with debts and what with new madness wasted them most fearfully again. There were stronger differences between him and her than there had been between him and his father, and it is suspected that he cherished a deep and mortal grudge against her, as having influenced the father's will. Now I come to the cruel part of the story—merely breaking off, my dear Handel, to remark that a dinner-napkin will not go into a tumbler."

Why I was trying to pack mine into my tumbler I am wholly unable to say. I only know that I turned myself, with a perseverance worthy of a much better cause, making the most strenuous exertions to compress it within those limits. Again I laughed him and apologized, and again he said, in the cheerfulest manner, "Not at all, I am sure!" and resumed.

"There appeared upon the scene—say at the races, or the public balls, or any where else you like—a certain man, who made love to Miss Havisham. I never saw him, for this happened five-and-twenty years ago, before you and I were, Handel, but I have heard my father mention that he was a showy man, and the kind of man for the purpose. Now, I don't want to be, without ignorance or prejudice, mistaken for a gentleman, my father most strongly asseverates; because it is a principle with him that no man who was not a true gentleman at heart ever was, since the world began, a true gentleman in manner. He says no varnish can hide the grain of the wood; and the more varnish you put on the more the grain will express itself. Well! This man played Miss Havisham false, and my father professed to be devoted to her. I believe she had not shown much susceptibility up to that time; but all the susceptibility she had got centred on him, and she passionately loved him. There is no doubt that she perfectly idolized him. He practised on her affection in that systematic way, that he got great sums of money from her, and he induced her to buy her brother out of a share in the brewery (which had been weakly left him by his father) at an immense price, on the plea that when he was her husband he must hold and manage it all. Your guardian was not at that time in Miss Havisham's confidence, and she was too haughty and too much in love to be advised by any one. Her relations were poor and scheming, with the exception of my father; he was poor enough, but not time-serving or jealous. The only independent one among them, he warned her that she was doing too much for this man, and was placing herself too unreservedly in his power. She took the first opportunity of grossly ordering my father out of the house, in his presence, and my father has never been her since."

I thought of her having said, "Matthew will come and see me at last when I am laid dead upon that table;" and I asked Herbert whether his father ever came there after that.

"It's not that," said he, "but she charged him before her intended husband with being disappointed in the hope of favoring upon her for his own advancement, and, if he were to go to her now, it would look true—even to him—and even to her after all. To return to the man, and make an end of him. The marriage day was fixed, the wedding dresses were bought, the wedding guests were invited. The day came, but not the bridegroom. He wrote her a letter—"

"Which she received," I struck in, "when she was dressing for her marriage? at twenty minutes to nine?"

"At the hour and minute," said Herbert, nodding, "at which she afterward stopped all the clocks. What was in it, further than that it most heartlessly broke the marriage off, I can't tell you, because I don't know. Nobody else received from a bad illness that she had, she laid the whole place waste, as you have seen it, and she has never since looked upon the light of day."

"Is that all the story?" I asked, after considering it.

"All I know of it; and indeed I only know so much through piecing it out for myself; for my father always avoids it, and, even when Miss Havisham invited me to go there, told me no more of it than it was absolutely requisite I should understand. But I have forgotten one thing. It has been supposed that the man to whom she gave her misplaced confidence acted throughout in concert with her half-brother; that it was a conspiracy between them; and that they shared the profits."

"I wonder he didn't marry her and get all the property," said I.

"He may have been married already, and her cruel mortification may have been a part of her half-brother's scheme," said Herbert. "Mind! I don't form an opinion."

"What became of the two men?" I asked, after again considering the subject.

"They fell into deeper waste and degradation —if there can be deeper—and ruin."

"Are they alive now?"

"I don't know."

"You said just now that Estella was not related to Miss Havisham, but adopted. When adopted?"

Herbert shrugged his shoulders. "There has always been an Estella since I have heard of a Miss Havisham. I know no more. And now, Handel," said he, finally throwing off the story, as it were, "there is a perfectly open understanding between us. All that I know about Miss Havisham you know."

"And all that I know," I retorted, "you know."

"I fully believe it. So there can be no competition or perplexity between you and me. And as to the condition on which you hold your advancement in life, Handel, that you are not to inquire or discuss to whom you owe it—you may be very sure that it will never be encroached upon, or approached by me, or by any one belonging to me."

In truth, he said this with so much delicacy, that I felt the subject done with, even though I should be unable to fathom it either sooner or years to come. Yet he said it with so much meaning, too, that I felt he as perfectly understood Miss Havisham to be my benefactress as I understood the fact myself.

It had not occurred to me before that he had led up to the theme for the purpose of opening it out of our way; but we were so much the lighter and easier for having broached it, that I now perceived this to be the case. We were very gay and sociable, and I asked him, in the course of conversation, what he was? He replied, "A regular-bred commercial Sea-Ship." I suppose he saw me glancing about the room in search of some tokens of Shipping, or capital, for he added, "Look to the City."

I had grand ideas of the wealth and importance of Insurers of Ships in the City, and I began to think with awe of having laid a young insurer on the shelf. Herbert, intercepting my eye, and cut his responsible head open. But, again, there came upon me, for my relief, that old impression that Herbert Pocket would never be very successful or rich.

"I shall not rest satisfied with merely employing you in the Insurance office. I shall buy up some good Life Assurance shares, and cut into the Direction. I shall also do a little in the mining way. And, as these things will interfere with my chartering a few thousand tons on my own account. I think I shall trade," said he, leaning back in his chair, "to the East Indies, for silks, and spices, and indigo, and precious woods. It's an interesting trade."

"And the profits are large?" said I.

"Tremendous," said he.

I wavered again, and began to think here were greater expectations than my own.

"I think," he pursued, "that, on the whole, putting his thumbs in his waistcoat pockets, "to the West Indies, for sugar, tobacco, and rum. Also Ceylon, principally for elephants' tusks. Yes."

"You will want a good many ships," said I.

"A perfect fleet," said he.

Quite overpowered by the magnificence of these transactions, I asked him where the ships he insured mostly traded to at present?

"I haven't begun insuring yet," he replied. "I am looking about me."

Somehow, that pursuit seemed more in keeping with Barnard's Inn. I said (in a tone of conviction), "Ah-h!"

"Yes. I am in a counting-house, and looking about me."

"Is a counting-house profitable?" I asked.

"To—do you mean to the young fellow who's in it?" he asked, in reply.

"Yes; to you."

"Why, n-no: not to me." He said this with the air of one carefully reckoning up and striking a balance. "Not directly profitable. That is, it doesn't pay me any thing, and I have to keep myself."

This certainly had not a profitable appearance, and I shook my head as if I would imply that it would be difficult to lay by much accumulative capital from such a source of income.

"But the thing is," said Herbert Pocket, "that you look about you. That's the grand thing. You are in a counting-house, you know, and you look about you."

It struck me as a singular implication that you couldn't be out of a counting-house, you know, and look about you; but I silently deferred to his experience.

"Then the time comes," said Herbert, "when you see your opening. And you go in and you swoop upon it, and you make your capital, and then there you are! When you have once made your capital, you have nothing to do but employ it."

This was very like the way of conducting that encounter in the garden; very like. His manner of bearing his poverty, too, exactly corresponded to his manner of bearing that defeat. It seemed as if that head would fall and buffets now with just the same air as he had taken mine then. It was evident that he had nothing around him but the simplest necessaries, for every thing that I remarked upon turned out to have been sent in on my account from the coffee-house or tavern to-day.

Yet, having already made his fortune in his own mind, he was so unassuming with it that I felt quite gratified to think that not being puffed up. It was a pleasant addition to his naturally pleasant ways, and we got on famously. In the evening we went to the play, and I, at all hours

Various amendments were suggested, but none of them were acted upon. The Tariff Bill was then taken up, and the amendments made on Tuesday in Committee were read and adopted, including the one reducing the duty on sugar, and placing one on tea and coffee. The bill was finally passed, 25 to 14.——In the House, consideration of Mr. Stanton's Militia Bill was resumed, and Mr. Beck, of Virginia, made a speech in opposition to it, which occupied the morning hour. He considered the passage of the bill a foregone conclusion, and characterized it as a declaration of war. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, then addressed the House at considerable length,—the report of the Committee of Thirty-three being under consideration —urging a settlement of the national troubles by conciliation and compromise, and the House subsequently passed to a debate upon the Senate's amendments to the Navy Bill,—the only providing for the building of seven steamsloops of war occupying attention until the adjournment, and being finally agreed upon by a vote of 81 to 59. The debate was extremely interesting, several gentlemen from the Border States taking occasion during its progress to define their positions in reference to the question of the rights and property of secession, and avowing their unyielding fidelity to the Union.

On Thursday, 21st, in the Senate, Mr. Colfax's bill, providing for the discontinuance of the postal service in those districts where it is likely to be interfered with, was discussed by Senator Hunter of Virginia, Doolittle and Wilcoxin, Freeman of Maine, Douglas of Illinois, and Green of Missouri. Senator Hunter took the ground that if the seceded States were still to be considered as members of the Union, Congress had a right to cut off their postal facilities. He believed it would lead to using force against those States. Senator Douglas said that it was a measure of peace, and would tend to prevent collision. Senator Crittenden took the same ground as did Senators Douglas and Green. The bill was not finally disposed of, but gave way to the Miscellaneous appropriation bill, which in turn was postponed for an Executive Session, which continued until adjournment. The Senate had an evening session, and debated the Crittenden plan of adjusting the National difficulties.——In the House, a report was made from the Special Committee of five on the President's Message of the 8th of January, relative to the disposition of the vessels of the Navy so as to leave the whole Atlantic coast unprotected. They also reported a resolution of censure against the Secretary of the Navy for accepting, without inquiry, the resignation of those officers of the Navy who propose to take up arms against the General Government. Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee, gave notice that he should ask for a vote upon the resolution. The House then considered Mr. Stanton's Militia Bill, and Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, made a his speech, commenced on Wednesday. He was followed by Mr. Pendleton, of Michigan, and Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, and debated the Crittenden plan of adjusting the National difficulties.——In the House, a report was made from the Special Committee of five on the President's Message of the 8th of January, relative to the disposition of the vessels of the Navy so as to leave the whole Atlantic coast unprotected. THE DREAMER AT MO

ULTRIE—1776 AND 1861.

THE DREAMER AT MOULTRIE.

OWN artist has, we think, achieved a triumph in the picture which we give on the two preceding pages. It represents the dream of a soldier of the South Carolina Army now serving at Fort Moultrie—a dream resembling the memorable scene which has rendered the name of Moultrie famous throughout the world, and which is the brightest page in South Carolina history. Let us briefly recall the oft-told tale.

It was on the 4th June, 1776, that the British fleet, commanded by Sir Peter Parker, first appeared off the bar at Charleston. General Lee had just arrived at that city with a force of Northern men, who had been dispatched by General Washington to assist in its defense. The First South Carolina Regiment, under Colonel Gadsden, was at Fort Johnson; Colonel Moultrie commanded a body of volunteers in Fort Sullivan, since known as Fort Moultrie; Governor Rutledge had command in the city. Over three weeks were spent by the British in preparation for the attack. At length, on 28th June, at 10.30 A.M., Sir Peter Parker hoisted the signal of attack on board his flag-ship, the Bristol. The whole fleet sailed in, took up a position off the end of Sullivan's Island, and commenced firing on the fort. We need hardly explain that Fort Sullivan had not been built; had it been in existence no fleet could have occupied the position then taken by the British.

The fire of the ships was warmly returned by 30 guns in Fort Sullivan, and the garrison, having better shelter than the crews of the ships, suffered less from the British fire. In the meantime, while General Clinton had landed some 2000 troops on Long Island, and attempted to cross over to Sullivan's Island. In this design he was foiled by Colonel Thomson with a large body of riflemen and a few heavy guns commanded the passage, and drove back the British every time they made their appearance with terrible loss.

From eleven in the morning till nine in the evening the battle thus raged, almost without intermission. About that hour the fire from Fort Sullivan never slackened, and it was not till then that the British fleet, sadly cut up and mastless, slipped their cables and sheered off out of range. They had gained nothing by their enterprise except the loss of a large number of good officers and men, while to the American victory was of signal value.

The incident represented by our artist occurred in the middle of the action. As the fire became hot, a shot struck the British ship and cut the flag which waved upon the western bastion of Fort Sullivan. Jasper leaped upon the parapet, walked, the whole length of the fort, picked up the flag, and in the midst of the fire, and in sight of the fort and the ships, fixed the flag firmly on the bastion. He then ascended to the parapet, and leaped back unhurt to his place.

It will be noticed that our artist depicts Colonel Moultrie in the group defending the Fort. The likeness is a very good one.

MY AUNT MARCIA.

MY Aunt Marcia was the bravest woman I ever knew; if she would consent to use a spy that she should have been obscured by the position of private gentlewoman which fell to her share in the deal of life. But she would not come out so grandly as a Pucelle d'Orleans, or Charlotte Corday, or Grace Darling, or any other of those few heroic women who have had the chance that the rest of us have only sighed for.

In support of my proposition, let me repeat a few of the circumstances concerning this beloved aunt, with which my feverish childhood could always be regulled when every other amusement failed.

Left an orphan at seventeen by the death of the mother to whom she was tenderly attached, and whose illness had been ameliorated by her unremitting care and affection, my aunt received an invitation to spend the winter with her old uncle and aunt, proprietors of a lonely country house in the wilds of New Jersey.

The invitation was accepted, and in the sombre twilight of a November day my aunt, wearied and sad, entered the doors of the gloomy old house.

Entering, she was shown at once to her apartment, a large and lonely room in an unoccupied wing of the great house; the fire-place was filled with wood of the purest kind most artistically arranged, but apparently the merry flame dared not encounter the terrors of the unexplored regions lying so black and silent in the great stone chimney above, and resolutely turning back to seek sweet companionship, filled the whole room with smoke.

My aunt threw a window out, after breathing at it for a moment, seized the tongs, and with some little effort convinced the cowardly fire that his safest course lay in advance, and the flames rallying for a united effort soared victoriously into the heart of the black regions above.

The window then requested that an excuse for her non-appearance for dinner on the score of excessive fatigue might be offered to her hostess, and that a cup of tea and her own mild might be sent to her.

The housekeeper withdrew, and in a few moments the tea appeared, borne by Phyllis.

Phyllis had nursed my aunt in infancy, had shared with her the wearing labors of my grandmother's last illness, and had left all other ties to follow her nursling to her new home. In compensation for this devotion she did women's duty, and was allowed, unusual liberty of speech and action.

"Oh, Miss Marsy," began she the moment she had placed her tray upon a little stand at her mistress's elbow, and began to unpack the traveling bag, "does yer know, chile, whose room dis yere be?"

"Mine while I stay, isn't it, Phyllis?"

"I dunno 'bout dat, honey. Dem as has got it isn't such as will gib it up easy, nor dey isn't such as you'll want for company."

"What in the world are you talking of, Phyllis? Who claims the room besides me?"

"De ghosteses, Miss Marsy!" whispered Phyllis sententiously, falling back as she spoke, to note the expression of her auditor's face.

"Ah, it is a haunted chamber, is it?" laughed my Aunt Marcia. "And what ghost in particular is likely to dispute possession with me?"

"Dere ain't nuffin to laugh 'bout, chile," exclaimed the old nurse, somewhat offended at her mistress's obvious incredulity.

"Dey 've been h'ard to you Grandpa Young, an' dat yer closet am de place where he cut he throat, an' lef' de blood run all ober de letter he wrote 'on to his grandson to tell her 'bout de heap o' money he done los' at de cards; and ebery night—mark you dat, honey—you Grandpa Young am afore de room, an' he writes an' writes an' dat yer letter will de blood alluz a streamin' out ob he throat ober de paper; an' do more he write de more de letter ain't done, an' nebber will be done, 'cause—"

"Hush, Phyllis! I don't wish to hear any such stuff, and I should think you would know better than to repeat such a story to the grand-daughter of that unhappy man. Good-night! I don't want any thing more."

"Lawx me, Miss Marsy, honey! don' you go an' be mad wid ole Phyllis jes' fer tryin' to keep you from gettin' scar'."

"No, indeed, Phyllis. I'm not angry in the least," returned the easily mollified young girl. "But I am very tired and sleepy, and want to go to bed and don't intend to remain awake till you are gone."

"An' you done go'n' fer to sleep in dis yer room, Miss Marsy!"

"Certainly. There—good-night!"

And without quite knowing how it had been accomplished, Phyllis found herself standing outside her mistress's room, with the door locked behind her.

To bed my Aunt Marcia went, and to sleep, but was awakened by a sound in the night by a sort of nightmare, in which she beheld her Grandfather Young standing beside her, holding in one hand a half-written sheet of paper, and in the other a curious old hunting-knife, with which he made desperate attempts to cut the throat of his innocent descendant.

My aunt started upright in her bed, and looked about the chamber.

All was quiet; and with a chill of skin as of contempt at her vapors now, she was about to sink back and compose herself again to sleep, when a faint noise arrested her attention.

Listening intently, she soon determined that the sounds originated in the closet pointed out by old Phyllis, and resembled closely the scratching passage of a half quill pen over stiff paper, varied at intervals by a rustling noise, as if the paper had been turned and folded back.

My aunt listened to these sounds during what appeared to her a long interval, and afterward confessed that she thought more than once of the unfinished letter left by her Grandfather Young, and of Phyllis's tale of the nightly attempts of his ghost to complete the melancholy rehearsal of his own misdeeds.

The more she listened, and the more she thought, the stronger grew a cowardly inclination to lie down, and, pulling the bed-clothes over her head, shut out alike every disagreeable thing, real or imaginories; but just as this inclination reached its height my Aunt Marcia threw back the bed-clothes and resolutely sprang out of bed.

"I really believe I was getting frightened," said she to herself, as, putting on her dressing-gown and slippers, she crept close to the closet-door and bent down to listen at the keyhole.

Certainly the sounds came from within that door, and a nearer approach only confirmed her first idea of their nature.

My aunt hesitated a moment, and then, clenching her fists hard, pounded menacingly upon the door, saying,

"Away with you, whatever you are!"

The noise ceased; but something within that door, directly opposite my aunt's hand, pounded a response!

Knock for knock a mocking echo returned, only with sharper blows than my aunt's, more like the bony knuckles of an old man's hand, perhaps.

I've stopped your writing, at any rate," muttered my aunt, with a spice of malice even in her civil enough to open the door when a visitor knocks, I will do it for myself."

So, first lighting a candle and stirring the fire to a blaze, the undaunted girl looked about for means of fulfilling her threat.

The door was locked and the key gone; but the vigorous search soon discovered it buried in dust on the top of the door-casing, and in another minute my aunt threw open the door closed since fifty years before.

As she did so an old pistol, hanging by its lock to a nail driven into the door, fell down at her feet.

My aunt picked up the thing it again upon the nail, and gently shook the door.

"O—h! it was you that knocked, was it?" said she, gayly; and then, with a little start, she raised her head, she advanced a step or two, and looked scrutinizingly around the place.

It was a little room, with a fire-place at one end and a window at the other.

In the middle stood a great arm-chair, beside a table littered with papers, apparently the former contents of a writing-desk which lay open beside them, still containing a few old letters, receipts, and the like. My aunt bent curiously to look at them, the papers in the desk rustled vehemently, as if stirred by an invisible hand. Seizing an old quill pen from the great pen-over-inkstand, where it stood like a ruined light-house beside an empty sea, she began tossing out the papers, and soon discovered the cause of the disturbance in the shape of a nest of very young mice, whose mother had probably deserted them at the opening of the door.

My aunt stood a few moments looking fixedly at the little creatures, who blinked back at her with their black, bead-like eyes.

"Yes, yes, my dears," said she, at length, "I see it all now. It was you, snuggling about in your paper bed, that made the rustling, and your mamma's little feet pattering over these letters on the table that did the writing. I'll see you again to-morrow, but now good-night."

With these words my Aunt Marcia shut the closet door, blew out her candle, got into bed and went directly to sleep, nor did she wake again till Phyllis and the sunshine invaded her chamber together.

That very morning the unfortunate mice were expelled from their snug quarters, the papers were locked up in the old desk and banished to the garret, the table and chair sent after them, and the little room with much scrubbing, dusting, carpeting, and curtaining, converted into a pretty dressing-closet, before whose cozy fire my aunt seated herself that night, while Phyllis, brushing her young mistress's long hair, expatiated on the courage she had shown in laying "de ghose o' Grandpa Young."

It was but a few nights after this, however, that my aunt was again awakened by a very peculiar sound, and one still more alarming in its nature than the ghostly pen scratching.

It proceeded apparently from the huge unlibbed garret, and seemed near the spot directly over my aunt's chamber, where the contents of the dressing-room had been stowed; but no noise could ever have occasioned the startling combination of sound which in the middle of the night had roused my aunt from sleep.

First was heard a harsh, grating noise, like the passage of some heavy substance over a rough surface—then the clicking of a door—then a violent fall, accompanied by a wild, shrill cry of pain—and then a pause of a few seconds—after which the whole was repeated in exact routine.

My aunt listened to all this for some time, and then determined to investigate the matter.

Her first step was to summon the assistance of the servants, but with her hand upon the bell she paused.

"They will only be frightened to death, and won't help me a bit," said she to herself. "I will go up alone."

A few minutes after my aunt stood in the great, dismal garret, looking and listening for the midnight disturber of her slumbers.

A low cluaking of the chain directed her to the spot where lay the old desk, and in a moment the mystery lay unraveled before her.

The garret, like many others in old country houses, was floored with rough boards, while at the sides the great beams lay bare, divided by the lath and plaster of the ceilings below.

Upon one of these beams, the "boy" of the establishment, had set a musk-rat trap with its chain attached, first baiting it with cheese, in the hope of catching one of the rats whose nightly revels disturbed his slumbers in a little room partitioned off the end of the garret.

The experiment succeeded, much to the discomfiture of a patriarchal rat who had ventured into the trap, nibbled at the cheese, and, becoming suspicious, had turned to fly, when the trap springing had caught him firmly by the tail.

Then commenced for the poor fellow that painful journey, probably toward his home, whose éclat had roused my aunt.

First, he dragged the trap across the ridges of plaster—then climbed with it the next beam, while his chain drew the mouse across the intervening space—then traversing the beam he plunged down the opposite side dragging trap, chain, and all after him—and then he commenced the whole anew already suffering as to elicit the shrill cry of pain, and necessitate the succeeding pause before recommencing his journey.

"Poor fellow!" said my aunt, softly, as with might and main she forced open the trap and set free the luckless captive, who sprang away without a "Thank you."

I am not now writing my Aunt Marcia's biography, but only trying to prove the assertion of her bravery which I made above. I must therefore pass over the romantic incidents attending her courtship and marriage, and merely state that four years after the latter event she returned she had become the wife of a lawyer of considerable eminence, and the mistress of the gloomy old Grange, where her uncle and aunt had died, her uncle and aunt, remained as their adopted daughter, and finally as their heiress assumed her present position.

Mr. Lloyd was a widower, and was much away from home attending the sessions of the Circuit Court, and transacting legal business in the cities of the neighboring United States. My aunt was thus left very much alone.

It was during one of these absences of Mr. Apthorpe that his wife sat in her summer parlor, with doors and windows all open, busily engaged in sewing.

She was very light-hearted that morning, and hummed a merry tune as she bent over her work; for she was thinking of the coming time when she should no longer be alone during her husband's absence, but in the enjoyment of one who so busily stitching—one of many destined to adorn the expected guest.

The tune which was set, and the last notes of the song were trilling over the lips of the happy young wife, when a long shadow fell athwart the sunshine at her feet—a tall white face, framed in black elf-locks, was thrust over her shoulder, and stared with a malicious grin full into her eyes.

"Did you expect to see Sibley?" asked the white lips in a hissing whisper.

My aunt had heard of Peter Sibley, and the whole of his black story flashed across her mind. He was a ruffian who, the year before, had stolen into a house in a neighboring town, found a woman sitting alone at her work, and had brutally murdered her before robbing the house of the rich booty it contained.

He had been captured some months after, tried, and condemned, and was at that moment confined in the jail at Trenton, awaiting the day of his execution.

My Aunt Marcia felt this story, but had not time to think it, before she moved her chair half round so as to face the intruder, and fixing her eyes calmly upon him, said, steadily,

"Yes, I have heard of Peter Sibley. Are you he?"

"No, I'm his brother. One was taken, and the other was left—the other was left," muttered the stranger, hiding behind him something, which my aunt felt sure was a very sharp hunting-knife she had used that morning in trimming her rose-bushes and left upon the veranda.

She moved her chair again, so as to face her visitor more fully; for as he spoke he had edged round toward her back.

"Why is it you didn't you run, Aunt Marcia?" asked I once at this point in the story.

"For several reasons, my dear. One was, that I never had run away from any thing, and did not like to put in the habit; another was, that I felt sure the moment I showed the least cowardice that hatchet would be buried in my brain; and the third was that, though not in the least frightened, I felt a little giddy, and could not rely upon myself to stand up with that dignity which I should wish to preserve in such company."

"Why in the world didn't you run, Aunt Marcia?" asked I once at this point in the story.

"For several reasons, my dear. One was, that I never had run away from any thing, and did not like to put in the habit; another was, that I felt sure the moment I showed the least cowardice that hatchet would be buried in my brain; and the third was that, though not in the least frightened, I felt a little giddy, and could not rely upon myself to stand up with that dignity which I should wish to preserve in such company."

So my aunt sat still, and tried to hold the stranger's eyes with hers: but this she found impossible; and in the midst of many glances she read a confirmation of the suspicion of his sanity, which had already crossed her mind.

This suspicion had hardly crossed my aunt's mind before she determined to act upon it, and, assuming the authoritative manner most likely to impress him, she exclaimed, sternly—

"If you are his brother, why don't you carry him the governor's pardon, that has been waiting this week and more for a messenger?"

"Pardon—pardon for Peter Sibley—oh yes, he'll be pardoned, and then he can come out and go along with me and the other women. Where is the pardon? Give it to me."

"It isn't here," said my aunt, sharply. "You ought to know that such papers are not left in the care of women. My husband is a lawyer, and he has it down at his office in the village—down that way."

"Yes, yes, the lawyers keep the papers—the lawyer's got the pardon. I'll go carry it, and then Peter Sibley and I will come and see you together."

With a cunning laugh the maniac darted from the room, and a moment after my aunt saw him running at full speed in the direction of the village.

Half an hour later two keepers called at the house to inquire for the fugitive. They were shown first to the room where he had sat, a new piece of sewing in her hand and a quiet serenity upon her brow.

She received them graciously, and in answer to their inquiries briefly related her interview with the lunatic, then showed them out with as dignified a composure as if that terrible episode in her morning's occupation had not occurred.

Before night the poor madman (who, by-the-way, was not in the least related to Peter Sibley) was safely again in custody, and my aunt never heard of him again.

A few months elapsed and Mrs. Apthorpe was ill in bed, with the little expected stranger beside her.

It was cold weather now, and her lodging had been changed from the cozy old state to the sunny bedroom below, where her old uncle and aunt had always slept, and where they had died within a week of each other.

Opposite the foot of my aunt's bed a door opened into the sitting-room; opposite this again was a door between the sitting-room and the large hall, with the great front door at the end of it, still in the same line of vision.

But in this cold November night, at half past twelve o'clock, all the doors were shut, though none of them were locked, and my Aunt Marcia lay awake feeling very sorrowful, for her poor old Phyllis was dying in her slave-state, and she was unable to go and bid her faithful old friend and servant good-by.

She had, however, sent the skillful nurse from her own bedside, with directions not to leave Phyllis while she remained alive. Refusing to allow any of the servants to stay beside her, my aunt remained alone, waiting for news of her humble friend's last moments.

Suddenly, while still strained attention she lay listening for any sound in the silent house, she distinctly heard the great brass latch of the outer door slowly raised, and the door swing open, striking the wall behind.

No footfall followed; but a moment after the latch of the sitting-room slowly moved, and that door in turn swung open.

My aunt listened with intense earnestness. Surely not the lightest footstep crossed the floor of the sitting-room, but the latch of her own door moved, rose slowly, descended, and the door swinging noiselessly open, showed through the dark vista of the hall the front door at the other end.

By the flickering firelight my aunt could plainly see the vacant door-way; could see so far into the darkness beyond as to feel sure that no human hand had unclosed those doors.

"Who is there?" asked she, after an expectant pause.

No response.

"Phyllis, is that you come to bid me good-by? If so, let me see you or hear you speak!" said she again, for my aunt, though utterly fearless, was a firm believer in supernatural appearances.

But her appeal remained unanswered; and after a pause she repeated, impatiently,

"Who's there? Speak! or close the doors and go away!"

"Me-e-w!" replied a gentle voice, as Minnie, the white cat, leaped upon the bed and lay down at her mistress's feet.

Half an hour later, when the nurse stole down to see how her charge was faring, she found my aunt, the baby, and the cat all fast asleep, with the chill December air whistling through the room, for my aunt had refrained from ringing for any one to close the doors, lest she should disturb the last moments of her dying servant.

It was not till the next day that my aunt learned, through the nurse's inquiries in the kitchen, that Minnie had been in the habit of opening the doors (unless the outer one was bolted) by jumping up, putting one paw through the bow, and the other on the thumb-piece of the latch, and then dropping down and leaving the door to swing open of its own accord, or, if necessary, giving it an impetus by repeating her body into the crack.

It was in this same bedroom, about a year later, that the last proof of my aunt's courage which I propose to relate took place.

My uncle had just returned from Newark, bringing with him a large sum of money, the proceeds of several heavy bills intrusted to him for collection by a client in a neighboring town, who was to call and receive his money on the following day. Meanwhile it was lodged in a secretary standing in the bedroom.

After tea, on the evening of his return, Mr. Apthorpe, having some letters to write, went down to his office, leaving his wife in the sitting-room, singing her baby to sleep.

This pleasant duty accomplished, she stepped softly into the bedroom, and laying the little boy in his crib, drew the coverings over him. But the night was cold, and the mother tenderly fancied her darling not warm enough, so went to the large clothes-press opening into her bedroom for an additional blanket.

This she found had been placed upon a high shelf, and in the effort to reach it she unconsciously grasped a long cloak hanging near with such force as to bring it to the floor.

Carrying out the blanket and spreading it over her boy, my aunt returned to pick up the cloak, and in stooping to do this saw, just beside her the foot and part of the leg of a man whose head and body were still concealed by the garments hanging on the wall, although his arm had been so far unceremonially jerked by the fall of the cloak as to lead to his discovery.

My aunt confessed that for a moment her heart stood still, and the song she had been murmuring died upon her lips; but by the time she had regained her feet she was able to account for the pause by saying, peevishly, aloud,

"There, now, the loop is broken, and I can't hang it up again."

Then, throwing the cloak upon a chest close by, she went carelessly out, leaving the closet door a little ajar.

Standing beside her baby's crib, her back to the door lest the robber should read her face, my aunt considered her position.

My uncle had told her not to expect him home till near midnight. Isaac, the house-boy, had gone to the village on an errand. The nurse had received permission to spend the evening with a friend, and no one remained within except herself and the cook, lousy in the distant kitchen.

It would have been easy for the man to snatch the baby from his crib and rush out of the house, leaving the robber to quietly collect his booty and escape before she could send any one to prevent him; but this course did not satisfy her.

She preferred to remain and guard the property intrusted to her husband's care, even at some risk to her own life.

She, however, considered that the robber, knowing the unprotected state of the house, might reasonably argue, if she remained alone, that he should run less risk in murdering her, completing his robbery, and escaping before her husband's return, than in waiting for night, when his operations, however carefully carried on, would be liable to arouse Mr. Apthorpe.

Just as my Aunt Marcia reached this point in her argument the baby stirred uneasily, and partially awoke.

Bending over the crib his mother began rocking vehemently, and singing the very same song so abruptly broken off a few minutes before. But though she sang, and though she rocked, the baby grew more and more uneasy; for his mother, while apparently trying in every way to pacify him, was in reality exerting every quiet means in her power to arouse him, until at last the little fellow, thoroughly awake, began screaming lustily.

"Poor little darling," said the well-pleased mother, lifting him out of his crib, "does his little stomach ache? Mamma is sure it does, or he never would cry so loud. He shall have a bath."

Stepping to the bell she pulled it gently, and when the cook appeared, said, calmly,

"Molly, I am afraid the baby is very sick. Bring up some hot water for a bath, as quickly as you can."

"Yes, Ma'am," replied the unsuspicious Molly; and in a few minutes mistress and maid had Master Herbert in the water, rubbing and scrubbing him vigorously, while the poor little boy, tired, sleepy, and vexed, repaid their exertions by redoubled screams.

"How come in yet?" asked my aunt, carelessly, as Molly at last took the baby out of his bath and laid him on his mother's lap.

"Not yet, Ma'am; but it is nine o'clock, he won't be out much longer."

"I shall send him to the doctor's for some medicine as soon as he does come," remarked my aunt. "The poor child needs something very much."

"Sha'n't I try to put him asleep, Ma'am—you must be very tired?" asked Molly, longing to escape to the kitchen.

"Yes, Molly, I wish you would," said my aunt, who knew full well that nothing would be surer to keep Master Herbert awake than placing him in unaccustomed hands.

So Molly walked and sung, the baby cried and fretted, and my aunt enacted steadily the part she had set herself, until clumping feet upon the garden-walk, and the hanging of the back door announced the return of the lady.

"There is Isaac, Molly," said my aunt. "Call him into the sitting-room, while I write a note to the doctor for what I want."

The cook left the room, and presently returned with Isaac, who stood beside the door while his mistress hurriedly wrote.

"There is a man hiding in my closet, close beside the linen chest. Bring help, and come quickly, for God's sake.

"MARCIA."

"There, Isaac, take this to Doctor Winslow, and wait for the answer. He is to go out, you said my aunt, in a clear distinct voice; and as the boy left the room she turned carelessly into the bedroom. The next moment, however, she said, quickly,

"There, I didn't give him any money, and Mr. Apthorpe hates to have bills brought in for these little things."

"Won't I run after him, Ma'am?" asked Molly, offering her the baby.

"No, I'll go—he hasn't left the house," said my aunt, hurrying out.

Isaac indeed was but just opening the back door, when, to his great bewilderment, his mistress overtaking him grasped him fiercely by the arm, and said, sternly,

"Isaac, my life and that of others, depends upon your speed and faithfulness. Take that note to your master as quickly as you can reach him—ask him to read it immediately, and then wait for his orders. If he is not at his office, go to Mr. Benson's or Mr. Pierce's, and ask one of them to read it. Go now—run!"

"There, Molly, you may give me the baby now," said my aunt, cheerfully, as she re-entered the bedroom. You may retire to the kitchen again, and pick up these things about the room."

Little Herbert, soothed in his mother's arms, soon fell asleep, and Master Molly had completed the multifarious tasks assigned her by her mistress, the front door opened sharply, and a moment after, Mr. Apthorpe, followed by two of his friends, appeared at the door of the bedroom, and received a nod from my aunt, proceeded without a word to the closet, from whence, after a momentary scuffle and the harmless discharge of the robber's pistol, they dragged a great black-headed ruffian, who scowled defiance on all around, but chiefly on my aunt, whose agency in his capture he evidently suspected.

"Yes, my man," said my Aunt Marcia, coolly answering his unuttered thought, "it was my eye that saw you when I came into the closet to pick up the cloak. If you had been wise you would have killed me then, secured the money, and made off at once."

P'raps so; but folks doesn't allus know wots for their own good," returned the fellow, sullenly, as he was led away.

Here I will pause, not for lack of material, for anecdotes of my Aunt Marcia might be multiplied almost ad infinitum, embracing every period of life, from her earliest childhood to the kindly old age, which has not yet, thank God! found its limit.

But I refrain: for enough has been said to prove my proposition, if it be capable of proof; and I end as I began, with the simple assertion that my Aunt Marcia stands at the head of all the brave women whom I ever knew.

SNAKE STORIES.

IT was some weeks before snakes creeped again into my thoughts. At this time I was in the luxurious library of a New York magnate, in a house whose splendor literally blazed in comparison with the starved, impoverished palaces of Genoa, Rome, or Venice. I was in the strigling world, and was with a man at whose bidding the winged messages of to Europe and back to Stock Exchange couriers flew "du Pérou jusqu'a Rome." There were bronzes on the buffet, and golden clocks to "tick off" Time's second.

My friend Mr. Vanderpump—for he was a Dutch merchant born in a quaint Spanish house in Amsterdam—Vanderpump, as he talked to me of snakes, lay in a long red and blue hammock made of aloe, thread netted by an Indian of Guatemala, with one leg not unnecessarily thrown over its margin—Vanderpump, smoking one of those fairy Trichinopoly cheroots which have ventilating straws inserted through their centres—harangued me pleasantly about certain golden gold snakes of the Spaniards, which it would take no great time, he said, by dint of Indian tradition, to rediscover from the subject he wandered, by many pleasant, devious by-paths of converse, to the subject of certain snakes of enormous size supposed to exist in "farm"—small lakes among a certain range of mountains in South America.

I roused up at this, and prepared to listen. Vanderpump then—still lazily smoking his cheroot, which, stretching from either wall, dropped down, and swung within two or three feet of the ground—drew around him a few colored cotton cloths over him as if for warmth, and prepared to pour out upon me his "winged words."

He told me that travellers and hunters had assured him that they had seen these enormous snakes. They were twice as large as boa constrictors, and were generally discerned bathing themselves in the mountain lakes in which it was supposed they came to feed on the fish. They had, however, never yet been killed or found dead, nor was it known on what they usually fed, or where they lived. He (Vanderpump), being a liberal in science as in politics, saw no reason to doubt that a few pairs of these enormous Pythonic race of serpents might still be existing among those rarely-trodden mountains. Races of animals had died out of particular countries in our own time. The dodo was an instance. Even in the sea-serpent many sensible people retained a belief.

If the boa constrictor, that can battle with a buffalo or an alligator, and swallow a deer, antlers and all, were to become extinct to-day, to-morrow, but for printed records, there would be people found to deny that such a monster had ever existed. Because a certain creature had not yet been classified by stay-at-home zoologists, that was no proof, he urged, it did not exist. The mammoth was wonderful, and its skeleton had been found; whereas the backbone of a large snake presents little resistance to the violent extremes of South American climate.

I asked Vanderpump, who I knew had dabbled in medicine, whether, in the course of his South American travels, he had tried to discover new and valuable drugs, and, above all, any specific for snake bites?

He said, oscillating himself with lazy grandeur, that he had; he had several times in Nicaragua and Guatemala been on the brink of great discoveries. He had once been presented with an herb, which the negroes told him was a certain cure for small-pox, but he tried it on one of his own Spanish servants who was ill, and it proved useless. He had also seemed a remedy only to the Indian constitution and in the Indian climate. There was, however, one pulverized herb which the peons used as snuff in cases of low fever, by which he had himself been cured when dangerously ill. Yet he had tried in vain to obtain a specimen of it; all offers of money were refused. They would not even gather it, except at night, for fear of being seen.

"And why all this precaution, this dog-in-the-manger caution in?"

Because the Indians said that when the white man used one of their medicines it lost all its virtue. It had the same effect as that with Peruvian bark. They were therefore determined to keep this wonderful diaphoretic and sudatory to themselves. They had gathered the herb and tree he could find in the neighborhood, yet in vain. In all his searches he never discovered a specific against snake bites. On the contrary, so much was a certain sort of snake dreaded there, that, if one was killed, all the people of the neighborhood came out and solemnly burn the body to ashes, for fear of any of the kind living.

Vanderpump then went on to tell me of his having been once bitten, on the bank of a river, by a snake that had been killed by a machete. But this bite ended with a mere slight inflammation, and he supposed that the virus must have been neutralized by the fluid, more likely, the aggressive snake was a harmless one.

I had not many snake stories of my own experience to exchange with Vanderpump in return; but what I had I told without broidery or lacework of imagination. I described how an eccentric English lady, a friend of mine, then a clergyman, and a conscientious man in both capacities, with whom I spent several pleasant summers, used to keep in her parlor, in a large glass case, a number of venomous round and round one morning, when one of them swallowed whole a large frog, which had been shut up with him for his consumption.

From that time I never looked into an account of a pretty peasant girl in Normandy whom I had seen twine live lizards lightly between the heavy hattress that was her head-gear, or where they glowed like coils of living emerald. I then (just as coffee came up like so much smoking incense) asked Vanderpump if he had ever true that travelling quacks made a living by killing rattlesnakes for their fat?

He had; it was indeed; that snake fat was excellent for sprains and bruises, and had been used in such cases, for centuries, by the Indians.

I then told him a story I had heard from Vanderpump, and I was on the Mississippi on the hurricane-deck of a first-class racing steamer; my feet on the rail, and covered with leaf lead to prevent the wood sparks chasing me. Above us and behind us rose the glazed tower of a pilot-house. I was seated on an arm-chair, side by side with my dear friend Thomas Vaughan, skipper of a California steamer. From this "cojon of vantage" we looked down on the brown turbid river, on the pelicans, and on the banks of Louisiana.

The crumbling banks of the great river were mere wrecks of fallen cotton-trees, and here and there were seen the white huts of the "poor white quarter" of a cotton plantation. On the long spit of the nearest sand-bar lay a putrid lump which had once been a buffalo, and, after killing over and fighting for it, were swarming masses of turkey buzzards.

Again our converse fell on snakes. Apropos of some remarks on the great floods which are almost periodical on this great fickle river, the captain, handling the wheel with his left eye on me, told me how once, during one of these great inundations that reach for miles, when all the stream was alive with drifts of timber, whole bunts of the "cypress quarter" of a cotton plantation. A LIFE STORY.

I.

In haste I call'd him the light word
That darken'd life forever;
My pallid face nor moved nor stirr'd—
His lips but one short quiver.
He gave me that long yearning look,
And spake: "If such I be"—
And all his frame a shudder shook—
"I am not fit for thee."

II.

We never met again—until
Long years had swept away:
His face was cold, and calm, and still—
My hair was tinged with gray.
Upon his arm a lady hung—
His voice was kind and free:
He did not know the blood-drops wrung
From my heart's agony.

III.

We met but once again—the day
On which my darling died.
His wife and child had pass'd away:
I bade farewell to pride.
We met—my face to his he drew—
He call'd me by my name;
And in his dying hour we knew
Our love had been the same.

THE MAZED FIDDLER.

"I CANOT to this place a man of thirty, and I am sixty now. When I came here, the prettiest girl for many a mile round was Mary Lee. You have seen our North Devon girls—dark eyes, dark hair, and ready speech? Mary had all this and she had more; she had the bearing of a born lady, so that, though our folks are plain and rough, no one ever dreamed of uttering a coarse jest before Mary Lee. Her father, a small farmer, had left her tolerably well to do; and the old maiden aunt with whom she lived had been to her a very mother. You will suppose that she had many lovers. In a manner she had; every lad in Coombetown felt a kind of pride in her; but she was 'grand-like'—there was something about her which rather awed than invited them, and only John Hamlyn had any reason to hope for her hand. He lives next door still—plain old sailor now, but in years gone by as fine and daring a fellow as breathed along the coast. Like Mary, he was sufficiently rich; that is, his father had owned two or three small coasters, and, dying, left them to his only son. Mary and he had grown up side by side, and always there was a quiet kind of affection between them. There was more than that, one wild winter morning when John was brought speechless and bleeding into the village, and Mary heard how, in the tempest of the night before, he had manned a boat, pushed off to a large brig that had struck upon the Tungle Rock in the offing, and saved the lives of some of her crew at the imminent peril of his own. A spar had struck him during his work, and there was a great ghastly wound in his head. Dr. Woodbury met the men as they slowly brought John Hamlyn up the steep path from the pier, and saw him carried to his house; and Mary, going home, knelt down beside her bed, burst into wild tears, then into prayers as wild, and felt, for the first time, as if she really loved the great strong sailor. He recovered slowly; some traces of the wound indeed remained, but he could have had, I think, no scars more glorious, and ere long he hoped to bring Mary home as his wife.

"Unfortunately for her, unfortunately for John there was a lad in the village who had genius, and, alas! who knew it. Willy Basset was but a poor young fisherman—not a strong one, not even a brave one; but one of singular parts. If I was too partial to him, and if my praise helped to turn his head and fill him with the demon of vanity, may God forgive me. I did all for the best. Suffice it, that whatever time he could steal from the drudgery of his daily life was given partly to the books I lent him, and partly to practicing upon an old violin which had belonged to his father, the village fiddler.

"John Hamlyn passed the cottage where he lived one day, and heard him playing. 'Willy Basset, lad,' cried the big curly-haired John, 'it seems to me you might spend your time better than in fiddling, with your poor old mother bed-ridden at home!' There's the herring-hawks off the bay, man, and the shoal will be 'round the head before you finish Bobbing Joan. Out to the boats, Willy!' Willy looked up, and was about to answer angrily; but John looked alarmingly big. Said Willy: 'It is very generous of you, John Hamlyn, to talk of my mother's poverty! You are richer than we, I know; but you need not remind us of it!' These were mean, false, cowardly words of his: but John—placable John—felt as if he had spoken too roughly, and held out his hand. Willy refused it, and turned away. From that hour, as I fear, he often thought how he could best injure the strong prosperous fellow who had reminded him of his duty.

"We are a musical race down here. Mary Lee had this passion almost to excess, and sung with singular sweetness. One evening, at my house, she had been singing some of her quaint old songs, when Willy Basset came up to return some of my books. He sat down, and I asked him to play a tune or two, as he often would when he came to see me. As yet he was but a poor player, though already he gave some faint promise of that wondrous skill to which he afterward attained. This night, whatever was his inspiration—and Mary Lee's dark eyes had surely much to do with it—he played as he never had before, with quite new passion and energy. The was indeed the first time on which I ever heard him improvise. Hitherto he had simply played the ordinary country tunes; to-night he struck boldly away from them, trusted to his own heart, and succeeded. Have I said that he was not handsome? At ordinary times he was not; but now, as his eyes lighted up with the excitement of his music, there was a wild beauty about them which, to a romantic girl, would have far more charm than ordinary comeliness. When he ended I asked Mary to sing—and behold, Mary was crying.

"It is the old story. What was John Hamlyn, plain and bluff, to this Willy Basset, so gifted and so passionate? Mary asked herself this question one of one who had been fiddling to please himself when he should have been fishing to help his mother; and I could not but feel that what they said was true.

"And now came a time which, to Mary, I think, was one of the purest happiness; but which brought pleasure less pure to Willy Basset, and absolute torture to the brave John. Willy—let me not be unjust to him—was thoroughly sincere in all his expressions of love; but there mingled with them always, I fear, a base sense of triumph over his richer, stronger, handsomer, manlier rival. And as for Mary, though the poor fellow blundered about in his big, uncouth, righteous way, still sang at his work, and never left a duty undone, yet was she assured sometimes with a deep and terrible grief as if he had testified threats by jumping over the cliffs—which often he was very much inclined to do—the struggle against the conviction as he might, he could not but see that Mary Lee, though she had ever a kindly word and a bright smile for him, no more intended to marry him than she intended, as we say, to fly. She went down all the poor fellow's card-castles, shattered by a fiddlestick. He was not imaginative, this big John; but he passed many pipe of evenings in the sanded kitchen of his old homestead, he had had his little visions of happiness and ease, the central figure in his reveries being that of Mary Lee. Well, that was over now. I don't pity him the less because he could not write a sonnet about his blighted hopes.

"In the April after his mother's death, Willy Basset, with his violin and with ten pounds in his pocket, sailed away. These were very small, and I could give him no more—sailed away in a ship that was bound to Naples. He went as a common sailor; but I had hopes that he chiefly wanted was to reach some land where he might obtain really good musical teaching; and, for my own part, I encouraged him in this scheme, wild as it might appear. An old friend of my own lived at Naples, and I recommended Willy to him as a youth of rare and brilliant promise. For, whether it was through skill in the fiddle, or whether it was through a mere ambitious desire to show his kinsfolk and his townsfolk that, if he was a humble fisherman, he was yet gifted with genius, certain it is that his genius had taken a rapid and sudden start, and that he would oftentimes play with really wonderful expression and power. So he went, Mary Lee, with little urging, had promised that if in a few years he came back in a position to maintain a wife she would be his.

"Letters came from Willy in due time—hopeful, eloquent letters. My friend at Naples was very kind to him, and treated him a master; and, at last, plain Willy Basset, ex-fisherboy, had a seat in the orchestra of an Italian opera. Mary was very brought of this, be sure; but when three years passed by, and he still said nothing of returning, she became uneasy. His letters grew less frequent. 'He has found new friends,' thought she, 'and forgets old Coombetown and folk.' Indeed, indeed, if she was sorely tried, yet was he as sorely tempted! I learned afterward that he had progressed in his art with startling rapidity; at last he became a celebrity; and you know, doubtless far better than I, to what seductions an artist is exposed in the south.

"Six years after his departure there came a letter from him which made Mary's face flush and glow again. He was coming home—successful, famous, rich. Home to his little Mary, 'whom the lovel better than any signora of them all.' Home to his 'dear old friend,' naming me with words far more flattering than I liked. Home to old Coombetown, 'where, perhaps, he would be rather more valued than formerly.' And so on: a vain egotistical letter, as I see now, but which made Mary's heart as light as a bird's. She had waited long, waited faithfully, but she had not waited in vain, it seemed. Was she not right in her choice?

"John Hamlyn? John Hamlyn was doing very well in the coasting-trade between Coombetown and Bristol.

"Willy Basset? He was a famous artist—and she would be an artist's wife.

"The artist reached home. He landed at Bristol, where he lodged almost all his money with a well-known banker, and thence posted on to the little Devonshire village with what speed he might. I do not attempt to describe his meeting with Mary Lee. I could tell of its gladness, of its vehement passion, but even as I speak the sad memory is with me of all those trials, all those afflictions, which so speedily followed this hour of intense delight. I found him changed—not altogether for the better. His face, though he came from the south, was very pale; his eyes, brilliant as ever, had now a light in them which was not that of cheerfulness and health; and in his whole bearing there was somewhat of ostentation, somewhat of affectation, which it pained me bitterly to see. Despite all this, he could be very fascinating when he chose, and the faults which I, a grave bookman, saw, were doubtless invisible to the girl who loved. John Hamlyn indeed conceived an utter loathing for him; but John had very strong provocation; for Willy now took it into his head to be jealous of John—jealous of the man whose lifelong princes he had ruined! and gradually John's relations with Mary Lee grew to be formal and constrained. It was hard for John to keep quiet under this: but Love, if it had worked wonderfully upon the artist, if it had tired and kindled him into genius, had tried John Hamlyn also in its magic crucible, and found him utterly pure; so that, rather than cause one tear, one shadow of anxiety to Mary Lee, he would even—keep away from her! He was very seldom at her house now, and Willy made his visits exceedingly trying to him. The time fixed for the marriage was now close at hand.

"John Hamlyn, returning from a coasting-voyage to Bristol, went home, smoked a huge pipe in the kitchen, and then, contrary to his wont, walked up to visit Mary Lee. He saw Willy Basset at a distance, leave the house, so he knew that Mary would be alone. The same evening Willy called to see me. He seemed overflowing with happiness; all the better part of him—and he had much that was very lovable—shone out. And oh, how he played! The future stretched before him so bright and so gay in its every aspect, that his music was as the warbling of an angel rejoicing over the beauty of the earth. He left me at last; but, excited by the conversation and the music, he could not go home to sleep. He walked on toward Mary's house, to wander round it, to dream about it, as lovers will. As he approached he saw a light in her window, though it was strangely late—and there was the shadow of a man upon the curtain! It stung him, this shadow, like a snake. With a cold biting jealousy at his heart, he crept into the darkness of the hedge and waited.

"Presently he heard the door open, and then a voice, which he knew to be John Hamlyn's, said: 'But she had been crying, he could tell that.' John's big form came out into the light. He walked slowly, silently up the hill. Silently, slowly, the artist followed him. God forgive the poor man if he meant to use a knife—I know he carried one; but, on the brow of the hill, John, turning, saw that he was followed, and marched back upon his follower. Even in the faint starlight he recognized Willy by his wide foreign cloak, and said, with a strange grave earnestness in his voice:

"'I have had news for you, Basset: I would rather you learned them from some one who is less hateful to you than I am—why, I can not tell—I never wronged you in any way.'

"Never tampered, I suppose, with my intended wife? Never tried to lure her away from me? Never came to her like a thief in the night? Never 'pitied the poor fiddler,' as one would pity a maimed cur?

"You are very hot about it, Basset—but you shall know all to-morrow morning."

"I insist, Sir, upon knowing all to-night—to-morrow you may be busy discharging your balls at the pier-head!"

"John felt the insult, but still, very stubbornly, very coldly held down the passion that was rising in him. Willy—for rage had blinded him—mistook this silence for timidity, and went on, rapidly, hauntingly, till at length John answered:

"'I went up to Mary Lee to-night, if you will have it, to tell her that Johnson, the Bristol banker, has absconded, and that you were a beggar!'

"With a hoarse shriek Bassat leaped upon him, and struck him in the face. And then, the suppressed rage of years concentrated into one single blow, John lifted his huge arm and beat him down. It was a terrible blow: the passionate artist lay stretched like a dead log upon the ground—senseless. Suddenly the moon shone out large and full. The light fell through the thick hedgerow trees, right upon Bassat's face. John knelt down, and saw that it was bloody—bloody. He groaned with shame, the big John, that he should have struck one so frail; but at last Bassat's eyes slowly opened, and John still knelt by his side, weeping like a babe.

"What made him leap up, and then stagger back, as if a bolt had struck him to the heart? This: as he knelt by the artist, and watched him return to consciousness, he expected to hear a curse from his lips: he heard, instead, a low, feeble, chuckling laugh. It was the laugh of an idiot. Willy Bassat was insane.

"Three months afterward I followed Mary Lee to her grave; and when the clamor and the noise of the affair had died away, John Hamlyn took the maid artist to his home, and has supported him ever since.

"Willy Bassat has lost all recollection of that terrible night. He wanders about alone, harmlessly, quietly: the villagers, who call him 'the Mazed Fiddler,' never molest him; and at times he will take his violin and play so sweetly and so well that the few strangers who visit Coombetown will hardly believe me when I tell them he is mad."

* * * * *

However feebly the old schoolmaster had told his tale, there had been something in it which had riveted the attention of his listener. As the evening closed in, the schoolmaster rose rising to light his lamp when he heard a tap at his door. In another minute John Hamlyn entered.

He said, softly:

"I have been down to the pier, Sir; the Sarah Jane has come in: and now I find that poor Bassat has left the house. I am come to look for him. Would you like to come with me, Sir? There's a willish look about the sky to-night, and I should not be left to have him caught in the storm that is rolling up."

"I suppose we shall find him in the churchyard?" said the schoolmaster.

"Most like, most like, Sir. I always notice that on nights like this he steals away there. Poor fellow! it can't be helped now, but I would rather lose my right hand than use it as I did one night!"

The schoolmaster sighed; and all three set out together for the church-yard.

As they passed at the little church-yard gate they heard the sound of the violin. Willy Bassat, standing by the grave of Mary Lee, was playing such a requiem as never yet musician has expressed in notes—a requiem of such depth of lamentation, such bitterness of regret, such vehemence of self-accusation, yet such overwhelming love and tenderness withal, that the three men almost wept as they listened: not one audible sound was heard save the magical tones with which the Mazed Fiddler mourned over his dead love. They did not dare to interrupt him: but as he left the music ceased; he walked toward them, staggering like a drunken man; and then, as he reached the gate, sank inwardly, fainting, on the ground. At that instant there was a peal of thunder in the east, which rolled on, crashing and reverberating as it rolled, till it seemed to break right above their heads; then for a minute utter silence; and then a blinding sheet of rain fell suddenly upon them. They lifted the Mazed Fiddler from the earth; John Hamlyn flinging off his rough jacket, wrapped Willy in it as a shelter from the rain; and they turned homeward. The rain still fell, but far away and far beyond the hill flashes of lightning leaped over the sea like swords.

"Make haste, for the love of God!" cried John, striding along with his burden as one who carried naught: "make haste! he is wet to the skin already—it will be the death of him!"

They reached his home and laid him gently in his bed. When the doctor came the artist was raving in his delirium. He said not a word now of Mary, nor word of John Hamlyn, his thoughts were away in the south.

"A poor fisher-boy, Signora!—Money, money, always money! I can help—I'll help the Red, then —I back the Red! For the eighth, ninth, tenth time, Red! Red it is!" he screamed, half starting out of his bed. "Do you have in my fortune, now?—In notes, I have no lackey to carry my gold for me—an artist, nothing more!"

Through the whole weary night, while the rain fell in torrents without, the three men watched beside him; but as it drew on toward morning, and the storm slowly and sullenly abated, he became much calmer. He slept an hour or two, and at daybreak turned to the old schoolmaster with a peculiar smile upon his face:

"You will give me my violin?" There were several in the room, his friend handed him the nearest. "Not that, not that! I played that at the San Carlo, when La Catarina sang so grandly: give me the old one—the one I had when a boy." He took it from the schoolmaster's hand and looked at it lovingly. Just then the morning light came full into the room, flooding it with its lustre. "I played it often enough, Sir, down among the rocks, when there was none to hear me but the merry sea-gulls. Ah! the beautiful light! The birds will be singing after the storm, and the lambs will be running in the meadows over the fresh wet grass. I loved to see them once, but I fear me, I fear me, that I'll never move from this bed till they carry me away to the gray old church-yard yonder, close by the dear old sea. And, well, I have had troubles enough, God knows! and I'm weary, weary, and I shall rest by her side at last!"

Was he mad now? He spoke softly, but there was a reason look in his eyes, and at times a cold, nervous trembling went right over him.

"Let him have his way, Sir," whispered John Hamlyn: "it is nearly over."

The artist played a few feeble notes upon his old violin, and then softly as he played with a bar or two of a simple country air. Crack!

It was but the snapping of a fiddle-string; but as it snapped his heart broke too. Another hour had passed away. The artist, with his lean, long hand still upon the instrument, had fallen back upon his pillow: and his friend Hamlyn, kneeling by the bed, and shaking terribly with the great strong sobs that seemed to be choking him, suddenly cried, "Lord! do not into temptation!" And not into temptation! but, O Lord, deliver us from evil!"

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

VERY conflicting and very mixed were my feelings as I set forth, alone. I had come well, very well, out of a trying emergency. I was neither driven to pretend I was something other than myself, nor to assume surroundings and illustrious belongings, nor had I masqueraded under a feigned name and a false history; but as Potts, son of Potts of Manchester, I had carried my head high and borne myself creditably.

"Magna est veritas," indeed! I am not so sure of the "prævalebit semper," but assuredly where it does succeed the success is wonderful.

Heaven knows what tortuous contrivements might my passion for the "imaginative"

—I like this name for it—have led me, had I given way to one of those fatal temptations. more than one of my flights have I found myself carried up into a region, and have had to sustain an atmosphere very unsuited to my respiration, and now, with the pure confidence of walking on the terra firma, and treading the common highway of life, I found I had reached my goal safely and prosperously. And what is assume to be shrubs, nor shrubs affect to be forest trees; the limestone and granite never pretend that they are gold and silver. And I would is real, and why should man alone be untruthful and unreal? If I liked these reflections, and tried to lose myself in them, it was in the hope of shutting out others less gratifying; but do what I would there before me arose the image of Catalina as the cause of all the ruin I inflicted—that stream which seemed to cut me off from one portion of my life, and make the past the irrevocably gone forever.

I am certain I was not right in parting with that girl. Any respectable man, a father of a family, would have applauded me for severing this dangerous connection, and have had some of such association except unhappiness? "Potts," would the biographer say—"Potts saw, with the unerring instinct of a high perception, that this young creature would one day or other have laid at his feet the burnt-offering of her heart and affections, and Potts have done? If Potts had been less endowed with genius, or less armed in honesty, he had not anticipated this peril, or, foreseeing, had undervalued it. But he both saw and feared it. How very differently had a libertine reasoned out this situation?" And then I thought how wicked I might have been—a monster of crime and atrocity. Every one knows the sensation of lying snugly and on a stormy night, when the rain plashes and the wind howls, drawing more closely around him the coverlet, and the selfish satisfaction of his own comfort, heightened by all the misery that is passing without his side. In the same benevolent spirit, but not by any means so reprehensible, is it pleasant to imagine one's self safe and secure, looking on from dock, to be stared at by a horror-struck public, photographed, shaved, prison consumed, exhorted, sentenced, and, lastly, just ag the last hangman has driven the last nail into the scaffold, and the great bell has tolled out, to find that you are sitting by the fireside, with the curtains closely drawn, your cment volume beside you, and your peculiar weakness, be it tea or sherry-cobbler, by your elbow. I am sometimes fain to "take stock" of myself in this fashion, and rarely a week goes over that I have not either poisoned a sister or had a shot at the queen. It is a sort of intellectual Russian bath, in which the luxury consists in the exaggerated alternative between being scalded first and rolled in the snow afterward. It was in this frame of mind I was now disposing myself, pleasantly and refreshingly, and yet remorse, like a surdy dun, stood at my gate, and refused to go away.

Had I treated her harshly? had I rejected the offer of her young and innocent heart? Very puzzling and embarrassing question this, and especially to a man who had nothing of the coxcomb in his nature—none of that prompting of self-love that would suggest a vain reply. I felt that it was very natural she should have been struck by the attractive features of my character, but I felt this without a particle of conceit. I even experienced a sense of sorrow as I thought over it, just as a conscientious siren might have regretted that Nature had endowed her with such a charming voice; and this duty—for it was a duty—discharged, I bethought me of my own future. I had a mission, which was to see Kate Herbert and give her Miss Crofton's letter. In doing so I must needs throw off all disguises and mockeries, and be Potts, the writer. Now as the nearest at, the man whose mere name was enough to suggest a vulgar life and a snob's nature! No matter what unlucky turn it may, I will do it manfully. She may never appreciate the world at large, may never appreciate what noble motives were hidden beneath the assumed nature, where costumes as they were to impart more vigor and persuasiveness to sentiments which, uttered in their wanderer's garb, would have carried no convictions with them. Play Macbeth in a paletot, perform Othello in "pegtops," and see what effect you will make. Well, my pretended station and rank were the mere goods and properties that gave force to my opinions. And now I began to speculate how I should be actor in the glarish light of the noonday and a shabby-genteel coat and hat! "I will do it," muttered I, "I will do it, but the suffering will be intense!" When the prisoner sentenced to a long captivity is no more addressed by his name but simply called No. 18 or 85, it is said that the shock comes to kill the sense of identity with him, and that nothing more tends to the stolid air of indifference, the hopeless inactivity of feature, the characteristic of a prison life; in the very same way am I affected when limited to my Potts nature, and condemned to confine myself within the narrow confines of that one small identity. From what Prince Max had said at the table d'hote at Bregenz, it was clear that Mrs. Herbert and her daughter learned I was not the young prince of the House of Orleans; but in being disabused of one error she seemed to have fallen into another, and believed me to explain that I was not a rope-dancer or a mountebank. "She too shall know me in my Potts nature," said I, "and shall recognize me in the 'majesty of myself.'" I was not very sure of what that was, but I found it in Hegel. And when I had accomplished this task, I will throw myself like a waif upon the waters of life. I will be that which the moment or the event shall make me—neither trammeled by the past nor awed by the future. I will take the world as the drama of a day. Were men to do this, what breadth and generosity would it impart to them! At all events, what ease and advancement that we narrow our faculties and imprison our natures. A man fancies he owns a palace and a demesne; he has a certain rent-roll from them, obliges him to maintain a certain state, live in a certain style, surrounded with certain observances, not always to his perhaps native liking, but to which he must conform. Not so with him. It is the poor man who comes to visit and gaze on his splendors who really enjoys them; for unfettered and undistracted by interference—not to say that in his heart are no corroding jealousies of some other rich man, who has a finer park than Chatsworth or Rubens. Instead, besides, of owning one palace and one garden, it is the universe he owns: the vast savanna is his race-ground; Niagara his own private cascade.

My heart bounded with these buoyant fancies, and I stepped out briskly on my road. Now that I had got rid of my property to myself, I felt very light-hearted and gay. So long as a man is struggling for place and pre-eminence in life, how can he be otherwise? Are even gracious? Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's ox, says the commandment; but surely it must have been to some meddling fool of a Moses, and if you have striven for it, it is likely that you have coveted it. Now, I will covet nothing—positively nothing—and I will see if in this noble spirit there will not be a reward proportionately ample and splendid.

My road led through that wild and somewhat dreary valley by which the Upper Rhine descends, fed by many an Alpine stream and torrent, to enter the Boden plain of Germany. It was a desolate expanse of shingle, with here and there little patches of ooh scrub, or, at rare intervals, small clusters of village—though how built, or for whom, it was hard to say, since not a trace of inhabitant could be seen, far or wide. Deep fissures, the course of many a mountain-stream, cut the road at places, and through these the foot traveler had to pass on stepping-stones; while wheel carriages, descending into the chasm, had to make a circuit of even worse, and incurred serious peril to spring and axle in the passage. On the mountain-sides, indeed, some few patches could be seen, very high up and scarcely accessible, but ever surrounded with little tracts of greener verdure and more varied tints, and, as I supposed, richer soil, since near the melodious ring of the bells worn by the cattle—sure signs of peasant comfort. "Might we not," said I, "find our miseries cures and our sorrows up yonder?" asked I, as I gazed upward. While I continued to look the great floating clouds that soared on the mountaintops began to roll, to mingle together, thickening and darkening at every moment, and then on, though overweighted, slowly to descend, shutting out the valley and the peasant's home as they fell, on their way to the plain beneath. It was a grievous change from the bright picture a few moments back, and the less distance I seeing that the heavily charged mist now melted into rain that soon fell in torrents. With not a rock nor a shrub to shelter under, I had nothing for it but to trudge onward to the nearest village, wherever that might be. How speedily the slightest touch of the real will close away the fictitious and imaginary! No more dreams nor fancies now, as wet and soaked I plodded on, my knapsack seeming double its true weight, and my stick appearing to take root each time it struck the ground. The fog, too, was so dense that I was forced to feel my way as I went. The dull roar of the Rhine was the only sound for a long time; but this at length became broken by the crashing noise of timber carried down by the torrents, and the louder din of the torrents themselves as they came tumbling down the mountain. I would have retraced my steps to Bregenz, but that I knew the places I had passed dry-shod in the morning would by this time have become impassable rivers. My situation was a dreary one, and not without peril, since there was no saying when or where a mountain cataract might not burst its way down the cliffs and sweep clean across the road toward the Rhine.

Had there been one spot to offer shelter, even the poorest and meanest, I would gladly have taken it, and made up my mind to await better weather; but there was not a bank nor even a bush to cower under, and I was forced to trudge on. It seemed to me at last that I must have been walking many hours; but having no watch, and being surrounded with impenetrable fog, I could make no guess of the time, save at the high a louder and deeper sound appeared to fill the air, and make the very mist vibrate with its din. The surging sound of a great volume of water, sweeping along through rocks and fallen trees, apprised me that I was nearing a torrent; while the road itself, covered with small pebbles of water, showed that the stream had already risen above its embankments. There was real danger in this; light-armed as I was, the lumbering diligence itself—had been known to be carried away by these suddenly swollen streams, and I began seriously to think of my situation. Feeling cautiously onward I reached what I judged to be the edge of the torrent, and felt with my stick that the road had been more than usually onward, and at considerable depth. Though the fog I could make out the opposite bank, and see that the stream was at least a wide one. I plainly perceived that the current was already powerful for me to breast without assistance, and that no passage remained to attempt it with safety. I may have stood half an hour thus, with the muddy stream surging over my ankles—for I was stunned and stupefied by the danger—when I thought I saw through the mist two gigantic figures looming through the fog on the opposite bank. When and how they had come there I knew not, if they indeed existed at all; these figures were not mere spectres of my imagination. It was not till having closed my eyes and opening them again that I beheld the same objects that I could fully assure myself of their reality.

At last I made them out to be two horsemen, the second of whom, of some small and feeble part of the stream to cross over. Their apparent caution was a lesson by which I determined to profit, and I stood in a patient observer of their proceedings. At times I could catch their voices but without distinguishing what they said, and suddenly I saw the first rise and spur on, and he had dashed boldly into the flood, and was quickly followed by the other. If the stream did not reach to their knees, they sat, it was yet so powerful that it tested all the strength of the horses and all the skill of the riders fo stem it; and as the water splashed and surged, and as the animals plunged and struggled, I scarcely knew whether they were fated to reach the bank or be carried down in the current. As they gained about the middle of the stream, I saw that they were mounted gens d'armes, heavy men, with heavy equipments, favorable enough to stem the tide, but hopelessly encumbered if they themselves if overturned. "Go back—hold in —go back! the water is far deeper here!" I cried out at the top of my voice; but they paid no heeding, or not heeding my warning, on they came, and as I spoke one plunged forward and struck headlong down under the water. The rising immediately his horse struck boldly out and after a few struggles gained the bank. The other, more fortunate, had passed up the stream, and reached the shore without difficulty.

With the natural prompting of a man toward those who had just overcome a great peril I hastened to say how glad I felt at their safety, and from what intense fear their lauding had rescued me; when one, a corporal, as his cuff badge implied, muttered a coarse expression of impatience, and something like a malediction on the service that exposed men to such hazards, and at the same instant the other dashed boldly up the bank, and with a bound placed his horse at my side, as though to cut off my retreat.

"Who are you?" cried the corporal to me, in a stern voice.

"A traveler," said I, trying to look majestically and indignant.

"So I see; and of what nation?"

"Of that nation which no man insults with impunity."

"Russia?"

"No; certainly not—England."

"What are you like?"

"From Bregenz."

"And from Constance by Lindau?" asked he, quickly, as he read from a slip of paper he had just drawn from his belt.

I assented, but not without certain misgivings, as I saw so much was known as to my movements.

"Now for your passport. Let me see it," said the corporal again. "Just so," said he, folding it up; "traveling on foot, and marked 'suspected.'"

Though he muttered these words to his companion, I perceived that he cared very little for my having overheard them.

"Suspected of what, or by whom?" asked I, angrily.

Instead of paying any attention to my question the two men now conversed together in a low tone and confidentially.

"Come," said I, with an assumed boldness, "if you have quite done with that passport of mine, give it to me, and let me pursue my journey."

So eager were they in their own converse that this speech, too, was unheeded; and now, grown rasher by impunity and impatience, I stepped stoutly forward and attempted to take the passport from the soldier's hand.

"Sturm and Gewitter!" swore out the fellow, while he struck me sharply on the wrist, "do you mean to try force with us?" And the other drew his sabre, and flourishing it over his head, held the point of it within a few inches of my chest.

I can not imagine whence came the courage that now filled my heart, for I know I am not naturally brave, but I felt for an instant that I could have stormed a breach; and, with an insulting laugh, I said, "Oh, of course, cut me down. I am unarmed and defenseless. It is an admirable opportunity for the display of Austrian chivalry."

"Begin, Heinz. It's very hard not to slice off his ear," said the soldier, seeming to ask leave for this act of valor.

"Get out your cords," said the corporal; "we're losing too much time here."

"Am I a prisoner, then?" asked I, in some trepidation.

"I suspect you are, and likely to be for some time to come," was the gruff answer.

"On what charge—what is alleged against me?" cried I passionately.

"What has sent many a better-looking fellow to Spielberg," was the haughty rejoinder.

"If I am your prisoner," said I, haughtily—"and I warn you not at once of your peril in daring to arrest a British subject travelling peacefully—You are not going to tie my hands? You are not going to treat me as a felon?" I screamed out these words in a voice of wildest passion, as the soldier and his assistant closed for the purpose, was now proceeding to tie my wrists together with a stout cord, and in a manner that displayed very little concern for the pain he occasioned me.

As escape was totally out of the question, I threw upon them the last remnant of dignity I had left, but upon eloquence. I really wish I could remember even faintly the outline of my indignant harangue, for my only means a fluent German, the indignation that makes men poets converted me into a great master of prose, and I will go even a vast deal further—but not complimentary, traits of the land they belonged to. I gave, too, a rapid historical sketch of their campaigns against the French, showing how they were always beaten, the only novelty being whether they ran away or captivated. I reminded them that the victory over me would be borne through Europe, being the only successful achievement of their arms for the last half-century. I expressed a fervent hope that the corporal would be decorated with the "Maria Theresa," and his companion obtain the "valor medal," for what they had done. When I had finished, apparently in the present state of their finances, but rank and honor certainly ought to await them. I don't know if this weak period of my persecution it was that I was literally "pulled up," each of the horsemen holding a line fastened to my wrists, and my one a drag forward that nearly carried me off my feet and flat on my face. I stumbled, but recovered myself; and now saw that, bound as I was, with a gentleman on each side of me, I required all the activity I could muster to keep my legs.

Another whispered conversation now took place between them, and I thought I heard the words Bregenz and Feldkirch interchanged, giving me to surmise that they were discussing to which place they should march me. My faint hope of returning to the former town was, however, soon extinguished, as the corporal, turning to me, said, "Our orders are to bring you alive to head-quarters. We'll do our best; but if, in crossing these torrents, you prefer to be drowned, it's no fault of ours."

"Do you mean by that," cried I, "that I am to be dragged through the water in this fashion?"

"I mean that you are to come along as best you may."

"It is all worthy of you, quite worthy!" screamed I, in a voice of wildest rage. "You reserve all your bravery for those who can not resist you—and you are right, for they are your only countrymen. Base beast you!—here they chucked me close up, and dashed into the stream. "The Prussians beat you!" I was now up to the waist in water. "The Swiss beat you!" Down I went over head and ears. "The French always—thrashed you"—down again—"by Jupiter, Ammon, and Aesculapius!"—nearly suffocated, I yelled out, "Wagram!"—and down I went, never to know any further consciousness, for I felt myself lying on the sanked and muddy road, and heard a gruff voice saying, "Come along—we don't intend to pass the night here!"

Do you want Whiskers?

DO YOU WANT A MUSTACHE?
IF SO, USE

The subscribers take pleasure in announcing to the citizens of the United States, that they have obtained the agency for the sale of the above named article in this country, the above justly-celebrated and world-renowned article.

THE STIMULATING ONGUENT is prepared by Dr. C. P. Bellingham, an eminent physician of London, and is warranted to bring out a thick set of in from three to six weeks. This article is the only one of the kind used by the French, and in London only can it be had. It is universally admired.

It is a beautiful compound, soothing, yet stimulating compound, acting as if by magic upon the roots, causing a beautiful growth of luxuriant hair.
This is the only article based upon

PHYSIOLOGICAL PRINCIPLES,

Which has ever been presented to the public, for promoting a healthy growth of hair.

BALD HEAD OR BARE FACE.

Persons having tried the various preparations now flooding the country, and having been deceived by them, should not be discouraged, but try one box of which is warranted to do all that is claimed for it.

If applied to the scalp it will cure baldness, and cause to spring up in place of the bald spot a fine growth of new hair. Applied according to directions, it will turn red or towy hair dark, and restore gray hair to its original color —leaving it soft, silky, and beautiful.
The Onguent is an indispensable article in every gentleman's toilet, and after one week's use they warranted for any consideration be without it.
The subscribers are the only agents for the article in the United States, to whom all orders must be addressed.

"ATTENTION, YOUNG MEN."

We prove, by the advertisement of Messrs. Horace L. Hegeman & Co., of No. 34 William Street, this City, that the renowned "Stimulating Onguent," invented by Dr. Bellingham, for a healthy stimulation to the growth of beard or whiskers, has now had its American market confided to their agency. The high reputation of this article in London, Paris, and other cities of Europe, seems to have been fully justified by experience in this country. We find that its praise are re-echoed among all classes. A few weeks are said to prove its value, and its commencement upon the beard or whiskers. The British Volunteers have made such free use of it as to attract the attention of the London Punch. See advertisement of Messrs. HEGEMAN & CO., in another column.—Herald, Sunday, Feb. 17, 1861.

Thinking you from Bald-Faced.—Now, we find the well-known druggists, Messrs. Horace L. Hegeman & Co., of No. 34 William Street, announce themselves as the American agents of Bellingham's Celebrated Stimulating Onguent for the whiskers and beard. This article is extensively used in London and Paris by all who yearn to possess luxuriant whiskers, mustache, and capillary locks. It is warranted to bring out a thick set of whiskers or a mustache in from three to six weeks.—Sunday Mercury, Feb. 17, 1861.

AND FROM THE SUNDAY TIMES.

A FASHIONABLE NECESSITY.—The stress of Sampson was in his hair, and the stress of the present fashion is fashion are tested now-a-days by the luxuriance of his whiskers and mustache. Fashion, for once, is on the side of reason and nature, and in rest ring the beard to its ancient honors, deserves to be applauded. But on some fancy nature refuses to produce the min. crop. Art, however, steps in here to her aid, with Bellingham's Stimulating Onguent—a preparation warranted to produce a thick mustache or whiskers in a few weeks. This preparation may be had at Hegeman & Co's, No. 34 William street.—Sunday Times, Feb. 17, 1861.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN HOISTING THE AMERICAN FLAG WITH THIRTY-FOUR STARS UPON INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 22, 1861.
FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY F. D. RICHARDS, PHILADELPHIA.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

PRESIDENT LINCOLN HOISTING THE AMERICAN FLAG.

We publish on the preceding page a picture—from photographs taken at the time—of Mr. Lincoln raising the stars and stripes opposite Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on the morning of Washington's birthday. Just in front of the main entrance to the State House, and but a few feet from the sacred hall of liberty, a large platform had been erected for the President-elect to stand upon before the people while he raised the starry banner of the republic. The elevation, nearly six feet, enabled a vast multitude to observe every thing enacted thereon. The front and sides of the stage were wrapped around with an American flag, while lesser flags floated from the stanchions.

Before the flag was raised, a prayer was offered, and Mr. S. Benton, on behalf of the city of Philadelphia, addressed Mr. Lincoln in words of welcome. The President replied as follows:

"FELLOW-CITIZENS,—I am invited and called before you to participate in raising above Independence Hall the flag of our country, with an additional star upon it. [Cheers.] I propose now, in advance of performing this very pleasant and complimentary duty, to say a few words. I propose to say that when that flag was originally raised here it had but thirteen stars. I wish to call your attention to the fact that, under the blessing of God, each additional star added to that flag has given additional prosperity and happiness to this country, until it has attained to its present condition; and its welfare in the future, as well as in the past, is in your hands. [Cheers.] Cultivating the spirit that animated our fathers, who gave separation and liberty to this Hall, cherishing that fraternal feeling which has so long characterized us as a nation, avoiding passion, intemperance, and precipitate action on all occasions, I think we may promise ourselves that not only the new star placed upon that flag shall be permitted to remain there as a permanent prosperity for years to come, but additional ones shall from time to time be added, and upon each new number, as was anticipated by the great historian, five hundred millions of happy and prosperous people. [Great applause.] With these few remarks, I proceed to the very agreeable duty assigned me."

We copy from the Philadelphia Press the following account of the actual raising of the flag:

"The excitement was of a fearful character when the President-elect seized the rope to hoist the flag of the country to the crest of the staff over the State House. The mode of all seemed starting from their eyes, and every throat was wide. The shouts of the people were like the roar of waves which do not cease to break. For full five minutes the cheers continued. The expression of the President-elect was that of silent content. His hat was drawn over his head. Each hand alternately pulled at the halyards, and a bundle of bunting, tri-colored, which had never been kissed by the wind before, slowly rose into the sky. If the shouting had been fearful and tumultuous before, it became absolutely unearthly now. From the smallest urchin in the tall form which rivaled the Presidents in compass of chest and length of limb, there rose a wild cry. It reminded us of some of the sacred shouts which rang among the Scottish hills in the days of clans and claymores. Suddenly, when the flag was about to reach the summit of the mast it unrolled at once, and blazed in the sunlight. At the same moment the band struck up the Star Spangled Banner, and a cannon roared in the square sent up peal after peal. Mr. Lincoln was then escorted to his hotel, and in a short time the crowd had melted away, many going back to their yet untasted breakfast, and the rest moving off as business or pleasure prompted."

RECONSTRUCTION.

AT last the practical statesmen of the country seem to see the way clear to a settlement of the pending political trouble, which has endangered the existence of our Confederacy. It seems pretty certain that the only obstacles to certain points not inconsistent with the statement of principles on which President Lincoln claimed the sufferings of his fellow-citizens in November last, the Border Slave States can be retained in the Union. Whatever obstacles of detail may intervene, experienced observers are satisfied that a compromise will shortly be made which may conserve the allegiance of Virginia, North Carolina, Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas to the Union, and which, so far as those States are concerned, will enable the new Administration to enter upon its career with a fair measure of tolerant support. If, as is expected, such men as JOHN A. GILMER, of North Carolina, ANDREW JOHNSON of EMERSON ETHERIDGE, of Tennessee, and MR. HOLT, of Kentucky, are invited to occupy seats in the new Cabinet, that support would naturally become active and energetic.

The prospect is, of course, bitter and nauseous to the old political leaders: it is natural they should repine at the overwhelming and sweeping them from the political arena. For a large segment of a century Senators Mason and Hunter, of Virginia, for instance, have been the most powerful personages in Administrative circles. The one, at the head of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, has really regulated our foreign relations for more than ten years. No foreign minister could be appointed, no message sent forth, no treaty ratified, no line of foreign policy determined, save with his consent. Congress, the President, the Secretary of State, have all been his servants. The power which in foreign countries is divided between the Executive, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the legislative body has all been wielded by him. Can it be a matter of surprise that he should cling to it, and should welcome a general catastrophe to hide his own overthrow? The other Virginia Senator has been for nearly sixteen years Chairman of the Senate Committee on Ways and Means. According to Parliamentary usage, he is the leader of the Senate. He has been, as the custom is, dictator in his Committee, which is dictator in the Senate, on all money bills. No tariff, or loan, or appropriation bill has ever passed against his opinion. In all matters involving the collection or the expenditure of money, or the regulation of the national finances and currency, his will has been supreme. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury have been his servants. Does any one who knows anything of human nature suppose that such power can be relinquished without bitterness of heart, and even frantic struggles?

Happily for the country, the interest of Virginia is not entirely in the hands of her Senators. She has noble sons—Clemens, and Summers, and Millson, and Rives, and scores of others—who will maintain the honor of the Old Dominion, if it be pressed. Sam Houston and Emerson Etheridge stand like the brave old Romans at the Sublician Bridge, and their people triumphantly sustain them. So will North Carolina. There are diminished heroes too; but the real chief of the North Carolina delegation, and one of the most practical of the Southern leaders in Congress, JOHN A. GILMER, is square and uncompromisingly for the Union.

These brave men are entitled to such concessions from the extreme men North and South as may deem requisite to enable them to fight successfully against disunion at home. This is not a crisis to stand upon niceties of doctrine, or exact abstract principles. The practical politicians know that the policy of governments must not disdain to respect the temporary and erroneous passions and prejudices of the masses. Threatened—if you will—by the North with coercion—that the Southern rebellion against the election of a sectional President is treason, and liable to punishment—is it wise, is it prudent, is it possible for the South to do any thing but, better to deal with it as a fact, and so handle it that it may yield by-and-by to its own inherent weakness and the vice of its origin? If rulers had always yielded to the impulse of popular passion and prejudice, there would have been no government on earth at the present time. The oldest and best of the free governments in the world, that of England, has constantly repeatedly yielded to popular pressure, and her best statesmen have repeatedly sacrificed their own convictions to temporary exigencies, wisely deeming that popular drives within demanded the elements of their own correction, while civil war nursed no germs but hate, strife, blood, ruine, and ruin. Nor need we go abroad for examples of the wisdom of submission to error, and compromise with prejudice. The formation of the Confederacy was a wonderful instance of compromise. Our first President, General Washington, did not hesitate to make his own designs to adopt the views of others which he deemed less sound—for the sake of peace. For the sake of peace, Jefferson, as we learn from his writings, made sacrifices of his own principles on numberless occasions. So did Madison, Monroe, and Adams. Jackson, who is so often quoted as an example by the opponents of compromise, did finally compromise in the most open way to avoid a civil war with the little State of South Carolina—when the other Southern States were ready to crush her out as a rebellious province. In a free State Government, like all other Governments, like every collective body, like every family, rests upon the corner-stone of conservatism—the yielding by each component part of something for the general good. It is not possible that in the present day of enlightenment, civilization, progress, and commerce these obvious truths should be ignored.

But, it will be said, what of the Gulf States? Without some security for their return to the Union, reconstruction is incomplete, and the North, if they stay out, will have compromised in vain.

We believe that the work of reconstruction is proceeding in the Gulf States. The Montgomery Convention has elected a very moderate man for President, and the most emphatic enemy of disunion for Vice-President. It has appointed a commissioner of the United States, and has altered none of the laws, and displaced none of the officials appointed by the General Government. Mr. DAVIS has bestirred himself actively and energetically, no money-loan or emission as would impede reconstruction. His cabinet consists of Union men. The only South Carolinian, who had the courage to avow himself a friend of the Union, is also the only South Carolinian invited to a seat in the administration. You find nowhere in the proceedings at Montgomery any indorsement of the extreme per se disunionists. More than this, more than one half the ties existing between the Gulf States and the Union remain unsevered. The United States mail is carried throughout the seceding States. "Foreigners" in Alabama prepay letters to other "foreigners" in Georgia with United States postage stamps. Postmaster Huger, at Charleston, sends regularly to Washington for stamps and blanks, which he receives as usual. The United States patent laws and copyright laws still obtain. Youths from Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama are still in their classes at West Point and Annapolis. Not only five per cent. of the Southern officers in the United States army and navy have resigned their commissions. There has been a liberal change in the revenue service. The United States collectors sell themselves collectors for their several States. But they collect duties under the United States laws, and remit to the Treasury. It seems that States will account for the money by-and-by. South Carolina, on the eve of certain secession, still sent her census returns faithfully to Washington. Surely this is a very mild kind of separation.

It would undoubtedly be a very mischievous undertaking to keep half a dozen States in the Union against the deliberate wishes of their people. Whatever popular feeling—roused to frenzy by the seizure of forts, arsenals, revenue cutters, and mints—might prompt on the spur of the moment, there could be no question but the enterprise of holding the Union together by force would ultimately prove futile. It would be in violation of the principle of our institutions. But it is reasonable to survey the proceedings of the Gulf States in their Convention without coming to the conclusion that there is a large party in those States in favor of the maintenance of the Union, and that a fair and generous tender of equal rights, and a kindly attempt to disabuse their people of the prejudices engendered by secession would give that party the control of all the Gulf States, even including South Carolina. Time will certify this. As the leaders of the Southern Confederacy see that the people will not push difficulties of their position, they will find it much harder than they supposed to tear asunder a confederacy so closely knit together as ours. The passion of secession, amidst popular pomp, clamor, bell-ringing, and the firing of salutes, the muster of brave young men for the attack of forts, and the discussion of new flags and new governments, is by far too easy and very pleasant work. But when it comes to the organization of a new postal system at a dead loss of some two millions a year, of a new revenue system on commercial principles, of a new scheme of taxation which takes money out of the pockets of poor and rich, of new copyright and patent systems, of new naval and military schools, and of all the new treaties with the world at large, the task will not prove so agreeable. Especially difficult will the negotiation of foreign treaties be found. Senator Mason, during all the whole power of the United States, has been accustomed, any time these ten years, to bully the world at large. But the Foreign Minister of a Southern Confederacy would not find the task so easy. The dispatches in gobemouche newspapers have predicted a speedy recognition of a Southern Confederacy by the European Powers. But it is not likely that Great Britain, Russia, or France will acknowledge any such Confederacy till long after the United States had set the example. Englishmen and Frenchmen are universally what we call Garrisonians. Napoleon III. thinks negroes to their table, and permit their daughters to marry them. One of the prize scholars at the College St. Louis, at Paris, the other day, was a mulatto, who was specially commended by the Emperor. Alexandre Dumas himself is of negro extraction. As for England, more than one British Judge, sentencing the prisoner and holding the Queen's commission, is fully half negro; negroes are admitted to society in London; only the other day a high-bred girl of wealth, British family connection, took black Arvers, without the least objection from her friends. It has been suggested that the cotton question would rule the policy of Great Britain and France. This is true; but, fortunately, it does not rule as it does here. Traders are a part, but not the leading part of society. Both England and France went to war in 1854 in spite of the commercial interest, and, would be to stimulate British spinners to find new sources of supply.

If we of the North give our Southern friends time enough to overcome these difficulties fairly they will find that, after all, we are their best friends, and that they can gain nothing by throwing us off. It is well that they should try their experiment. If they can do better without us than with us, God forbid that we should keep them! If the Union is really injurious to them, Heaven forbid that we should insist on preserving it! But we think that, if they have time to consider the matter coolly, they will discover that it is best for them as for us. When they do, reconstruction will become a fact.

THE LOUNGER.

MAKING WATER RUN UP HILL.

THE other morning, quietly jogging along in a country stage, the Lounger heard an expression which was very amusing, and upon which, in the manner of Dr. Franklin and his whistle, he immediately fell to moralizing. It was in a retired and romantic region among the hills, and an aqueduct crossed the road, over the head of the passenger, upon its way from a spring in the hill-side to some factory below. Water, who sat opposite the Lounger, began to smile, and presently to laugh in a low voice, as he looked up the woody hill.

"Now," said he, "Joe was a good fellow—a mighty good fellow; yes, and a smart. But there was one thing that was always a leetle ahead of him, and that was to make water run up hill."

Then he laughed quietly to himself again, and his face beamed pleasantly, like the west when the sun sets softly. "Your Narrow Joe," he said, "Humph!" as a mere matter of courtesy apparently, not at all as if Joe had undertaken any very difficult task. But the Lounger, as is the habit of loungers, began instantly to think of all the Joes he knew who had always found making water run up hill a leetle ahead of them.

There, for instance, is Joe A, for fifteen years he has been pursuing Serena W, with his heart in his hand, and throwing it at her discretion but Joe A. it doesn't hit. In vain she smiles and begs him to save himself and spare the pains. Joe will ding to Serena. He is perfectly willing to pick it up as a brother's gift to a sister; but the word brother makes Joe frantic. In vain Serena shows by her smile that she has no heart to throw him in return—that she gave it long ago to a youth who died, and, carrying with him all his most precious possessions, it was buried with him. Joe will not believe; he will not believe; and to his last day he will wonder why on earth he could not make water run up hill.

There is Joe B, the poet. He believes in his poetry as Parson Adams believed in his sermons. He reads his verses to kind friends, and, as they read aloud by his side, and smoke his cigars, they say to him, "By Jove, what publishers are you going to let bring them out?" Could any prodigy a kind world is constantly at such comfortable quarters? In vain Joe sends an ode privately to the newspapers. They will not publish it. In vain he hints around to the magazines. They are respectfully declined. In vain he besieges the publishers in their counting-rooms. They bluff him off, and how like it is! In vain more judicious friends suggest that his verses are not remarkable. Joe only waxes indignant—he reads them at the additional expense of copy, and declares that he will bide his time. But he does not bide it. He frets in a burning fever to take the public arena. He pays for the insertion of some of his best lines in a popular journal. The Public agrees with Joe's judicious friends, and that capital, good fellow does not see that he is trying to make water run up hill.

And there is Joe C. He is rich and well, and an American citizen. He groans and sighs over his country. "Where are we drifting to? What is to become of me?" he asks and asks twenty times a day. He curses the politicians, the parties, the people. It all comes, he is sure, of our foul and corrupt partisans, the total want of principle in our public men, the grog-shop statesmanship of the country. But he stays in the country and rails and blusters and whines. He would not go to primary meetings. He would have nothing to do with filthy politics. He would be afraid of soiling his hands or as his pockets if he ventured into their society. Yet every thing depends upon him and such as he. The government is nothing but the people; and whoever shirks his political duty removes the strength and support of one stone from the edifice, and brings it just so much nearer the ground fall. Joe knows that he can not have a hat without paying the price of a hat; but he apparently seriously believes that he can have the best government in the world without paying any price of personal exertion and inconvenience whatever. Joe C. is the worst of all possible cases of one who is trying to make water run up hill. He is a clever man and a respectable man; but if the people of this country interpreted their duty as he does his, the country would go to utter ruin as soon as stuck, as getting water to run up hill was a leetle ahead of the original Joe.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY.

THE history of the great epoch of modern times is properly written by a son of the country which is the fairest flower and illustration of the spirit which was awakened at that epoch. The circle of the seventeenth century is the most fascinating, as well as momentous, of all the periods since the Christian era; for it was the theater of the final debate between the great systems of despotism and liberty; between freedom of thought and speech and the annihilation of the very fundamental conditions of human progress; between the Papacy and all its consequences and the Reformation with all its results.

Our own national existence, and the circumstances and spirit of the settlement of this country, are so directly referable to the events of that time, that the champions of religious liberty then should naturally be our household heroes now. The Netherlands were the battle-field of Christian civilization and political progress; and the great captains in that battle, whether they fought with sword or pen, or, as was most generally the case, with both, were, upon the side of religious liberty, men whose fame makes the most splendid era of their countries.

It was Elizabeth's England—the greatest monarch and the most illustrious subjects that that country has ever seen—which stands in history as the final saucer of the cause, which is our cause and that of the future. But the vanguard and the faithful early fighters were the Dutch, with William the Silent for their leader—the ablest and the most illustrious prince in Europe.

Five years ago Mr. Motley opened the great drama by his "History of the Dutch Republic." His name had been known for a moment in the history of our literature some fifteen years before, when he had published a novel which have hardly survived to this time. He was, therefore, an unknown author, who could claim for his work only its intrinsic interest, leaving to the reader to discover whether it had derived any charm from the author's own power and treatment; and never was there a more legitimate success. The profound, extensive, and accurate original research which was every where evident secured the utmost faith in the fidelity of life record, and the vivid, picturesque, impassioned movement of the style fascinated the most cursory and careless reader.

Mr. Motley's great merits as a historian are the patient and exhaustive research of the scholar; the instinctive apprehension of the pivotal points, which reveals the sagacity of the practical observer; and the sensitive imagination, the luminous humor, the manly sympathy, and the vivid delineation of the poet and literary artist. His style is often careless, but it is never finical. He does not sacrifice the force of his description to any fancied necessity of rounding each cadence in a sentence. One secret of his charm is the hearty admiration of what is admirable, and the honest contempt of duplicity and meanness. The former quality, too, he is fully just to ability which he thinks mistakenly applied. His pictures of Philip Second of Spain, and, both as different as they are, of Philip's great lieutenant, Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, are not less masterly than his portrait, tender and yet unfathomable homage, of William of the subdued and pensive sketch of Aldegonde, or the radiant picture of Sir Philip Sidney, who flashes, bright and beautiful hero, across the living page of the story!

"The gummy bridle glittered free
Like to some branch of stars we see
Hung in the golden galaxy.
The bridle bells rang merrily,
As he rode down to Cumelot—
And
From the bank and from the river
He flashed into the crystal mirror.
"Tirra lirra," by the river.
Sang Sir Lancelot."

Throughout the work there is the consciousness of jocund enthusiasm in the writer, of the most vital interest in the triumph of the great, modern, American principle opposed to all the pomp and power of heavy prejudice and reverend authority—and it gives a delightful elasticity to the narration, which otherwise were nothing else. For pleasure Mr. Motley by the other popular historians, we shall find that he has less elaboration as a literary artist than Prescott; less technical elegance and passionlessness than Prescott; less massive splendor than Bancroft; but more human warmth and glowing sympathy than any of them, which, with a boyish frankness, goes right to the heart. You thank the ardent, eloquent friend as he tells the story to you, and you press his hand with personal affection as you reluctantly separate. Mr. Motley is to be envied both for his happy selection of a theme and for his delightful treatment of it. He is still a young man, and there is every reason in the history of the Thirty Years' War, which is the natural sequel of his present subject, we feel that it is a promise which he can easily fulfill, and which the world will not readily forgive him for not fulfilling.

THE MODESTY OF THE FOURTH ESTATE.

A NEWSPAPER is notoriously the most modest thing going: and the only difficulty with it is, that it distrusts the common sense of every body else. For you may be observed that in nothing does a newspaper has occasion to mention its own name in company with the names of its contemporaries, it always prints it Italics and itself in small capitals. You may also have remarked that, if every newspaper had the same piece of intelligence this morning, and has occasion to refer to it to-morrow, it speaks of the news which appeared in itself the day before, as if it were not in every paper and a matter of common notoriety, so that it would be just as sensible to say, "Yesterday, the 22d, being, as the (here follows the title of the paper in small capitals) announced, the birthday of Washington." Still further you will have observed that each paper compliments itself, and ignores every other, except to sneer at it or snub it or quote it in support of its own opinion.

And most interesting is the childlike innocence with which the Morning Sunbeam informs us, in a telegram from Washington, that the views of the Sunbeam are awaited with profound interest; that the sentiments of the Sunbeam are having a prodigious influence upon Congress; that the article of Wednesday morning in the Sunbeam is conceded to have been the clearest and most brilliant statement of the question yet made.

In like manner the remarks of the gentlemen corresponding for the Sunbeam, who "have reason to know;" who "have been informed by the highest authority" who "have just heard the Honorable Lemuel Lickspittle declare that the milky white has plenty of room" in it," who "meet to-day with the counsels of the Sunbeam are not implicitly followed;" and who "learn that the course recommended by the Sunbeam is the only one that can save the country." All these remarks are, considered in themselves, novel and delightful; but by simultaneous and persistent appearance in a hundred Sunbeams, they somehow at last lose the relish of novelty and interest. And inasmuch as event, whatever they are, always justify the prognostications of the Sunbeam, whatever they may have been, "as may be seen upon reference to our files."

* Room!—Ed.

(every body keeps files of newspapers nowadays), why, it is perhaps superfluous to say so three or four times a week.

The newspapers ought to remember that the Court should be supposed to understand at least some law. The public, for instance, is perfectly aware that every newspaper in the land is the most enterprising, sagacious, independent, honest, characteristic, truly conservative, safe, trustworthy, interesting, enlightened, virtuous, candid, conscientious of all conceivable newspapers: and that every other is the meanest, slowest, flattest, falsest, most untrustworthy, illiberal, partisan, reckless, factic, dangerous, infidel, dull, ridiculous, malicious, and contemptible sheet that was ever spawned.

The public knows all this to begin with, and does not require to be reminded of it every morning. We all know that when the Sunbeam prints that important remark of the Hon. L. Lickspittle in its telegraphic column, that the Auroral Aurora of to-morrow morning will print in its telegraphic column—The ridiculous remark attributed to the Hon. Mr. Lickspittle is, as you probably were already convinced by the source whence it emanated, a tissue of falsehood and calumny. The reasons of such wholesale defamation are evident enough. What a pity that the character of the whole newspaper press should be open to suffer from the malice of the most contemptible of its members! The leader in yesterday's Arrow causes a visible fluttering among the nerves of the Hon. That shaft rankles deep. The Honorable Dimity Tuppet has stepped up on a piece of orange-peel yesterday evening; but, upon the whole, things are steadier. It is now generally understood that the fever two make four. Don't credit any thing in the Sunbeam to the contrary."

"WHEN I BECAME A MAN—"

SOME Loungers besides the present one may remember a hideous midnight procession two or three years ago through the streets of the city, composed of men dressed like carmen—like carmen and sempstresses. Is it with the "Goose and Compasses" in London? No; it is the "Goat and Compasses." A little sheep, and a pitiful of dirt, and a canoe, and bandage, and guttural voice, and tying in coffins, and fearful oath, and clashing sword, and velvet hat with plumes, and solemn effort many constitutions. The performances of secret societies not for words would the Lounger violate his awful oath to the —— and the —— and the —— are really very absurd. Every boy is impressed with a ridiculous self-consciousness, and feels painfully inadequate to the occasion. And in saying so no secret is revealed. Every man who belongs to some secret society. Every body wears a mystic key, or badge, or pin, or indulges in the secret sign during business hours. What is the good of lying to forget it? How significantly some comely stranger stares you in the face while performing some extraordinary gesticulation which you know you ought to remember, and don't! How pleasantly you beam, as if you knew all about it, and were tasting the rarest enjoyment from the mystic communion!

But in our country every secret society which has a political object must be at once suppressed with a ridiculous self-consciousness, and feels painfully inadequate to the occasion. And in saying so no secret is revealed. Every man who belongs to some secret society. Every body wears a mystic key, or badge, or pin, or indulges in the secret sign during business hours. What is the good of lying to forget it? How significantly some comely stranger stares you in the face while performing some extraordinary gesticulation which you know you ought to remember, and don't! How pleasantly you beam, as if you knew all about it, and were tasting the rarest enjoyment from the mystic communion!

But in our country every secret society which has a political object must be at once suppressed and condemned. In this country, what can be rightfully done should be openly done. You need have no secrets from your neighbor that you mean well to him and the rest. It is a government of opinion, and opinion is not changed by skulls embroidered upon the arm, or a grand-scheme incantation. A secret political society—from the very nature of a conspiracy, and in this country no man who is in earnest prefers to conspire. Nor is there any need of doing so if the majority is honorable. There may be gratification to the part of us that love to conspire rather than light, in a deep conspiracy; but it is a gratification that in no make themselves fools in order that they may be fairer knaves.

Secrecy in military movements is right, but such movements imply a state of war. Secret political societies in a popular republic mean only conspiracy against the majority. They may be by no means intentional upon the part of all. The very object of the leaders is to seduce the many by exciting curiosity and playing upon the love of mystery and disobey which lurks in all childish minds. This is an influence which in some charitable and moral minds ignorantly exercised, as that of the politics it is another thing. Let us hope that the Sons of Malta have grown to be men, and have therefore put away childish things.

"GENTEEL" ENGLISH.

THE last Cornhill, under the title of "Samples of Fine English," treats, good-humoredly, of the curious words which the Lounger has sometimes rapped over the knuckles, of using stilted instead of the simple and sinewy words of the language. The style is always in danger of having his head broken; but nobody can be blind to the sense and simplicity under his protection. Vanity, Sir, quoth Parson Adams: my best sermon is upon Vanity, Sir. And, in like manner, the Lounger has a sermon about laying hands upon doubtful and improper words, is very likely to be arrested himself for the very error he is exposing.

But the Cornhill hits right and left with unction, and doubtless not without effect. He asks, as indeed the Lounger had already asked, Why not say begin instead of commence; why not dead instead of deceased? It also observes the thin sport of making long words do duty for humor, and quotes Cuthbert Bede's advice to this end, "not to give vent to vociferations till he has emerged from the forest." This is a kind of writing meant for humorous of which we Americans are constantly guilty.

The writer is down upon "the poet Tupper." Is it not wonderful to think how people, and sensible people, were taken by the nose by Martin Farquhar Tupper, and led by him into admiration of his absurd Proverbial Philosophy? In fact, we are not quite cured of Tupper until he came over in person to show us what he really was, and very effectually prevented a relapse. Since the poet came, nobody has been known to suppose him other than a bore. He is now in the state of overwhelming assurance. Try a little Tupper, and see how droll the taste is.

He likes to say he has simple names," says the Cornhill, so he says Many a fair flower is bedewed with preparatives appetizences. He explains preparatives as a to stop to conjugities, to be keen in catching likeness. And with energetic elasticity to keep the gulfs of contrast. And what laws to keep the self-raised emanations from the self-poised character of God.

How incredible that this stuff was read and seriously praised!

If a man doubts the value of simplicity in language, let him hear any really popular and effective speaker, and mark how the words hit the thought upon the head and the point with meaning. Dr. Johnson was speaking of some book: "Sir," he said, "it has not wit enough to keep it sweet;" then recollecting himself, he translated it into Johnsonese. "It has not vitality enough to preserve it from putrefaction." Let us, then, say the Cornhill, and let this Weekly and the sensible article—call a spade a spade. Let us use the plainest and shortest words that will grammatically and gracefully express our meaning.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FEW SIMPLE REASONS AGAINST SMOKING.

(Principally addressed to BENJAMIN BROWN, in answer to his Letter to the Editor of this Journal.)

BY THE MOTHER OF A LARGE FAMILY, AND THE WIDOW OF THREE HUSBANDS, WHO ALL SMOKED.

1. Because it injures the complexion.
2. Because it is injurious to the furniture generally.
3. Because it is a nuisance to be shaken in the room when the gentlemen have been smoking overnight.
4. Because it is a nuisance to be shaken in the next morning.
5. Because it keeps persons up to late hours, when every respectable person ought to be in bed.
6. Because it makes the house, the man's clothes, and his beard, and his hair, and his whiskers, and his whole body, the dirtiest objects in creation, and it is positively uncomfortable sometimes to go near him.
7. Because it is a most objectionable fact not only injures those who partake of it, but has the further effect of tainting the ladies out of the room.
8. Because it is a most expensive habit which the smoker, not participating in its so-called enjoyments, can not possibly indulge in, without depriving his constitutions, to say nothing of the many comforts and new dresses that their dear wives and children might have had if they had deprived or, supposing the same amount of money had only been expended in the usual way.
9. Because it gives extra trouble to the servants who have to clean the rooms, and to make the beds next morning.
10. Because how are one's daughters to get married, if the gentlemen are all addicted to sit up in a separate room paying court to their filthy pipes and cigars?
11. Because it is a most unfeminine habit, which is wedded to it, for the refining influences of female society.
12. Because it is a most disgusting habit, ringing, flirting, and all rational enjoyments.
13. Because it is a custom originally imported from the savages.
14. Because we see the nations that smoke the most are mostly the uncivilized, heavenly, dreadful, dreamt, dreamest, smoke, and worthless beings that encumber.
15. Because many young men are capable of exalting so much smoke—the face of the earth.
16. Because when a man says he is going out to smoke a cigar, there's no knowing what mischief he is bent upon, or the harm the cigar may do him, if he does get into it.
17. Because it is not allowed in the Palace, or Windsor Castle, or in the Queen's presence, Heaven bless her.
18. Because the majority of husbands only do it because they know it is offensive to their wives.

And a thousand other good reasons, if one only had the time, patience, or inclination to enumerate them all. Pray did Adam smoke?

MR. JOHN Bright tells us to take United States institutions for our model. Does he mean that the recommendation to United States Cabinet Ministers? Ought Lord Herbert of Lea, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir Cornewall Lewis, to imitate Secretary of War in Mr. Buchanan's Administration?—London Punch.

A GOVERNOR.—Considering the line Governor Pickens has taken in regard to the Federal property in South Carolina, we should suggest the appointment of one addition to the list of his honorifics: he known as GOVERNOR PICKENS AND STEALIN'S.—London Punch.

CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.—Who will maintain there is nothing in the old Greek doctrine that nouns have a mysterious influence over their adjectives, when the Spanish minister, whose diplomatic duties have involved him in Feuds the Seven Seas, Guests, should be the Count De Lomb? Only the spelling should be corrected like this.

BOWYER'S BEST.—If a young lady was entering a convent, and a feeling of regret came over her, what kind of grief would you call it?

An unavailing groan-a-setting!

A QUESTION THAT HAS NEVER BEEN ANSWERED YET.—Can a cow jump?

A FLING AT A FOGARS. FASHION.—If ladies will wear hoops, they necessarily make themselves bores.

THE PARIS Charivari lately gave an account of an aeriform gentleman, who had written a few act plays, and proposed to an elderated dramatists to divide with him the profits of his productions. A very common practice in Paris, which explains the frequency of many French writers' pieces. The dramatist, otherwise engaged, declined the offer in the following terms: "I can not accept your proposition, Sir. It is written in Scripture—'Thou shalt not go halves on with the sin.'" Hereupon the unreliable collaborator left in a rage, and the next morning the dramatist received a challenge, commencing thus: "Sir,—You insinuated yesterday that I am an ox," etc. etc.

A Frenchman, being about to remove his shop, his landlord insisted the reason, stating, as the sum total, that it was considered a very good stand for business. The Frenchman replied, with a shrug of the shoulder, "Oh yes, he's very good stand for the business; by ear, me stand all day, for nobody ever come to make me more!"

A NEW MEDICINE.—A poor woman, understanding that Dr. Dodgem was a physician, and hearing of his great humanity, solicited him, by letter, to send her something for her husband, who had lost his appetite, and was reduced to a most melancholy state. The good-natured waited on her instantly, and, after some discourse with the patient, he found him thinking with sickness and fear from him in the first day, when he would send him supplies, which he believed would prove efficacious. He immediately went home and put into a phial two or three pills the following habit: "These must be used as necessary, by the patient, out of good hands." The poor woman, with this prescription to the comfortless mourner, who found it contained a remedy superior to any thing Galen or his disciples could ever administer.

A PUNY had climbed a considerable way up the usual tree, on the top of which, when a gentleman's stranger to the rest of the company, who had given frequent loud hints of his being a man of superior knowledge, said to the guide:

"Tony, what is the highest part of this mountain?"

"The top, Sir," replied the guide.

A chimney-sweeper's boy went into a baker's shop for a penny loaf, and something to be diminutive in size, remarked to the baker that he did not believe it was weight. "Never mind that," said the man of dough, "you will have the less to carry home." "True," replied the boy, and then threw the halfpence on the counter, left the shop. The baker called after him, crying, "Stop! you have not money enough.—"Never mind that," said young sooty, "you will have the less to eat."

A former in the West of England, who has two handsome daughters, would not permit them to keep the company of young men after dark. After the old man retired to rest, the girls would hang a sheet out of the window, and each lover, with the assistance of his lady, would gain admittance. It so happened that one evening the girls were rather more than usually engaged in the performance of the article, could not conjecture the meaning of it, so he caught hold of the sheet and proceeded to pull it down. The gentleman, supposing it to be one of their sweet-hearts, gave a jerk, and did not let go. The consequence was, that the old man's head was level with the window-sill, when one of them exclaimed, "Oh, Sir, let go the sheet!" and letting go the sheet, down came the old gentleman to the ground with a tremendous shrinking. Without allowing all opposition to their keeping company, he was soon a father-in-law.

EX-MAYOR Harper, as is well known, is a strong temperance man, and much opposed to pipe-going; but, as all Father Harper's friends are playful and humorous, as he thought he had a festival associate of the cobbler, who has been in the habit of smoking, he found out his nature, when his doctor told him it was the measles, fully testifies. A few days ago a friend in the evening accosted him thus: "I've been to Barnum's, Mr. Harper, and witnessed the performances in the Happy Family." It was quite a spiritual affair. I felt very much interested in it, and read the whole story as Wilkie Collins wrote it. The play-bill, I think, said it was published by you."

"Barnum is a d——d humbug," said Harper, "but I am sorry to see him bring the 'Woman in White' before the public in such a ridiculous condition."

"How is that?" inquired our Swamp friend.

"Well, the fact is," said Harper, and here he lowered his voice to a whisper, "Barnum's 'Woman in White' partakes too much of the nature of the drum-s."

Our Swamp friend exploded, and as he knew it was useless to ask for more, he gave it vent and procured a copy of the "true and original Woman in White."

An eminent counsel was employed in an action against the proprietors of the Brighton Omnibus Coach. On the part of the defendant the coachman was called. Counsel, commencing his chief cross-examination, he was subject to the tender's cross-examination. Having laid up the facts in his mind, he called on the witness, and warning him to give a "precise answer" to every question, and not to look at the bar but to think the question meant, he proceeded thus: "You drive the Brighton coach, I believe?" "Yes, Sir." "Do you, when you set out from London, ever call—to—" "Why, man, did you not tell my counsel friend to this moment?—I tell you I did not."—"Well, I ask it of you—I put it to you upon your oath—do you not drive the Brighton coach?"—"Yes, Sir, I drive the horses."

An old lady, who was in the habit of declaring, after the occurrence of an unusual event, that she had predicted it, was one day asked how she really did by her worthy spouse, who, like many others we have heard of, had got tired of that eternal "I told you so." Rolling up her eyes, which breathless with excitement, he dropped into his chair, elevated his hands, and exclaimed, "Why, my dear, I told what—what do you think? The old brindle cow has gone and cut up at one of her capers!"

The old lady was ready; and hardly waiting to hear the last word, she cried out, "I told you so! my lungs, *I told you so, you old fool!—I told you so! You always would let it stay out o' doors!"

If an empty purse could speak, what love-like speech would it make?—"You'll find no change in me."

A gentleman wrote to Dr. Francis the following note: "DEAR DOCTOR,—I caught cold yesterday, and have got a little hoarse. Please to write what is best for me to take.—Yours, &c."

"DEAR F.,—For the cold, take half a pound of butter candy. For the little hoarse, buy a saddle and bridle, and ride home on it as soon as the first time we have pleasant weather.—YOURS, DR. F."

South South to Jones, it really is a sin
To see you not at church, and so I've come
To ask you, you're wrong, the place is owned, confound it—

AN AWAKENING PREACHER.—"Jenny," said a South minister, stooping from his pulpit, "have ye got a green shawl?" "Yes, Sir," said Jenny. "Then stick it into that sleeping brute by your side."

Many a girl thinks she can do nothing without a husband, and when she gets one, finds she can do nothing with him.

During a recent fire an old woman was very anxious to go through a street which at the time was considered dangerous, but the firemen were unwilling. At length she pushed one of the policemen aside, when that worthy preserver of the peace exclaimed, "Now, Mum, you can't pass; if you do you'll be killed, and then you'll blame us afterward."

"What would our wives say if they knew where we were?" said the captain of a schooner, when they were boiling about in a heavy sea, fearful of going on shore. "Humph! I shouldn't mind that," replied the mate, "if we only knew where our wives were."

ENGLISH FRENCH.—A French gentleman was one day guessing a dog, when an English friend remarked that he seemed to speak French well. "I know a few dogs, Sir, and no asses;" and, in short, I do love every thing that is barked."

A witness in a court, speaking in a very harsh and loud voice, the lawyer employed on the other side exclaimed, "Police, why don't you take him to custody?"—"Bosmer," said the cadet, "I think I am a-thief."

Martagenble Indies should make a point of visiting the theatre before the curtain is drawn up: they would then be sure of an overture.

MISS PATTERSON, OF BALTIMORE.—(FROM A PAINTING MADE IN 1815.)

"MISS PATTERSON," OF BALTIMORE.

THE portrait of "Miss Patterson," the first wife of the late Prince Jerome Bonaparte, which we publish herewith, is from a painting owned by her grandson, which represents her as she appeared in 1815. All our readers know, of course, that this lady is now prosecuting a suit in the French Courts for the recognition of her marriage with Jerome Bonaparte. The lady herself, though seventy-five years of age, has gone to Paris for the purpose, and is instructing her lawyers in person.

Those who wish to read a full account of the case we refer to No. 187 of Harper's Weekly, published on 28th July last, in which we narrated the eventful tale at length. Here we may briefly say that Jerome Bonaparte, a young man of twenty, commanding a French man-of-war, met at Baltimore, in 1804, Elizabeth Patterson, daughter of the President of the Bank of Baltimore; wooed and won her. They were married without the consent of Jerome's eldest brother and legal guardian, the Emperor.

When Napoleon heard of it he refused to consent; refused to suffer any court to register the marriage; refused to permit "Miss Patterson" to land at Amsterdam; and wrote, vainly, the following letter to the Pope to induce him to annul the marriage by bull:

"I have frequently spoken to your Holiness of a young brother, nineteen years of age, whom I sent in a frigate to America, and who, after a sojourn of a month, although a minor, married a Protestant, the daughter of a merchant of the United States. He has just returned. He is fully conscious of his fault. I have sent back to America Miss Patterson, who calls herself his wife. By our laws the marriage is null. A Spanish priest so far forgot his duties as to pronounce the benediction. I desire from your Holiness a bull annulling the marriage. I could easily have this marriage broken in Paris, since the Gallican Church pronounces such marriages null. But it appears better to me to have it done in Rome, on account of the example to sovereign families marrying Protestants. It is important for France that there should not be a Protestant young woman so near my person. It is dangerous that a minor and distinguished youth should be exposed to such seduction against the civil laws and all sorts of propriety."

The Emperor spoke the truth when he said that Jerome was "conscious of his fault." He was glad to accept an embassy to Algiers; and "Miss Patterson," broken-hearted, and with her son, returned to Baltimore, where she has lived quietly ever since. Jerome, as every body knows, subsequently married a princess of Wurtemberg, and had by her a son, the present Prince Napoleon, and his sister, the famous Princess Mathilde. It is to have the first marriage declared legal, and Napoleon and Mathilde pronounced illegitimate, that "Miss Patterson" is now suing in Paris. The case naturally excites great interest.

CHAPTER XXII.

MR. POCKET said he was glad to see me, and he hoped I was not sorry to see him. "For I really am not," he added, with his son's smile, "an alarming personage." He was a young-looking man, in spite of his perplexities, and his manner seemed quite natural. I use the word natural in the sense of its being unaffected; there was something comic in his distraught way, as though it would have been downright ludicrous but for his own perception that it was very near being so. When he had talked with me a little he said to Mrs. Pocket, rather anxiously, "Belinda, I hope you have welcomed Mr. Pip?" And she looked up from her book, and said, "Yes." She then smiled upon me in an indistinct state of mind, and asked me if I liked the taste of orange-flower water? As the question had no bearing, near or remote, on any foregone or subsequent transaction, I consider it to have been thrown out, like her previous approaches, in general conversational hospitality.

I found out within a few hours, and may mention it at once, that Mrs. Pocket was the only daughter of a certain quite accidental deceased Knight, who had invented for himself a conviction that his deceased father would have been made a Baronet but for somebody's determined opposition, arising out of entirely personal motives—I forget whose, if I ever knew them—to a foreign's, the Prime Minister's, the Lord Chancellor's, the Archbishop of Canterbury's, anybody's—and had tacked himself on to the nobles of the earth in right of this quite supposititious fact. I believe he had been knighted himself for storming the English grammar at the point of a pen in a desperate address engrossed on vellum, on the occasion of the laying of the first stone of some building or other, and handing some Royal Personage either the trowel or the mortar. Be that as it may, he had directed Mrs. Pocket to be brought up from her cradle as one who in the nature of things must marry a title, and who was to be guarded from the acquisition of plebeian domestic knowledge. So successful a watch and ward had been established over the young lady by this judicious parent that she had grown up highly ornamental, but perfectly helpless and useless. With her character thus happily formed, in the first bloom of her youth, she had encountered Mr. Pocket, who was also in the first bloom of youth, and not quite decided whether to mount to the Woolsack, or to roof himself in with a Mitre. As his doing the one or the other was a mere question of time, he and Mrs. Pocket had taken Time by the forelock (at a season when, to judge from its length, it would seem to have wanted cutting), and had married without the knowledge of the judicious parent. The judicious parent, having nothing to bestow or withhold but his blessing, had handsomely settled that dower upon them after a short struggle, and had informed Mr. Pocket that his wife was "a treasure for a Prince." Mr. Pocket had invested the Prince's treasure in the ways of the world ever since, and it was supposed to have brought in but indifferent interest. Still Mrs. Pocket was in general the object of a queer sort of respectful pity, because she had not married a title; while Mr. Pocket was the object of a queer sort of forgiving reproach because he had never got one.

Mr. Pocket took me into the house and showed me my room: which was a pleasant one, and so furnished as that I could use it with comfort for my own private sitting-room. He then knocked at the doors of two other similar rooms, and introduced me to their occupants, by name Drummle and Startop. Drummle, an old-looking young man of a heavy order of architecture, was whistling. Startop, younger in years and appearance, was reading and holding his head, as if he thought himself in danger of exploding it with too strong a charge of knowledge.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Pocket had such a noticeable air of being in somebody else's hands, that I wondered who really was in possession of the house and let them live there, until I found this unknown power to be the servants. It was a smooth way of going on, perhaps, in respect of saving trouble; but it had the appearance of being expensive, for the servants felt it a duty they owed to themselves to be nice in their eating and drinking, and to keep a deal of company down stairs. They allowed a very liberal table to Mr. and Mrs. Pocket; yet it always appeared to me that by far the best part of the house to have boarded in would have been the kitchen—always supposing the boarder capable of self-defense, for, before I had been there a week a neighboring lady, with whom the family were personally unacquainted, wrote in to say that she had seen Millers slapping the baby. This greatly distressed Mrs. Pocket, who burst into tears on receiving the note, and said it was an extraordinary thing that the neighbors couldn't mind their own business.

By degrees I learned, and chiefly from Herbert, that Mr. Pocket had been educated at Harrow and at Cambridge, where he had distinguished himself; but that when he had had the happiness of marrying Mrs. Pocket, very early in life, he had impaired his prospects and taken up the calling of a Grinder. After grinding a number of dull blades—of whom it was remarkable that their fathers, when influential, were always going to help him to preferment, but always forgot to do it when the blades had left the Grindstone—he had wearied of that poor work and come to London. Here, after gradually failing in loftier hopes, he had "read" with divers who had lacked opportunities or neglected them, and had refurbished them up others for special occasions, and had turned his acquirements to the account of literary compilation and correction, and on such means, added to some very moderate private resources, still maintained the house I saw.

Mr. and Mrs. Pocket had a toady neighbor—a widow lady of that highly sympathetic nature that she agreed with every body, blessed every body, and shed smiles and tears on every body according to circumstances. This lady's name was Mrs. Coiler, and I had the honor of taking her down to dinner on the day of my installation. She gave me to understand on the stairs that it was a blow to dear Mrs. Pocket that dear Mr. Pocket should be under the necessity of receiving gentlemen to read with him. That did not extend to Me, she told me in a gush of love and confidence (at that time I had known her something less than five minutes); if they were all like Me, it would be quite another thing.

"But dear Mrs. Pocket," said Mrs. Coiler, "after his early disappointment (not that dear Mr. Pocket was to blame in that), requires so much luxury and elegance—"

"Yes, Ma'am," said I, to stop her, for I was afraid she was going to cry.

"And she is of so aristocratic a disposition—"

"Yes, Ma'am," I said again, with the same object as before.

"—that it is hard," said Mrs. Coiler, "to have dear Mr. Pocket's time and attention diverted from dear Mrs. Pocket."

I could not help thinking that it might be harder if the butcher's time and attention were diverted from dear Mrs. Pocket; but I said nothing, and indeed had enough to do in keeping a bashful watch upon my company-manners.

It came to my knowledge through what passed between Mrs. Pocket and Drummle while I was attentive to my knife and fork, spoon, glasses, and other instruments of self-instruction, that Drummle, whose Christian name was Bentley, was actually the next heir but two to a baronetcy. It further appeared that the book I had seen Mrs. Pocket reading in the garden was all about titles, and that she knew the date at which her grandpapa would have come into the book, if he ever had come at all. Drummle didn't say much, but in his limited way (he struck me as a sulky kind of fellow) he spoke as one of the elect, and recognized Mrs. Pocket as a woman and a sister. No one but themselves and Mrs. Coiler, the toady neighbor, showed any interest in this part of the conversation, and it appeared to me that it was painful to Herbert; but it promised to last a long time, when the page came in with the announcement of a domestic affliction. It was, in effect, that the cook had "mislaid" the beef. Up my unutterable amazement, I now, for the first time, saw Mr. Pocket relieve his mind by going through a performance that struck me as very extraordinary, but which made no effect on any body else, and with which I soon became as familiar as the rest. He laid down the carving-knife and fork—being engaged in carving at the moment—put his two hands into his disturbed hair, and appeared to make an extraordinary effort to lift himself up by it. When he had done this, and had not lifted himself up at all, he quietly went on with what he was about.

Mrs. Coiler then changed the subject, and began to flatter me. I liked it for a few moments, but she flattered me so very grossly that the pleasure was soon over. She had a serpentine way of coming close at me when she pretended to be vitally interested in the friends and localities I had left, which was altogether snaky and fork-tongued; and when she made an occasional bounce upon Startop (who was very little), or upon Drummle (who said less, (I rather envied them for being on the opposite side of the table.

After dinner the children were introduced, and Mrs. Coiler made admiring comments on their eyes, noses, and legs—a sagacious way of improving their minds. There were four little girls, and two little boys, besides the baby who might have been either, and the baby's next successor who was as yet neither. They were brought in by Flopson and Millers, much as though those two non-commissioned officers had been recruiting somewhere for children and had enlisted these: while Mrs. Pocket looked at the young Nobles that ought to have been, as if she rather thought she had had the pleasure of inspecting them before, but didn't quite know what to make of them.

"Here! Give me your fork, mum, and take the baby," said Flopson. "Don't take it that way, or you'll get its head under the table."

Thus advised, Mrs. Pocket took it the other way, and got its head upon the table; which was announced to all present by a prodigious concussion.

"Dear, dear! Give it me back, mum," said Flopson; "and Miss Jane come and dance to baby, do!"

One of the little girls—a mere mite, who seemed to have prematurely taken upon herself some charge of the others—stepped out of her place by me, and danced to and from the baby until it left off crying, and laughed. Then all the children laughed, and Mr. Pocket (who in the most charming manner had twice offered to lift himself up by the hair) laughed, and we all laughed and were glad.

Flopson, by dint of doubling the baby at the joints like a Dutch doll, then got it safely into Mrs. Pocket's lap, and gave it the nut-crackers to play with; at the same time recommending Mrs. Pocket to take notice that the handles of that instrument were not likely to agree with its eyes, and sharply charging the little boy to look after the same. Then the two nurses left the room, and had a lively scuffle on the staircase with a dissipated page who had waited at dinner, and who had clearly lost half his buttons at the gaming-table.

I was made very uneasy in my mind by Mrs. Pocket's falling into a discussion with Drummle respecting the dates of two baronetcies while she ate a sliced orange steeped in sugar and wine, and forgetting all about the baby on her lap, who did most appalling things with the nut-crackers. At length little Jane, perceiving its young brother to be imperiled, softly left her place, and with many small artifices coaxed the dangerous weapon away. Mrs. Pocket finishing her orange, and the scene time, and not approving of this, said to Jane:

"You naughty child, how dare you? Go and sit down this minute!"

"Mamma dear," lisped the little girl, "baby sod have put him eyeth out."

"How dare you tell me so?" retorted Mrs. Pocket. "Go and sit down in your chair this moment!"

Mrs. Pocket's dignity was so crushing that I felt quite abashed, as if I myself had done something to rouse it.

"Belinda," remonstrated Mr. Pocket from the other end of the table, "how can you be so unreasonable? Jane only interfered for the protection of baby."

"I will not allow any body to interfere," said Mrs. Pocket. "I am surprised, Matthew, that you should expose me to the affront of interference."

"Good God!" cried Mr. Pocket, in an outbreak of desolate despondency. "Are infants to be nut-screwed into their tombs, and a nobody to save them?"

"I will not be interfered with by Jane," said Mrs. Pocket, with a majestic glance at that innocent little offender. "I hope I know my poor grandpapa's position. Jane, indeed!"

Mr. Pocket got his head in his hair again, and this time really did lift himself some inches out of his chair. "Hear this!" he helplessly exclaimed to the elements. "Babies are to be nut-cracked dead, for people's poor grandpapa's positions!" Then he let himself down again, and became silent.

We all looked awkwardly at the table-cloth while this was going on. A pause succeeded, during which the honest and irrepressible baby made a series of leaps and crows at little Jane, who appeared to me to be the only member of the family (irrespective of servants) with whom it had any sort of social acquaintance.

"Mr. Drummle," said Mrs. Pocket, "will you ring for Flopson? Jane, you undutiful little thing, go and lie down. Now, baby darling, come with ma!"

The baby was the soul of honor, and protested with all its might. It doubled itself up the wrong way over Mrs. Pocket's arm, exhibited a pair of knitted shoes and dimpled ankles to the company, and kicked at its self-free, and was carried out in the highest state of mutiny. And it gained its point after all, for I saw it through the window within a few minutes, being nursed by little Jane.

It happened that the other five children were left behind in the dinner-table, through Flopson's having some private engagement and their not being any body else's business. I thus became aware of the mutual relations between them and Mr. Pocket, which were exemplified in the following manner. Mr. Pocket, with the normal perplexity of his face heightened and his hair rumpled, looked at them for some minutes as if he couldn't make out how they came to be boarding and lodging in that establishment, and why they hadn't been billeted by Nature on somebody else. Then, in a distant Missionary way, he asked them certain questions—as why Joe had not had tea in his frill: who said, Pa, Flopson was going to mend it when she had time—and how little Fanny came by that whitlow: who said, Pa, Millers was going to poultice it when she didn't forget. Then, he melted into parental tenderness, and gave them a shilling a piece and told them to go and play; and then as they went out, with one very strong effort to lift himself up by the hair, he dismissed the hopeless subject.

In the evening there was rowing on the river. As Drummle and Startop had each a boat I resolved to set up mine, and to cut them both out. I was pretty good at most exercises in which country-boys are adepts, but as I was conscious of wanting elegance of style for the Thames—not to say for other waters—I at once engaged to place myself under the tuition of the winner of a prize-wherry who plied at our stairs, and to whom I was introduced by my new chum. This practical authority confused me very much by saying I had the arm of a blacksmith. If he could have known how mortally the compliment hurt him his pupil I doubt if he would have paid it.

There was a supper-tray after we got home at night, and I think we should all have enjoyed ourselves but for a rather disagreeable domestic occurrence. Mrs. Pocket was extremely sweet, and Mr. Pocket was in good spirits, when a housemaid came in and said, "If you please, Sir, I should wish to speak to you."

"Speak to your master?" said Mrs. Pocket, whose dignity was roused afresh. "How can you think of such a thing! Go and speak to Flopson. Or speak to me at some other time."

Begging pardon, she wished to consult the housemaid, "I should wish to speak at once, and to speak to master."

Hereupon Mr. Pocket went out of the room, and we made the best of ourselves until he came back.

"This is a pretty thing, Belinda!" said Mr. Pocket, returning with a countenance expressive of grief and despair. "Here's the cook lying insensibly drunk on the kitchen floor, and a large bundle of fresh butter made up in the cupboard ready to sell for grease!"

Mrs. Pocket instantly showed much amiable emotion, and said, "This is that odious Mary Anne's doing!"

"What do you mean, Belinda?" demanded Mr. Pocket.

"Mary Anne has told you," said Mrs. Pocket. "Did I not see her with my own eyes and hear her with my own ears, come into the room just now and ask to speak to you?"

"But has she not taken me down stairs, Belinda, and shown me cook?" said Mr. Pocket, "and shown me the woman, and the bundle too?"

"And do you defend her, Matthew," said Mrs. Pocket, "for making mischief?"

Mr. Pocket uttered a dismal groan.

"Am I, grandpapa's grand-daughter, to be nothing in the house?" said Mrs. Pocket. "Besides, the cook has always been a very nice respectful woman, and, in the most natural manner, when she comes out after the situation, she felt I was born to be a Duchess."

There was a sofa where Mr. Pocket stood, and he leaned upon the arm outside of the Dying Gladiator. Still in that attitude, he said, with a hollow voice, "Good-night, Mr. Pip," when I deemed it advisable to go to bed and leave him.

CHAPTER XXIII.

After two or three days, when I had established myself in my room, and had gone backward and forward to London several times, and had ordered all I wanted of my tradesmen, Mr. Pocket and I had a long talk together. He knew more of my intended career than I knew myself, for he referred to his having been told by Mr. Jaggers that I was not designed for any profession, and that I should be well enough educated for my destiny if I could "hold my own" with the average of young men in prosperous circumstances. I replied, of course, knowing nothing to the contrary.

He advised my attending certain places in London, for the acquirement of such mere accomplishments as I wanted, and my investing him with the functions of explainer and director of all my studies. He hoped we should get on pleasantly: since I should meet with little to discourage me, and should soon be able to dispense with any aid but his. Through love of saying (he said) much more to similar purpose, he placed himself on confidential terms with me in an admirable manner; and I may state at once that in no way always preserved that agreeable footing. filling his compact with me, that he made me zealous and honorable in fulfilling mine with him. If he had shown indifference as a master, I have no doubt I should have returned the compliment as a pupil: he gave me no such occasion, and our relations long remained pleasant. Nor did I ever regard him as having any thing ludicrous about him—or any thing but what was serious, honest, and good—in his tutor communication with me.

When these points were settled, and so far carried out as that I had begun to work in earnest, it occurred to me that if I could retain my bedroom in Barnard's Inn, my life would be agreeably varied, and that pleasant change be taken in it, it must be submitted to my grandian. I felt that his delicacy arose out of the consideration that the plan would save Herbert some expense; so I went off to Little Britain, and imparted my wish to Mr. Jaggers.

"If I could buy the furniture now hired for me," said I, "and one or two other little things, I should be quite at home there."

"Go it!" said Mr. Jaggers, with a short laugh. "I told you you'd get on. Well! How much do you want?"

I said I didn't know how much.

"Come!" retorted Mr. Jaggers. "How much? Fifty pounds?"

"Oh, not nearly so much."

"Five pounds?" said Mr. Jaggers.

This was such a great fall that I said in discomfiture, "Oh! more than that."

"More than that, eh?" retorted Mr. Jaggers, lying in wait for me, with his hands in his pockets, his head on one side, and his eyes on the wall behind me. "how much more?"

"It is so difficult to fix a sum," said I, hesitating.

"Come!" said Mr. Jaggers. "Let's get at it. Twice five's ten, and two fives are twenty. Three times five will that do? Four times five: will that do?"

I said I thought that would do handsomely.

"Four times five will do handsomely, will it?" said Mr. Jaggers, knitting his brows. "Now what do you make of four times five?"

"What do I make of it?"

"Ah!" said Jaggers; "how much?"

"I suppose you make it twenty pounds," said I, smiling.

"Never mind what I make it, my friend," observed Mr. Jaggers, with a knowing and contradictory air of his head. "I want to know what you make it."

"Twenty pounds, of course."

"Wemmick!" said Mr. Jaggers, opening his office-door, "Take Mr. Pip's written order, and pay him twenty pounds."

This strongly marked way of doing business made a strong impression on me, and one not at all to my agreeable kind. Mr. Jaggers never laughed, but he wore great bright creaking boots, and there was a certain air of these boots, with his large head bent down and his eyebrows joined together, awaiting an answer, he sometimes caused me to feel small, as if they laughed in a dry and suspicious way. As he happened to go out now, and as Wemmick was brisk and talkative, I profited by the opportunity I hardly knew what to make of Mr. Jaggers's manner.

"Tell him that, and he'll take it as a compliment," answered Wemmick; "he don't mean that you should know what to make of it.—Oh! I" for I looked surprised, "it's not personal; it's professional: it's professional."

Wemmick was at his desk, lunching—and crunching—on a dry, hard biscuit; pieces of which he threw from time to time into his slit of a mouth, as if it were posting them.

"Always seems to me," said Wemmick, "as if he had set a man-trap and was watching it. Suddenly—click—bolts a boot!"

Without remarking that man-traps were not among the amenities of life, I said I supposed he was very skilful.

"Deep," said Wemmick, "as Australia." Pointing with his pen at the office floor, to express that Australia lay transversely for the purposes of the figure to be symmetrically on the opposite spot of the globe. "If there was any thing deeper," said Wemmick, bringing his pen to paper, "he'd be it."

Then I said I supposed he had a fine business, and Wemmick said, "Pretty fair—pretty fair." Then I asked if there were many clerks? To which he replied:

"We don't run much into clerks, because there's only one Jaggers, and people won't have him at second-hand. There are only four of us. Would you like to see 'em? You are one of us, as I may say."

I accepted the offer. When Mr. Wemmick had put all his biscuit into the post, and had taken a turn or two at his office-box in a garret, the key of which safe he kept somewhere down his back, and produced from his coat-collar like a watch-guard, he led me down to Mr. Jaggers's room dark and shabby, and the greasy shoulders that had left their mark in Mr. Jaggers's room seemed to have been shuffling up and down the staircase for years. In the front first floor, a clerk who looked something between a publican and a race-horse-trainer, puffed, swollen man—was attentively engaged with three or four people of shabby appearance, whom he was keeping waiting a long time, as they severally ed to be treated who contributed to Mr. Jaggers's coffers. "Getting evidence together, said Mr. Wemmick in my ear, "for the Bailey." In the room over that, a little flabby terrier of a clerk with dangling hair (his cropping seemed to have been forgotten when he was a puppy) was similarly engaged with a man with weak eyes, whom Mr. Wemmick presented to me as a snitcher who kept his pot always boiling. Mr. Wemmick made the remark using I pleased—and who was in an excessive white-perspiration, as if he had been trying his art on himself. In a back room, a high-shouldered man, with a face-ache tied up in dirty flannel, who was dressed in old black clothes that bore the appearance of having been waxed, was stooping over his work of making fair copies of the notes of the other two gentlemen, for Mr. Jaggers's own use.

This was all the establishment. When we went down stairs again Wemmick led me into the yard, and said, with his face turned away again, "whose likenesses are those?"

"These?" said Wemmick, getting upon a chair, and dusting the dust off the horrible heads before bringing them down. "These are two celebrated ones. Famous clients of ours that got us a world of credit. This chap (why you must have come down in the night and been peeping into the inkstand, to get this blot upon your eyebrow, you old rascal!) murdered his master, and, considering that he wasn't brought up to evidence, didn't plan it badly."

"Is it like him?" I asked, recoiling from the brute, as Wemmick spat upon his eyebrow and gave it a rub with his sleeve.

"Like him? It's himself, you know. The cast was made in Newgate, directly after he was taken down. You had a particular fancy for me, hadn't you, Old Artful?" said Wemmick. He then explained this affectionate apostrophe, by touching his brooch representing the lady and the weeping willow at the same time with the un upon it, and saying, "Had it made for me, you see."

"Is the lady anybody?" said I.

"No," returned Wemmick. "Only his game. (You liked your bit of game, didn't you?) No; deuce a bit of a lady—in the case, Mr. Pip, except one—and she wasn't of this slender, lady-like sort, and you wouldn't have caught her looking after this urn—unless there was something to drink in it." Wemmick's attention being thus directed to his brooch, he put down the case and polished the brooch with his pocket-handkerchief.

"Did that other creature come to the same end?" I asked. "He has the same look."

"You're right," said Wemmick, "it's the genuine look. Much as if one nostril was caught up with a hair-hook, and a little fish-hook. Yes, he came to the same end; quite the natural end here, I assure you. He forged wills, this black did, if he didn't also put the supposed testators to sleep—and it looked precious like it. You were a gentlemanly Cove, too" (Mr. Wemmick was again apostrophizing), "and you said you could write Greek. Yah, Bounceable! What a liar you were! I never met such a liar as you, Pip!" Connecting his last with the shelf again, Wemmick touched the largest of his mourning rings, and said, "Sent out to buy it for me only three days before."

While he was putting up the other cast and coming down from the chair, the thought crossed my mind that all his personal jewelry was derived from like sources. As he had shown no diffidence on the subject, I ventured on the liberty of asking him the question, when he stood before me, dusting his hands.

"Oh yes," he returned, "these are all gifts of that kind. One brings another, you see; that's the way of it. I always take 'em. They're curiosities. And they're property. They may not be worth much, but, after all, they're property to me, and I'm not thirsty to row with your brilliant look-out, but as to myself, my guiding-star always is, "Get hold of portable property."

When I had rendered homage to this light, he went on to say, in a friendly manner:

"If you take to the work, when you know nothing better to do, you wouldn't mind coming over to see me at Walworth, I could offer you a bed, and I dare say implements to use. We're not much to show you; but such two or three curiosities as I have got you might like to look over: and I can fend of a bit of garden and a pipe and a summer-house.

I said I should be delighted to accept his hospitality.

"Thank'ee," said he; "then we'll consider that it's to come off, when convenient to you. Have you dined with Mr. Jaggers yet?"

"Not yet."

"Well," said Wemmick, "he'll give you wine, and good wine. I'll give you punch, and not bad punch. And now I'll tell you something. When you go to dine with Mr. Jaggers, look at his housekeeper.

"Shall I see something very uncommon?"

"Well," said Wemmick, "you'll see a wild beast tamed. Not so very uncommon," you'll tell me. I reply, that depends on the original wildness of the beast, and the amount of taming. It won't lower your opinion of Mr. Jaggers, perhaps, to tell you your eye on it."

I told him I would do so with all the interest and curiosity that his preparation awakened. As I was shortly to depart on the morrow, he and I would like to devote five minutes to seeing Mr. Jaggers "at it?"

For these reasons, and not least because I didn't clearly know what Mr. Jaggers would be found to be "at," I replied in the affirmative. Wemmick shook hands, and came out to accredited police-court, where a blood-relation (in the murderous sense) of the deceased with the functions to discharge was standing at the bar, uncomfortably chewing something; while my guardian had a woman under examination or cross-examination—I don't know which—and was striking at her, and the bench, and every body present, with awe. If any body, of whatsoever degree, and a word that he didn't approve of, should presume to have it "taken down." If any body wouldn't make an admission, he said, "I'll have it out of you!" and if any body made an admission, he said, "Now I have got you!" The magistrates shivered under a single bite of his finger. Thieves and thief-takers hung in dread fingers on his words. Every reporter's bat hair of his eyebrows turned in their direction. Which side he was up I couldn't make out, for he seemed to me to be grinding the whole place in a mill; I only know that when I stole out on tip-toe he was not on the side of the bench, for he was making the legs of the old gentleman who presided quite convulsive under the table, by his denunciations of his conduct as the representative of British law and justice in that chair that day.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Friday, February 22, in the Senate, after the passage of a number of private bills, the Fort-route Bill was taken up, and the question of compensation for carrying the overland mail was discussed by the members from California. The bill providing for the payment of expenses incurred in organizing the Indian battalion in the Interior Department was also discussed, but gave way to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, upon which Senator Gwin, of California, made an effort to tack the Chirigui ground-meat to the Deficiency Bill, but did not succeed. The Senate by a majority adjourned without action.——The House was not in session.
